The Hill Dorms were filled as usual this year after the scheduled renovation was postponed indefinitely

Renovation postponed indefinitely

HUD rejects funding for Hill Dorm work

by PETE TURCHI
News Editor

The proposed renovations of the three hill dormitories, scheduled to begin this past June, have been indefinitely delayed as a result of the Department of Housing and Urban Development's decision not to allocate funds to Washington College for the project this year.

Vice President of Finance Gene Hessey said that he is optimistic, and that the school has applied for the HUD loan for a third time. "We're still attempting to get complete funding," Hessey says. "Approximately fifty per cent (of the $800,000 needed for the construction) is available."

Hessey goes on to say that he expects to receive HUD's decision on the College's most recent request for funding by early October at the very latest. "If we get the funds," he continued, "we'll begin making plans immediately. If not, we are prepared to find other sources."

The college housing loan from HUD that the College is applying for is part of one hundred and ten million dollars allocated to colleges across the nation annually. The plan does not guarantee any amount of money for any particular school or state, but it does specify that some of the money must be given to small colleges.

The Vice President expressed concern over the latest rejection because escalating building costs are continually raising the price of the project. Hessey says, "We're anxious to get underway. It will take some time to contact other sources, and to get the work started in June we need to be able to take bids on the project in March."

Although the work on the buildings will be major, Hessey says that the buildings are very sound structurally. There will be substantial interior renovations, many of which will help to conserve energy. Although there will be some loss of space in the dorms, Hessey says, "They'll be brand new...very attractive."

If the renovations are begun this coming summer, it will be necessary to rearrange student housing. Although Hessey admits that this will probably cause some minor inconveniences, he also says that "there will always be some growing pains when you have to dislocate people, but I'm sure it will be worth it."

Class of '83

Higher standards produce smaller freshman class

KATHERINE STRECKFUS

Higher standards and changes in Admissions procedures yielded this year's freshman class of 204 students, a decrease from the 229 member freshman class of 1978-1979.

In addition, enrollment figures show a higher ratio of men to women in comparison to recent years, with approximately 63 percent men and 37 percent women in te the Class of 1983.

According to Director of Admissions Mickey DiMaggio, rejection of applications increased from 15 percent last year to 22 percent this year, while acceptances decreased from 82 percent last year to 70 percent this year. Overall applications this year totalled 750, a slight increase over last year's 738 total applications.

DiMaggio said, "We didn't want to just enroll a class, we were looking to graduate a class. We were looking for students that will not be overwhelmed by what they meet at Washington College."

DiMaggio cited " a more complete scrutiny of the credentials we were presented with" as a reason for higher selectivity. He said that the Admissions Staff considered grade point average, Scholastic Aptitude Test scores, teacher recommendations, activities, and "human factors" instead of looking at only one aspect of the application.

In addition, DiMaggio made several changes in Admissions procedures. He said "This year, the Admissions staff as a whole was more involved and the Admissions Committee was more involved." He said that the Committee reviewed 80 percent of the applications this year, whereas last year the Committee reviewed "very few" of the applications.

The Admissions Committee is comprised of the Dean of the College, the Dean of Students, three faculty members, two members of the Admissions staff, and three students.

Of 204 freshmen, there are 129 men and 75 women. In addition, there are 30 transfer students, 18 men and 12 women.

According to DiMaggio, the decrease in female enrollment is not just a Washington College problem, but a state-wide trend. He said, "I talked to several admissions directors in Maryland, and we really can't come up with the reason for it. Some people say, with the economy being as it is, families are just sending sons to college. I doubt that," DiMaggio said.

He cited a slight increase in enrollment in all-female colleges as a possible factor.

In addition, DiMaggio said, "The number of applications from women hasn't really changed, but the number of male applications has increased."

The drop in female enrollment has caused "a great deal of flexibility, a luxury of space" in women's dormitories, according to Maureen Kelly, Dean of Students. On the other hand, she said that "men's dorms are crowded. It doesn't seem fair."

Second floor Caroline has been converted to an all-male floor as a result of male overcrowding. Kelley added that more women's dorms may be converted to men's dorms when the Hill Dorm Dorms are renovated.

Forty-one percent of the class of 1983 were in the top fifth of their high school classes, compared to thirty percent in 1978, according to DiMaggio.

large public school enrollment

67 percent of the class attended public high schools compared to 51 percent from public high schools last year. "Government programs for financial aid, increased BEOG for exam; s, made a private college education more accessible this year."

SAT scores are slightly lower than last year on the Verbal end with an average of 470, and Math scores are "definitely higher" than last year, at 504, DiMaggio said. Both scores are above the national averages of 428 429 Verbal, 468 Math.

This year's freshman class shows a geographic distribution of 13 states and 4 foreign countries.

The Faculty Report on Vandalism

Committee on Vandalism Releases 29-Page Report

The Report itself. . .

by GEOFF GARINTHER
Edilor-in-chief

After two months of interviews with faculty administration officials, and student groups, the ad hoc faculty committee appointed last spring to study problems of vandalism at Washington College released in May its 29-page report, including 36 specific recommendations.

The report, released so far only to faculty administrators, and resident assistants, was approved "in principle" by the faculty at a special meeting in late May.

Titled "Vandalism, Violence, and Theft: A Report," the report is divided into an introduction and four sections, each written by one of the four committee members.

Dr. John Klaus, the former music department professor who left the College after last semester, reported on what he called "the largest single area of the committee's concern," student affairs. The committee's recommendations here fell into five subdivisions:

"Any time an institution takes a look atitself, it is beneficial," says Maureen Kelley, Dean of Students, in response to the committee on vandalism's recent report.

Kelley goes on to say, "It forces other groups in the college to take a look at themselves." Although the committee's report expresses hope that the vandalism problem can be solved by the College's bicentennial in 1982, Kelley feels that there is no reason the problem cannot be curbed by the end of this school year. "The problem will be solved when...the atmosphere (at Washington) is conducive to good academics," she says.

Kelley feels that one of the better recommendations made by the committee was that the tone of orientation be geared more towards academics than social life, and she says that this idea was followed when the incoming freshmen arrived. Another proposal which she agrees with is the need for

About the Report

Most summers at Washington College you could afford to miss. This last one, however, saw the publication of the faculty report on vandalism. It's anything but dull and it's of major interest to all students here.

The report seems remarkably frank and accurate. Few students would disagree with committee Chairman Bob Day's description of the campus as "'rowdy.' if one puts the best word on it; 'rude', if one chooses the worst word." The intention of the committee seems to have been to make the campus a little less "rude" and, again, few students would object to that. Some disagreement will arise, however over the committee's recommendations, most of which are good, some of which are not-so-good, and all of which are well-intended. A few of the good ones:

The division of Somerset, the emphasis on academics during Orientation, and the checking in and out of dorm residents by RAs, all recommended in the Report, have already been implemented. More changes may be on the way. Co-ed housing, a possibility the committee suggests the College should investigate, would do much to civilize dorm life. (The situation in Caroline, although more an "emergency" move than an "experiment," according to the Student Affairs Office, seems to be working well so far. Another Committee suggestion to review the Student Judiciary System has been taken up by the SGA.

Still other recommendations by the Committee should be investigated. A campus-wide style manual would contribute somewhat to the academic unity the committee sees as desirable for the College. A strengthening of the campus security force seems to be the solution to many of the problems cited in the report. In fact, rather than waiting until, as the committee suggests, "funds and available, qualified manpower permit;" strengthening of security should be of top priority.

But as beneficial as most of the recommendations would be, certain others seems either unreasonable or infeasible. A few of the not-so-good ones:

The College simply can't afford to man "dorm desks," and if it could, the money would be better spent on strengthening night security. Requiring a 3.0 grade point average for RAs implies that academic performance is necessarily an accurate measure of a student's ability to handle the job; in fact, academic performance may be one of the least important considerations. The licensing of parties at which alcohol is to be served seems both impossible to enforce and unnecessary. Liquor licenses would be about as effective as Prohibition and would probably meet with even less approval. Another recommendation, the establishment of an SGA student damage deposit fund, merely seems to shift the onus for collection from the student Affairs Office to another body, the SGA.

The intentions behind each of the committee's recommendations, even those that aren't so good, are admirable. Even more admirable is the faculty's willingness to help solve what is essentially the students' problem. But despite the faculty's concern, vandalism, violence and theft will continue until students themselves decide to prevent them. It is the students' problem to begin with, and it will remain the students' problem to solve.

Student Government Association

Reform of Judiciary heads SGA plans

by KATHY WURZBACHER

The Student Government Association is planning to reform the Student Judiciary Board, according to SGA President Jay Young.

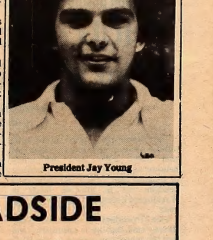
Young says that the SGA is "now forming a committee to reform the Judiciary and looking for people who are interested in working on that committee." The SGA would like "a senior to head the committee, but anyone can be on it. General involvement is desired."

In addition to reforming the Judiciary, the SGA plans to reform the Constitution. "A lot of things have become outdated, perhaps irrelevant, and they need to be brought up with the times," Young said.

Chris Lemmon will head the SGA's Beautification Using Student Help (B.U.S.H.) Project, and, with a $1500 budget, B.U.S.H. is planning "an extensive landscaping project this semester. They hope to make a whole day's activity out of it, including an outdoor picnic," said Young. The date will be announced at a later time.

John Townsend will head the SGA's Sorrity Committee for dances and social events, and A.J. Viliani will head the Elections Committee.

A new committee headed by David Fitzsimmons has been organized "to answer the report by faculty on vandalism, violence, and theft at Washington College," said Young.



The SGA also hopes to put out a newsletter some time next week. The newsletter should include more information on social events and committees.

The SGA social calendar will begin this semester on September when the dance band Brandy will play. Additional eVents include:

The Rocky Horror Picture Show-September 14
Senate Elections-September 19
Freewater, a country rock band-September 22
A Bluegrass Festival-September 29
Freshmen Class Elections-October 25
Homecoming Buffet-October 27

The SGA also plans to buy tickets to one of the games in the upcoming Baltimore Orioles-Boston Red Sox series at Memorial Stadium and provide bus transportation to and from the game.

SGA office hours will be posted after the first meeting on September 24.

McLain back in the classroom again

by BILL MORTIMER

Joseph McLain, president of Washington College, will step out of his office and into Dunning Hall to teach a chemistry course at the school this semester.

The course, in solid state chemistry, will only be taught by McLain for one semester, but it is possible that he will teach it again during the 1980-1981 school term. McLain, who began his teaching career at Washington College in 1946, has not taught a course at the school since he became president in the spring of 1973, a hiatus of almost six years. He has, however, taught the course at other schools in the United States, as well as in foreign colleges. During this past January, McLain visited India to give his course.

For McLain, teaching Washington College students will be an enjoyable experience. He decided to take up the additional responsibility when, in the course of writing a book on the subject, he "came across some new and valuable concepts and wanted our kids to snare in them." At the same time, McLain says, it "enables me to get closer to the students to find out what the problems are." McLain also wants to bring the lectures he has given at so many other campuses to his own school as well.

Although McLain will be assuming the responsibilities of a professor, he sees no change in his philosophy as president. "I've always been a teacher" he says.

In the classroom situation, McLain hopes to put basic laws and principals in easily expressed, pictured terms. He hopes that his teaching will give students the ability to relate the predictable choices and common sense rules of chemistry.

While teaching, McLain will be finishing work on his book, which deals with the applications of Solid State Chemistry. Begun in May, and currently 14 chapters long, he hopes to finish a total of 19 chapters by December. In both the book and his lectures, McLain hopes "to bring the paratechniques from an art to a science."

Academic Probation rolls increase

KATHERINE STRECKFUS
Assistant Editor

The number of students placed on academic probation this year almost doubles that of last year, according to Registrar Ermon Foster.

43 students were placed on probation this year in comparison to 23 last year.

According to Foster, one reason for the increase was last year's larger enrollment, with a total of 697 students compared to an enrollment of 664 students in 1977-1978. "The higher the enrollment, the greater the increase in probation," he said.

Still, the figures show an increase in percentage of the student body placed on probation, from 3.5. in 1978 to 6.2. this year.

In addition, Foster said that 31 students or 4.4 . were removed for probation this year in comparison to 11 students, or 1.7., removed last year. Twenty students were continued on probation this year and eleven were academically dropped.

Foster added that after two semesters of probation, a student is automatically dropped.

Dean of Students Maureen Kelley, a member of the Committee on Admission and Academic Standing, said "I'd like to think that standards in the classroom were such that it took that much more effort." She also said there was "no change in standards by the Committee. More students earned probation."

Foster said that at the end of every semester, he reviews every student's records and pulls out "those who are not making progress toward graduation." These cases are then reviewed by the Committee on Academic Standing. The Committee decides whether or not a student will be placed on academic probation based on an examination of each student's records.

Wakelyn to speak at Fall Convocation

Washington College News Bureau

The opening of the school year at Washington College will be officially marked by a Fall Convocation to be held on Tuesday, September 4 at 11:00 a.m. in Tawes Theater. Dr. Jon Wakelyn, a former faculty member at Washington College, will speak on the topic "Whatever Happened to the Liberal Arts Curriculum?"

Dr. Wakelyn has authored several history books' including, The Politics of a Literary Man: Simms, Biographical Dictionary of the Confederacy (winner of the American Library Association outstanding reference book in 1978) and The Common People of the Nineteenth Century South. A fourth book, The Antebellum South, has been delivered to press.

After receiving his Ph.D. from Rice University in 1966, Wakelyn taught in the history department at Washington College for four years. He also directed the American Studies Program. In 1970, he took a teaching job at Catholic University where he still is a faculty member. His other duties at Catholic University include Associate Dean of Arts & Sciences, Director of the American Studies Program and Director of Congressional Studies.

President Joseph H. McLain will preside at the Convocation on Tuesday. Interested members of the community are invited to attend.

Creegan returns from sabbatical

by KATHY MIDDLETON

Dr. Frank Creegan recently returned from sabbatical leave with positive aspirations toward updating the Chemistry Department. Creegan, who from January to late October was guest professor at the University of Konstanz in West Germany, is looking forward to introducing new information found in his studies to his Chemistry students.

Although awarded research leave in molecular rearrangements, Creegan later decided to change the content of his research. As a teacher of Biochemistry, which has been a course at Washington College for several years, he decided that upgrading of the lab portion of the course was necessary. "No one in the department has had any experience in the laboratories associated with biological chemistry," says Creegan. I thought this might be a suitable opportunity to acquaint myself with the newest techniques in these two areas (biological and biochemistry), and thus bring that expertise back to Washington College to improve our program."

So he went to the University of Konstanz, where he studied in a research group with Prof. Wolfgang Pfleiderer, senior professor of chemistry at the University and a world-famous researcher in Pteridine Chemistry. (Butterfly pigments are one of the best examples of this.) For " past several years, Pfleiderer has been involved in neucleoside and neucleotide chemistries. All of this work is directed toward the synthesis of transfer nucleic acids.

"I went to Konstanz to learn the latest techniques in i biological chemistry," said Creegan. "To do so, I became part of a research group involved in these transfer nucleic acids. So for the past seven-and-a-half months, I was involved in developing and implementing new chemical syntheses of transfer nucleic acids."

Transfer nucleic acids are responsible for the synthesis of protein in the body. What Creegan plans to do is take the techniques and experience gained at Konstanz and implement that into the courses here at Washington College. "Both the Chemistry 201-202, Organic Chemistry, and 307 (Biological Compounds) will be updated as a result of my experiences at Konstanz and because I will be working in collaboration with Prof. Pfleiderer, I hope to obtain funds that will permit two Chemistry majors to work in these areas during the summer of 1980," he said.

Dr. Creegan will be conducting a series of seminars on his studies. The first of this series will be held on Tuesday, September 25 at 4:00 p.m. in room 311 Dunning Hall. They are open to the public.

Maintenance concludes successful summer

by RUSS SCHILLING

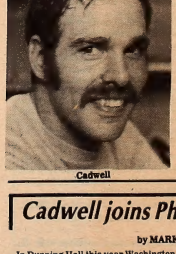
Ray Crooks, Superintendent of Buildings and Grounds, calls the Washington Collegecampus "the prettiest campus in the state," while adding that the past summer has been a most successful one for his department.

"We were able to get back to painting exterior and interior portions of Somerset, Bunting and Dunning," Crooks says.

Major renovations were completed in Somerset, where the building was divided into three male dormitories.

"Students," says Crooks, "will notice the fire escapes at the rear of Somerset, which will eventually be replaced by fire escapes within the building. Also, several parts of Somerset were totally repainted, showers were repaired,—it was our biggest project this summer."

Other summer work included the readying of the dorms for summer program students, which took a considerable amount of time. Also, a new electrical service was installed in the Fine Arts Center.



Knee To Teach During Fallaw Leave

by MELANIE PULLEN

Dr. Knee, substituting for Dr. Fallaw this semester, will teach history but also enjoys teaching literature and art.

Knee obtained his B.A. and his M.A. from Queens College, a division of the City College of New York. He received his Ph.D from New York University in 1974. Dr. Knee has never before taught at a school as small as Washington College. He likes the size of W.C. and feels that it provides a more congenial and relaxed atmosphere, saying that, "It gives you time to think here."

Knee frequently draws upon analogies to help clarify complex definitions in his classes. He is very much concerned with relating to his students.

Cadwell joins Physics Department

by MARK SLATER

In Dunning Hall this year Washington College students will find a new face — Dr. Lou Cadwell, Professor of Physics.

Cadwell, originally from Hastings-on-Hudson, New York, received his Masters at Florida State University, then he went on to receive his Ph.D. at Wesleyan University of Connecticut. He has worked as an assistant professor at both of these universities, but this is his first fulltime teaching post position.

Cadwell, who will be teaching The Art and Science of Physics and Electricity and Magnetism, says, "I'd like to see more interest in the sciences." He feels that the information the sciences offer is interesting to study if students will only give it a chance. "I would like to give my students the best possible learning experience," he said.

Outside of teaching, Cadwell's interests include boating, sailing, basketball, and other sports, music, and woodworking. He also enjoys what he calls "the privacy of the outdoors."

"I like the small school and the down-home friendliness of the students, faculty, and the Kent County people in general," Cadwell said. When asked whether or not he feels he will fit in at Washington College he quickly replied, "I really do think so."

Spilich replaces Mergler in Psychology

by JOHN LAWRENCE

This fall George Spilich joins the faculty of the Psychology Department at Washington College as Assistant Professor.

Spilich originally from Brooklyn, New York, comes to Washington after receiving his B.A. in psychology from the University of Wisconsin in 1974, and his M.A. from the University of Texas at El Paso in 1978. He is currently continuing studies toward his doctorate at the University of Pittsburgh. He will defend his dissertation this October.

He describes himself as "a cognitive developmental psychologist with an interest in aging" and is at present working on a computer model for normal aging and senile aging. I'm interested in what happens when thinking goes awry. I hope to teacha course in aging here."

Infancy and Childhood, General Psychology, and a Graduate Pro-Seminar make up Spilich's teaching duties this semester.

"People here are very friendly; it's like an extended family. There are things you can do here you can't do in a large school. It's very pleasant here. I wouldn't go back to New York City for a million dollars," says Spilich.

On Psychology, he says, "I don't think anyone pays any attention to it. People use these principles all the time. It has a pragmatic aspect. Science exists to serve."

Spilich resides at Chester Harbour with a wife and two children.

Report

dormitories and dormitory life, resident assistants, freshman orientation, fraternities and sororities, and the use of alcoholic beverages on campus.

The division of Sommerset into three buildings, the installation of monitors desks at the entrance to each dorm, and a study of co-ed housing were among the major recommendations concerning dorm life. A minimum grade point average requirement of 3.0 and a salary increase were recommended for RA's).

The committee recommended that freshman orientation dwell more on the academic than the social aspects of the College. They also recommended that the role of fraternities and sororities on campus be studied. And the "licensing" of parties at which alcohol is served was recommended as a solution to what the committee called "abuse of alcohol" on campus.

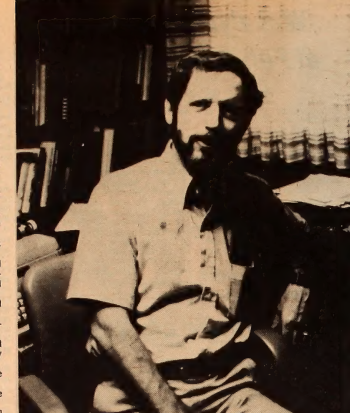
Committee Chairman Bob Day, currently on sabbatical for the semester, wrote in his report on the College's academic program, "In spirit the campus is 'rowdy,' if one puts the best word on it, 'rude' if one chooses the worst word." As possible solutions to this problem, the committee recommended continued study of the four-course plan, suggesting a return to five courses for freshman and sophomores, increased use of extra-curricular events by the faculty in their courses; and a return to the "traditional notion of homework" and "shotgun tests."

In his report on the Student Government Association and the Student Judiciary Board, Dr. John Taylor recommended a revision of the SJB and making the SGA responsible for financing repairs of damage caused by vandalism.

Dr. John Conkling, reporting on maintenance and security, called for quick repair of damage and strengthening of the night security force.

report seen as "package"



"We see it as a package," said Taylor of the report after its release. "We don't say everything in it absolutely must be done. We made some specific recommendations of things that we think ought to be done, and we recommended some things be studied in more depth."

Concerning the faculty's approval of the report "in principle," Taylor said, "Obviously, individual faculty members disagreed with individual aspects of the report. But I would say the faculty generally supported the spirit of it."

"It was as much a question of not having time to discuss it in detail as anything else," said Conkling of the faculty approval.

The 36 recommendations of the committee:

1) Somerset Dormitory be divided back into three separate dorms.
2) Dorm desks be established and manned during the evening hours.
3) The College study the feasibility of co-ed housing.
4) Housing by academic interest be expanded.
5) A grade point average of 3.0 be required for Resident Assistants.
6) Resident Assistants rigorously enforce housing rules.
7) Students be checked into dorm rooms by Resident Assistants, and out by Resident Assistants and maintenance personnel.
8) The question of increasing Resident Assistants' pay be studied in order to make it compatible with the proposed increase in responsibility.
9) Dormitory rules be emphasized during orientation.
10) A symposium on academic life be a major event at orientation.
11) A discussion of study skills be made part of orientation.
12) The College study the academic role of fraternities and sororities.
13) All official group parties be licensed by Student Affairs.
14) Beer on tap should only be served at the Coffee House (or at licensed parties).
15) Counseling in alcohol and drug abuse should be strengthened.
16) A study of how to control alcoholic consumption at athletic events b e made.
17) Maintenance vehicles should not be driven on the campus lawns.
18) A master landscaping plan should be developed; in the meantime landscaping projects of modest size should begin.
19) All damage should be repaired quickly and fully.
20) More permanent trash receptacles should be installed.
21) The condition of individual students' rooms should be more closely monitored.
22) Traffic be controlled on College Avenue.
23) The night security force be strengthened.
24) More outdoor recreational facilities be established.
25) The SGA spend more of its funds on academic, cultural, and campus "civic" projects.
26) The College study the feasibility of establishing an SGA student damage deposit fund.
27) The suspension of the right to participate in intercollegiate athletics or in such extra-curricular activities as band and chorus should be included among the possible components of social probation.
28) The students' forfeiture, say, of the right to have a car on campus if that car is used in the destruction of College property.
29) The Student Affairs Committee undertake a comprehensive review of the student judicial system.
30) The Academic Council study the feasibility of requiring five courses for freshman and sophomores.
31) The faculty (with the aid of a student assistant corps) check on a regular basis the student's progress through a course.
32) The traditional use of Fridays and the day prior to vacation days as exam days be re-established.
33) The faculty (through reapportioned lecture funds) make specific use of the extra-curricular events on campus.
34) The faculty adopt a style manual.
35) The Library Committee study the problem of theft of library books.
36) The administration take the lead in the early implementation of these recommendations.

by GINGER KURAPKA

Although attending an economics seminar might not seem like the average person's idea of a great way to spend three weeks of their summer, Dr. Mike Malone, Associate Professor of Economics, says he enjoyed the experience.

"It was a good way to cover some contemporary economic issues," he said, "and Chicago turned out to be a great city."

The seminar, titled "Recent Developments in Applied Economics" was organized by the Graduate School of Business at the University of Chicago. Malone was one of about 40 economics professors nominated from colleges across the country. "There was no obvious characteristic or criterion," Malone stated. "We were from large, medium, and small colleges, widely dispersed geographically."

Although Malone mentioned that he went out every night, he also says "It (the seminar) was very useful, particularly in terms of labor and international economics." His International Economics course was revised this fall as a result of the seminar.

Courses were held on The Monetary Aspects of International Economics, the Economics of Information, the New Economic History, and Industrial Relations. Lecturers came from the business and economics departments at Chicago. The University of Chicago library was available for participants' use, and, according to Malone, "it's just incredible."

"The surroundings were very comfortable and everything was very well planned," Malone concludes "It was a first class operation."

Report Reaction

Young goes on to say that campus fraternities, which the report say might not be contributing to the academic atmosphere desired, actually do many things for the good of the College and the community.

Maxcy agrees that "some of (the fraternities and sororities on campus) need more publicity for the good things they are doing. It's a little unfair, but they often receive blame for things because they are the most visible, most identifiable groups on campus."

"I think there is a feeling among the faculty that the fraternities and sororities are anti-intellectual," Kelley adds. "The faculty has made a commitment to be here, and they want the students to want to learn, but unfortunately they feel the students don't want to play by even the smallest set of rules. I hope that there are opportunities for faculty members to talk to student groups more often this year," she says.

Maxcy says that what the College and the faculty would like to see is "self-restraint" on the part of the students. "We need an atmosphere," he says, "that a community of learners can operate in."

Kelley and Maxcy, along with other administrators, are scheduled to report to the faculty at its October meeting on the progress of the report's recommendations to date.

greater security. "Increased security on campus is a need we (she and Associate Dean of Students Ed Maxcy) both feel strongly about."

"We need to control the people going in and out of the dormitories," Maxcy says. He goes on to say that in a meeting with Resident Assistants and Orientation Leaders held before school started, "students seemed excited about helping to solve the problem) in a positive way."

Student Government Association President Jay Young says that he disagrees with a basic part of the report: "It treats a symptom of the problem, alcohol, as the problem itself. I agree with the general emphasis of the report, but not necessarily with the specific recommendations as to how these problems can be solved."

Crew

Beard takes gold medal in Nationals

The following article on Washington College sophomore Betsy Beard appeared in the KENT COUNTY NEWS, August 15

"I was always the littlest kid in school," eighteen year old Betsy Beard said last week. "That's why I do what I do."

Specifically, what she does is collect medals for her ability to direct four and eight man crews of oarsmen, a skill that took her to Detroit to grab the gold metal in the National Rowing Association Championships in June, and to Belgium for silver with the United States Junior team in July.

Her interest in crew began in 1976, when the 4'11" 95 pound Chestertown reisdent began her career as a coxswain while a freshman at St. Andrew's School in Middletown, Delaware. The successful season put in by her team ended that year when the squad brought the Stotesbury Cup back to Middletown after topping forty prep schools in the Schulykill River Regatta.

Her next two seasons at St Andrew's were not as successful, Betsy said, but when she was accepted at Washington College under its early admissions program, she moved into the coxswain slot for the WC men, rowing to a five win, three loss season record.

Early summer of 1979 found Betsy eyeing the National Championships in Detroit as she trained in Philadelphis with the twentyseven member College Boat Club at the University of PennsylVania.

"The College Boat Club is made up of best of Penn's women's crew and the best from other colleges working together in an effort to win the national championships," Betsy explained.

Traveling to Detroit with the Philadelphia Club, Betsy was coxswain for the senior women's four boat, as they easily defeated Pioneer Valley Rowing Association and the University of Washington.

Gold medal in hand, Betsy stayed in Detroit for a special camp designed to select the national team that would represent the U.S. in international competition in Belgium.

Selected for a slot on the junior national team, Betsy traveled to Northfield school in Northfield, Massachusetts for an intensive three week training session prior to the July trip to Europe.

Basing the training at Hazelwink Sports Center outside of Brussels, both the U.S. men's and Women's temas competed in two regatas, Betsy said.

Although rowing as a junior, Betsy's boat entered the Copenhagen International Regatta on July 21 under the "elite" or most competitive category, and finished a respectable second after the two days of stiff competition from the Dutch boat.

Returning to Hazelwink after the Copenhagen Regatta, the team put in more hours of intensive training to prepare for the Hazelwink Golden Rowing Regatta, scheduled for July 28 and 29. Again, the Dutch proved themselves to be the downfall of the USA squad, topping the Americans after two days of competition.

Returning to Kent COunty, Betsy is looking forward to "Coxing" the Washington College men's crew this fall while she keeps her eye on the 1980 National Championships.

Olympic ambitions? Of course, Betsy said. The display case that holds her gold medal has plenty of poom left, she concluded, with a smile.

Volleyball

Fall calls for more support

by CYNTHIA GRADY

With a 1978 season of 20-11 behind her, Coach Penny Fall is in the process of rebuilding her women's volleyball team.

Barring the illnesses and injuries that plagued last year's team, Fall believes that, with her strong nucleus of seniors, she will have a product worthy of both college and community attention.

"Most people do not understand that power volleyball is not recreational volleyball," said Fall. "It takes tremendous reflexes, coordination, brains, and a willingness to work."

The lack of support, however, does little to dampen the girl's spirits. Fall is pleased with the team's "excellent attitude" and willingness to work.

Heading this year's team is Tammy Schauber, the senior captain. With what Fall calls "good court sense", Schaubcr is expected to lead the way in the upcoming season.

Following Schauber are returning seniors Mandy Scherer, Joan Burri, Darleen Coleman, and juniors Sue Bennett and Julie Wheeler. Rounding out the veteran players are Cheryl Loss and Jennifer Ahonen.

The three freshmen on the team "look like they'll be able to contribute", says Fall, "but there's a big difference between high school and college volleyball."

Approximately 45 matches are scheduled for this season, the first home game being at 6:30, September 21, against Towson State University. Fall encourages students and faculty to come out and support the girls.

"Washington College's women's athletics is not given nearly enough support by school or community", says Fall. "If people would come over and take a look at the product we're offering, they'd be surprised."

Three graduates accept jobs

Three 1979 graduates of Washington College — Verna Wilkins, Tad Jacks, and Roger Rebetsky — have recently accepted jobs in three different parts of the country.

Wilkins, 1978-79 editor of the Pegasus has accepted a position with Senator Richard Stone (Democrat, Florida). Starting Labor Day, Wilkins will serve as assistant to Stone's press secretary at his Capitol Hill Office.

Jacks, who was active in the Student Government Association and the Coffee House here, will be an admissions counselor and athletic recruitment coordinator at Eckerd College in St. Petersburg, Florida. Jacks will work in the New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland areas.

Rebetsky has been appointed to the creative staff of Schoenback/Silbert Advertising, Incorporated of Baltimore. While a student at Washington, Rebetsky was editor of both the ELM and The Washington College Review.

Veteran Squad Returning For Athey

Courtesy of Kent County News

Forty-three soccer candidates reported to head coach Edward L. Athey Saturday as Washington College prepared for its 34th season in the sport.

Athey has a veteran team returning despite the losses of center halfback Matt Wagner, forwards Tom Viscount and Bill Hamill and goaltender Sam Powers. The Shoremen were 10-2-5 last year, deadlocking in a pair of contests.

Fullbacks Dan Hudson, Curt Nass, John Lonquest, Dave Bate and Ben Tuckerman anchor a solid back line. Chris Kiefer is back in the goal. Sophomore Shawn Harmon, a fullback, is recovering from minor injuries suffered in a car accident and will return for workouts in a couple of weeks.

Pete Hamill, Lee Einwaechter, Tom Kohlerman, Ron Wright and Dave Fitzsimmons will vie for the three halfback roles.

On the forward wall high-scoring sophomore V.J. Filliben (11 goals, 7 assists), Tom Vack (6 goals), Ken Maher (4 goals, 1 assist), Nelson Einwaechter (5 goals, 1 assist) and Bernie Kelly are experienced players.

Tom Bowman and Ron Athey will assist Athey. The coaching staff is high on a number of freshmen including linemen Mark Mullican and Dace Hastings, halfbacks Bill Bounds and John Hopley.

Freshman Glen Gillin will dive into college soccer this year after a successful high school career at Aberdeen

Dave Hastings is the son of the late Turner Hastings, a Washington College star soccer-baseball player and player-coach in 1948 when the Shoremen were 8-0-0. Hastings had a try-out for the U.S. Olympic team. He was killed in a tragic plane crash following a New England ski trip.

Bill Bounds is Tom Bounds son. Tommy Bounds was an outstanding baseball player and a member of the soccer team here (1952-55).

The Shore varsity will meet an alumni aggregation on Kibler Field Saturday at 1:30 p.m.

Washington College will host the second annual Chester River Invitational Soccer Tournament here Thursday, Friday and Saturday, September 6-8. The tourney will also include Drexel University, Western Maryland College and Washington and Lee University.

The Shoremen will play a 19-game schedule, which includes a second tournament. On Friday, September 14 the Atheyman will journey to Wilson, N.C. to play in the Atlantic Christian College Invitational, also a four-team tournament.

Edward L. Athey is in his 29th season as head coach of soccer on the hill. He coached a two-year period 1949-50, then returned to the heim in 1953 and has been at the pilot's seat since. His teams have won 196 games, lost 98 and have played to 33 ties.

Athey was a star athlete at Washington College. World War II interrupted a baseball career, but he returned in 1946 to also play football. He was a soccer player at Frostburg State Teachers before the war, but never played a game of soccer here.

Henry W. Carrington coached Washington College's first soccer team to a 4-0-3 record in 1946, when Athey, a senior, quarterbacked the Shore football team coached by George Ekaitis.

Wakelyn: in search of the liberal arts curriculum.

Wakelyn speaks at 198th Fall Convocation

by PETE TURCHI
News Editor

Former Washington College history professor Dr. Jon Wakelyn spoke at the school's 1979 Fall Convocation Tuesday morning.

Wakelyn spoke to approximately 40 faculty members and 110 students on "Whatever Happened to the Liberal Arts Curriculum?" The lecture traced the history of the liberal arts in the United States from the 1700's.

Originally, Wakelyn said, there were no courses, but a main core of study for each year. King's College, now Columbia University, changed this tradition when it offered courses in practical training, but it lost students. Schools which offered irrelevant subjects such as Latin and early literature still attracted those people interested in higher education.

It wasn't until the late Nineteenth Century that business called for specialized training. Serious professors, no longer solely members of the clergy, were not interested in undergraduates and, according to Wakelyn, "did not take this (the undergraduates') education seriously."

By the turn of the Century even the Ivy League schools realized that courses like Latin were irrelevant to modern society. Instead, students had to be "exposed to the moral and political values of society," Wakelyn said. "Students demanded relevant courses."

The watering—down of liberal arts courses and the increase in job—oriented courses made a mockery of some of America's educational institutions. Finally, in the 1970's professional educators have realized that the liberal arts curriculum barely survived. Liberal arts schools dropped business departments in an effort to mend their ways, and, in turn, business students became opposed to liberal arts.

In conclusion, Wakelyn said that Harvard Universities' new curriculum, which says that education cannot be departmentalized and students should be taught how to learn, is a sign that there is hope for the rejuvenation of the Liberal Arts. "Although we know that there is something drastically wrong with the liberal arts curriculum," Wakelyn added, "we lack the insight to correct it. Whatever happened to the Liberal Arts curriculum? We did."

PACE to offer 10 non-credit courses

Continuing education arrives at WC

by KATHERINE STRECKFUS
Assistant Editor

"All over the country, the average age of people who want education is going up. People who are older are anxious to keep learning." According to Dean of the College Garry E. Clarke, that is why the College has established the Program for Adult Continuing Education (PACE), scheduled to begin September 24.

A second reason for the program is "to create a positive feeling in the community about the College," Clarke said.

According to PACE Director Anne Hoon, "By the mid 1980's, about 40% of college students (in the nation) will be adults of 24 and up." In addition, she said that "since 1950, the number of adults taking college courses has doubled from 8 million to 17.5 million."

The program offers a range of 10 non-credit courses, with a fee of $50 per course. Most of the classes will be held one evening a week for eight weeks, with the exception of one course that will be held during lunch hour.

Clarke said that the courses will be non-credit to promote an informal atmosphere.

Hoon has received "lots of inquiries but not too much actual signing up." She added, however, that she hopes registrations will increase now that Labor Day has passed.

Full-time students at the College are welcome to participate, Hoon said, but

Clause creates stir at first faculty meeting

by GEOFF GARINTHER
Editor-in-Chief

A clause added to the Faculty Handbook providing for the termination of tenured professors because of "financial exigencies" caused a heated discussion at the first faculty meeting of the year Tuesday.

The clause, passed by the Board of Visitors and Governors in an executive session last February reads: "In addition to the above provisions, a tenured faculty member's contract may be terminated by Washington College because of financial exigency."

According to College President Joseph McLain, the statement was added to protect Washington from the legal problems that plagued Goucher College recently when it attempted to eliminate the positions of tenured professors. A judge found for Goucher, but said the decision would have been made

Fall Break extended

Fall Break has been extended a day because, according to Dean of the College Garry Clarke, "This will give students a long weekend and give us more balance between Monday-Wednesday-Friday classes and Tuesday-Thursday classes."

The Break was originally scheduled for October 18-21, giving students Thursday and Friday off from classes. The break will now extend to that Monday, October 22.

Washington vs. Catholic U.

Wakelyn compares schools, curriculums

by PETE TURCHI
News Editor

"I still believe that a small school offers the best education you can get," says Dr Jon Wakelyn, former professor of history at Washington College.

Wakelyn returned to the school to speak at the 198th convocation ceremonies held Tuesday. "I loved teaching here," he said. Wakelyn left the College in 1970 after four years of teaching and went to Catholic University, where he teaches now.

"I left because I'm a city person, and I thought I would have a better opportunity to teach and do research at the same time in Washington D.C.," he continued. "I had pretty good students here, and I liked them. But in terms of being able to have an exchange with historians and discussing each other's work, Catholic University has been much more rewarding than Washington."

While C.U. has 2500 undergraduates and 5000 graduate students, it is not considered a large university; it is, in fact the smallest university in Washington. Nonetheless, Wakelyn said that there are more "personal relationships and bonds" that are made in a small school like Washington than in a school the size of C.U.

"On the other hand," he said, "At Catholic University you have variety; students can select from more courses. With more students there is more of a chance to learn about different walks of life. Also, in an urban setting like Washington you can hop on the subway and be at the National Gallery in five minutes. A senior doing a research paper can go to the Library of Congress."

One of the biggest problems that Wakelyn first noticed after moving to C.U. was that classes were larger, and because of this most teachers simply lectured. Wakelyn said that at a larger school "faculty members were and are prone to trying to entertain students. It's a lot easier for teachers to lecture, but in my opinion you aren't getting your money's worth. The education is in the exchange. That decision of whether or not to lecture is up to the teacher, because students would prefer to sit back and be told what they need to know."

With the passing of time, and as Dean of the undergraduate school at Catholic University a few years ago, Wakelyn said that he began to notice that "there is much more professional fear among

editorial

In keeping with the recommendation of the faculty committee on vandalism, SGA President Jay Young announces elsewhere in this week's ELM the formation of a new committee to reform the Student Judiciary Board. But even before that committee discusses any possible revisions, a more basic question needs to be answered: can Washington College continue to support a Student Judiciary Board?

Events of last year indicate that this is a real question. Penalties handed down from the SJB last year ranged from a $7.00 fine for shooting bottle rockets toward a crowd and 6 hours of cafeteria work for setting off firecrackers at a dance to a $200 fine (including $50 in damages) and disciplinary probation for two students who were found guilty of knocking in ceiling tiles. After one trial late last semester, in which two students received a small fine for alledgedly turning over a soda machine, one juror told an ELM reporter: "We didn't have enough evidence to decide, but we thought they had something to do with it."

Inequities like these may require a stronger solution than reformation of the Board. Jurors are picked at random and have no precedent in handing down sentences. Witnesses are often reluctant to testify because they fear the recrimination of the defendants. In a population of only 700, students may know one another too well to testify objectively against and pass judgement upon fellow students.

The alternative is to admit that it is indeed too much for us and pass the buck to the administration—an alternative that will be less than appealing to students because it takes away a freedom to which we have grown accustomed. That, however, is the choice to be made. Either we give up the freedom of the SJB or we accept it and its accompanying responsibilities.

Weight reduction program offered

Health and Counseling Service

Many students return to college with "New Year's Resolutions": to keep reasonable hours, to keep up with class assignments and reading, to eExercise, to lose weight, etc. To help students with some of these personal goals, the College Health Service and Counseling Service will offer a weight reduction program.

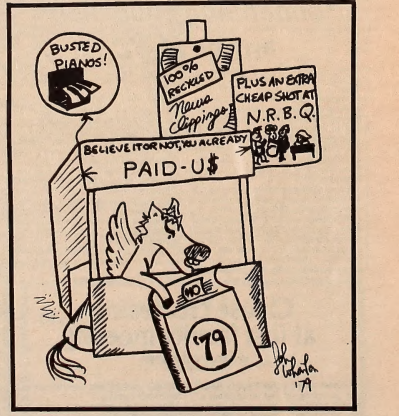
This program, open to all students, staff, and faculty, will focus on changing eating habits to lose weight. Once participants reach their desired weight, they will have developed eating habits appropriate to maintaining their weight at this level. Participants will be required to attend one 45-minute and one 5-minute meeting each week.

An orientation and planning meeting will be held Monday, September 10 at 3:30 p.m. in Rm 7, Bill Smith basement to discuss the program in more detail. Weekly meetings will be scheduled during the day, at a time which will accommodate the majority of participants. If you can not attend the Monday meeting, but are interested in participating, call Dr. Bonnie Michaelson, ext. 289.

SGA Forum

SGA expands committees, social calendar

The Student Government Association is off to a great start this year with the establishment of several new committees and what we hope will be a much more extensive and entertaining social calendar. Among the new committees are: a committee to reform the Student Judiciary Board; a committee to discuss and answer the Faculty Report on Vandalism, Violence and Theft; and a committee to revise the SGA Constitution. Tim Connor and Ann Dorsey are co-chairing the reform of the Judiciary. We are in the process of conducting a survey of colleges similar to Washington to determine what structure and procedure they are using and how much success they are having with their student judiciaries. We then hope to hold discussions to evaluate their systems and implement what will be most effective for us. If anyone is interested in participating on this committee, please contact Ann or Tim.



David Fitsimons is leading the Committee to Answer the Faculty Report on Vandalism, Violence and Theft. While it is our opinion that the ends which the faculty hopes to achieve are very much worth striving for, there could perhaps be better ways of meeting those goals than those recommended in the report; for this reason, the SGA Committee hopes to hold extensive discussions between the Administration, faculty, and students in an effort to work out mutually agreeable ways to improve Washington College. This report could have a tremendous impact on student life at W.C., so it is very important that anyone who wishes to take part in the discussions do so. If you are interested, please contact Dave.

The Committee to reform the SGA Constitution will begin its work following the senate elections on September 19.

So far we have planned a diverse and busy social schedule through October.

Sept. 7—Dance featuring Brandy Dance Band
Sept. 14—Rocky Horror Picture Show
Sept. 15—Orioles vs. Red Sox Bus Trip
Sept. 16—River Day Raft Races
Sept. 18—SGA Senate Elections
Sept. 22—Dance featuring Freewater Country Rock Band
Sept. 24—First SGA Meeting
Sept. 29—B.U.S.H. Landscaping Day
Sept. 29—Bluegrass Country Rock Festival and Outdoor Picnic

Seidman steps in for Day

by BONNIE NELLE DUNCAN

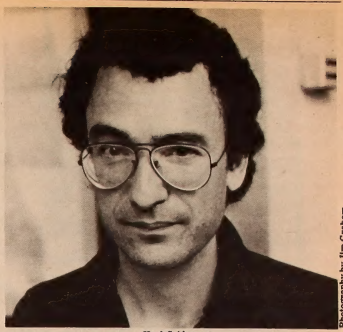
"Whenever I'm in New York, I go to an ashram. That's a holy place where all kinds of people gather to meditate, and because so many people meet there, the place is filled with incredible creative energy. The same principle works here, and—I'm serious now—that is why you should never miss a class." The speaker was Assistant Professor of English Hugh Seidman, explaining his "no-cut" policy to his Advanced Creative Writing Workshop. Granted, not in the usual manner, but then, Seidman, taking over three creative writing workshops for Professor Robert Day who is on leave this semester to finish a volume of short stories, is not a very usual teacher.

Take his academic credentials, for example. Everything in his undergraduate background, as well as much of his post-graduate background, indicates that this man should be diligently working in a laboratory somewhere perfecting computers or building better napalm bombs, rather than authoring prize-winning volumes of poetry. Seidman graduated from the Polytechnic Institute of Brooklyn with a Bachelor of Science Degree for a major in Mathematics and a minor in Physics. In the Masters Program at the University of Minnesota, which h.e completed in 1964, Seidman majored in Physics and minored in Mathematics.

The next phase of Seidman's education saw him as a student in the computer program at Columbia University, and he worked for a while as a computer programmer before he got a scholarship at the School of Arts at Columbia. He completed the University's Master long enough to grow tired of them.

The author of two books, Collecting Evidence (Yale, 1970), winner of the Yale Series of Younger Poets Prize; and Blood Lord, (Doubleday, 1974), Seidman owes his inspiration know."

Like Zukofsky, he uses his poems to express strong, often violent images within a langistically economic framework.



The native New Yorker, who says that "Chestertown will be like a vacation to me," but who adds, "I love New York, it's not too big, it's my home town," allows his background to come forth in much of his writing. The following poem, "The Last American Dream" is from Collecting Evidence:

The black physicist knows the distances from Newark to precisions of the lawns of Princeton

In previous years you could have seen the Great Man or the Vassar librarian who knew the Picassos in Oppenheimer's house.

He wasted half his life searching for the unified field and when he lectured the blackboards were shellacked to save his chalked equations

Scientist of poetry they're burning Newark and when she went away
I turned in my sleep and the deepest synapse of my brain sparked and broke

Kathie Clemson, Junior, Gibson Island.
"I think they were very unfair to the sororities and fraternities. They have some good pictures, but a lot of them look like they were leftover from last year."

Tom Wright, Sophomore, Rockford, Ill.
"It's all right. It's nothing really special. I like the coverage of the sports except I think there should be more coverage on soccer. More on student life is needed."

Becca Fincher, Sophomore, Towson, Md.
"There were a lot of things missing from it. The sororities were wrong, but in general it was OK."

Charlie Warfield, Junior, Towson, Md.
"I think it's better than last year's, but I think the pictures could be improved."

Arch Hoopes, Senior, Westchester,Pa.
"I like it a lot. I think the pictures are really good."

Becky Dossett, Freshman, Texas.
"I don't know. I haven't seen it. Otherwise, I think it's very good."

Stricker awarded Sophie Kerr Gift

by MIKE GARVEY

Julia Stricker of Annapolis was awarded the Sophie Kerr Gift in English Literature this year, a $1000 scholarship awarded annually to an entering freshman who shows promise in the field of English and American literature.

Stricker recently received the Ford K. Brown Scholarship for an autobiographical essay that she wrote while at The Key School in Annapolis. She worked on her high school newspaper, and was also Editor of the Wroxeter SchoolLiterary Magazine.

Stricker is currently enrolled in the Creative Writing section of Forms of Literature, and is turning her attention to writing poetry. The Workshop "has potential," she says, because it is teaching her to "sit down and turn something out." Most of Stricker's work has been in essays and satire. She plans to design her own major and eventually become a freelance writer.

The Sophie Kerr Gift in English Literature has been awarded annually since 1967. It is renewable for each year the recipient maintains a strong academic record. According to English Department Chairman Dr. Nancy Tatum, the recipient need not be a writer, nor is he or she required to pursue an English major once here. "We're rather flexible about that," said Tatum.

The Sophie Kerr Underwood Bequest proVides a substantial amount of funding for English Department activities and scholarships, among them the large senior prize for literary endeavor and sponsoring of guest appearances by literary figures, as well as approximately $0 percent of the English Department books for Miller Library.

students now. Then (when he taught at Washington College), the students studied without worrying about what they were going to do when they graduated. Students always thought of a liberal arts education as a practical education."

One of the biggest problems with a liberal arts education now, according to Wakelyn, is that the fear that students have concerning professional success will lead to specialization on the part of teachers. "There were no such things as departments until the 20th century," he said. "Everyone was generalized. Now I see people teach undergraduates the same grubby things that they (the teachers) are interested in for research, and that's a serious mistake. Even majoring as an undergraduate is a mistake.

"One of the things I've noticed is that there aren't many teachers now who have that desire to talk about other subjects. Norman James, Nate Smith, Garry Clarke—they were all teachers that I knew when I taught here who were very diverse in their interests. I disagreed with James over Hemingway and Faulkner, I'd argue with Smith all the time while we walked to our classes, but I thought that was fun—they obviously thought that those things were worth arguing about."

Wakelyn believes that teachers who are diverse are "priceless. Take Richard Brown," Wakelyn said. "He loves music, and even taught some music courses while I was here. Bennett Lamond taught Chaucer, but he could probably teach medievil history without batting an eye. He always did tremendous amounts of reading for his courses."

Wakelyn believes that there has been a decline in educa|on in colleges, to the point that, as he said, "In some regards today's students are cultural illiterates. I think that's a fault of the secondary schools, but the colleges should try to solve this. The way to teach is not to tell students to memorize facts, but to get students to think about the ideas."

While he has been teaching at Catholic University, Wakelyn said that he has seen this "cultural illiteracy" reflected in his own department in the fact that there are fewer history students now then there were when he began teaching. "History is not as significant to a student's education as it once was. Our society isn't interested in the past," he said. "Look what happened at the Bicentennial—no one cared, nobody showed up. More and more I'm afraid," he added wistfully, "that history is getting the dullest students."

Focus on photography

Operating your instamatic

by RICK ADELBERG

This article is the first in a series that will discuss fundamental techniques of photography.

The pocket instamatic is beyond doubt the simplest camera to use. A few basic rules can increase enjoyment and produce quality results.

The film is packaged in a cartridge—simply open the back of the camera and drop it in. There are no complex mechanics to bother with—no focus knobs, shutter speeds, or lens apertures.

The plastic lens must be kept clean to prevent scratching and produce the clearest picture possible. A lens tissue will clean off finger prints and dust.

Another tip for clear photos is to stand at a distance of 6 to 15 feet from the subject. Outside of those boundaries, distoration is likely to result. When a flashcube is used, always indoors, a 6 to 12 feet distance is generally best.

In humid summer weather, keeping the film as cold as possible is a must. Heat causes shifting in color.

Finally, get the film developed as quickly as possible. The images will fade with time. Three months is the absolute limit.

Next week: Types of film for instamatic cameras.

Animal House behavior is nationwide

While University students may think Animal House behavior is good fun, college officials are growing concerned about the increased Violence and rowdy behavior caused by the movie.

"Toga Parties" and food fights have become more common in college dormitories, fraternities, and sororities.

As a result, a growing number of fraternities have been put on probation or thrown off campus at American colleges.

At the University of Missouri, Delta Upsilon fraternity has been investigated by the school for a rowdy Little Sister party and a later toga party at a resort area.

According to a campus Publication, students at the toga party had to remove their underwear in front of other students and put them in the "sacred underwear pile."

Female students had to kiss a "rubber tree" decorated with condoms. "Sacred Toilet Water" was consumed by guests from condoms. Students say the entrance to the party was a large-scale reproduction of a vagina.

The University of Texas-Austin has drawn national attention for the irreverent stunts of its students. But fraternity pranks there have upset neighbors of Greektown and have resulted in criminal charges and civil suits.

The New York Times reports that a student has sued members of Alpha Tau Omega fraternity for $1.1 million after he was allegdly abducted, beaten, robbed, and sexually assaulted by fraternity members. Three fraternity members have been charged with assault and have pleaded not guilty.

The national Alpha Tau Omega fraternity has placed the Austin chapter on probation.

A group of Austin neighbors have banded together to form Save University Neighborhoods, largely to fight what they see as lawless and drunken behavior of fraternity members.

Betty Philips, president of the group, told the Times "I have just spoke to three people who said they are going to move because of the situation. To me, that is when cumulative nuisances become a menance."

At Duke University, a massive food fight caused $3000 damage to a dormitory cafeteria and closed the facility for a week. The event was provoked by a scene in Animal House where Bluto, played by actor John Belushi, calls out for a food fight, and all hell breaks loose.

Another incident reported by the Times was the alledged beating of 18 pledges by Omega Psi Phi Fraternity. members at the University of Florida. Th.e incident was more of a traditional hazing problem than an Animal House stunt.

At the University of Massachusetts, police arrested 29 students, answered 180 emergency calls and reported $15,000 in damages by vandals during one 57-hour spree of student drinking and partying.

While the trend toward more pranks and college mischief is alarming for college law enforcement officials, so far the penalties have been limited to fraternities on each campus which occasionally get carried away.

But college officials may have to return to the early 60s style of in-loco discipline--the discipline that the boys of Animal House rebeled against in the movie.

One midwestern college official reportedly told fraternity and sorority leaders at a meeting that, "If I could, I would take a bulldozer and level Greektown."

It is doubtful that frustrated college administrators will ever go that far.

Tom Cousineau

Cousineau tries "other side of the podium"

by VIRGINIA KURAPKA

"The experience of being on the other side of the podium after ten years was eye--opening. I hope my students will benefit from what I discovered," said Dr. Thomas Cousineau, Assistant Professor of English, after participating in an eight--week seminar at Hofstra University in New York this summer. The seminar was made available to him by the National Endowment for the Humanities.

Led by Edith Kern, Professor of English and Comparative Literature at Hofstra, the seminar involved meetings to discuss the interrelationship of modern literature and philosophy and individual research. The group of twelve professors of modern languages, English literature, and Philosophy from all over the U.S. also studied modern philosophers such as Kirkegaard and Sartre, and the appearance of modern philosophical ideas in the literary works of such authors as Kafka and Beckett. "That part (of the seminar) was very exciting because the discussions were very spirited", Cousineau said.

Pursuing a personal interest, he also reread the works of philosopher Jacques Maritain, a contemporary interpreter of Saint Thomas Aquinas. "I also wanted to do work on Beckett", he said, "and Kern is a distinguished Beckett Scholar." He wrote an essay that will be submitted for publication to a scholarly journal.

Summer Conferences gross $180,000 for College

by BONNIE NELLE DUNCAN

Washington College didn't re-open for business this week with the beginning of classes. In fact, it never shut down.

When the school year ended for 750 students and faculty members not employed in the College's June-through-August Graduate Program, the work was just beginning for college administrators and food service and maintenance staffs involved in the Summer Conference Program. The College's facilities were booked solid through August 12 with the over 2000 members of organizations, institutes, and clinics taking advantage of Washington College and its Eastern Shore setting for their summer conventions.

Washington College grossed approximately $180,000 from the Summer Conference Program, up from slightly over $100,000 for the 1978 season. "Having people use our facilities in the summer covers the overhead on utilities that would otherwise have to be passed on to the students," according to Vice President for Finance Gene Hessey. "Aside from the revenue, the program is a great deal for the College in terms of making people aware of who we are, and what we are all about."

What Coordinator for Campus Events Bedford Groves described as a "record season ever," began May 21 when delegates from 20 chapters of the Maryland League of Women Voters met here for that group's 44th state convention to elect officers, approve a budget and by-law changes, and determine the direction of State League study for the next two years. In addition, participants toured historic buildings in Chestertown and learned about water quality control aboard a water monitoring boat. A combination tour focusing on the preservation of agricultural lands and on the conservation of the Chesapeake Bay ecosystem was offered as well as a media workshop. The three day conference was highlighted May 22 when Maryland Governor Harry Hughes, speaking before 200 men and women asked the LWV to help educate the public about the need to reform the state's "archaic" prison system and to support his community corrections program.

The Maryland Institute of Alcoholism and Drug Abuse Studies in cooperation with the Department of Health and Mental Hygiene held its first training program of 20 one-week, 33 hour courses for new and experienced counselors, nurses, social workers, clergy men, health professionals, supervisors, program directors, administrators, coordinators, and concerned citizens from June through July. In addition to offering courses ranging from "Highway Safety" to "The Pharmacology of Substance Abuse" to "Counseling the Suicidal Patience," the Institute sponsored the first annual Youth Leadership Seminar on Alcohol and Drugs here in conjunction with the Baltimore City Bureau of Recreation, the Baltimore Chapter of the NAACP, and Baltimore City high schools. Other conferences were also held by Al-Anon (June 8-10) and the Mental Health Administration (June 22-23).

The Maryland Cooperative Extension Homemakers Council held College Days June 20-22. This year's program emphasized the theme "Take an Education Break," and offered a wide variety of adult education classes including "Public Speaking," "Eating for Health," "Figure Flattering Dressing," "Assertiveness Training," "Death Education," "Kitchen Cosmetics," and "Antiques and Collectibles."

The Extension Service offered similar College Days at four locations in Maryland in June, but the program at Washington College had the most participants, according to the College's Vice President for Finance. The program was followed by the June 22-23 weekend convention of the Rules Committee of the Maryland Courts.

The College also hosted Maryland Girls State, a program for outstanding young women who have completed their third year of high school. The one-week training session affords the girls the opportunity to learn about the duties, responsibilities, and privileges of citizenship by allowing the students to participate in a two-party government system and run for offices in various forms of government at the city, county, or state level in mock elections. Girls State is a program of the American Legion, nationwide, and is co-sponsored on local levels, by the women auxiliary groups of a number of organizations, including the Jaycees, Moose, and Veterans of Foreign Wars.

For six weeks, Washington College hosted the Perry Gymnastics and Wrestling Clinics for Boys and Girls age 6 to 16. The conference schedule was completed when delegates from the Maryland State Association of DeMolay Chapters met here for their annual Conclave. The DeMolay, the youth branch of the Masons, is comprised of boys age 13 to 20 and is the world's only international youth fraternity. Some members of the organization's female counterparts, Job's Daughters and The Rainbow Girls were also on campus for the August 10 through 12 event.

Washington College began occasionally to open the campus to area church groups for summer meetings about nine years ago. In the last three years, however, the College's summer facilities have become so popular that rarely a day goes by from Commencement until just two weeks before classes start for undergraduates when some group is not on campus.

"We don't have to go out and seek groups," commented Hessy. "Recruitment comes from word of mouth from people who have been here before." For example, the Mental Health Administration was held here for the first time after some of the administrators had attended other conferences here. Several faculty wives and other area residents are members of the League of Women Voters that met at the College, and the DeMolay Conclave, meeting here for the second year, was chaired by Randy Watson, a senior Political Science major at the College.

A number of groups have been coming back to Washington College for years, including the Alcohol and Drug Abuse institute (twice as large this year as in 1978). Girls State (with a record turnout), and The Perry Clinics (which has already requested an additional week next summer.) "We get super compliments on the services we provide for the conferences," Hessey said, "and many people would rather come here to the Shore than go to a hotel in Baltimore or Washington for their summer conventions." Hessey also believes "our nominal costs serve the motives of the groups."

A look at PEGASUS

by NICK NAPPO
Fine Arts Editor

I have in front of me two Washington College yearbooks. One is labeled Pegasus Seventy Nine, freshly broken out of its box and handed to me yesterday. The other is the Pegasus from 1931. I would compare the two, let them race, but I do not think it would be fair.

The newer book's cover alone would be a handicap in any competition with the older. The '31 cover, which is deeply embossed, shows a rearing stallion with high, scythe-like wings curving above its back. I am not even sure the newer book is a Pegasus, with its round textbook-cover illustration of hazy faces. The label tells me it is, though it might just have easily read Lizard Seventy Nine, or better, Introduction To Sociology.

But it is inside where the newer book would really lose ground. Before each section or feature the '31 book presents a woodcut outlining an appropriate figure against a watercolor of the Pegasus rising. The Pegasus Seventy Nine makes no such introductions. But then it has many more features. Like the two-page reproduction of the Elm article (which was a reproduction of a Chronicle of Higher Education article) about a nationwide student's poll. Or the Elm article—an original, this—about Vice President for Development George Hayward discussing the Birthday Ball's future. Or the anonymous, page-long vow to publish the Crab next year.

It is a good thing I am not pitting the two books against one another. It would not be fair.

In a section titled simply "The School," the older book prints 8 full-page pencil sketches of the campus, followed by a "History of Washington College." The reader of the newer book must piece together the outlines of the College in backgrounds. Just as there is no Pegasus in the new Pegasus, neither is there a sense of place. Nor a sense of history. Nor a foreword, nor a table of contents.

The '79 Pegasus is strong in sports, seniors and teachers. The quotations from individual players, placed below their pictures, and the team records superimposed on action shots made the section orderly and attractive. Senior pictures are of a good size and clarity, and each two-page spread is nicely broken up by a boxed 'outside' picture. The size variations of the faculty photos engage the eye.

There is another area not so easily covered with mug shots and sports photos. Like a novel, the yearbook is different to each person who looks into it; each keys on what is special to his experience. An editor is hard-pressed to provide this personal touch for so many people, especially when he or she has opted for a look that lacks the structure and aesthetic sense to make it special in itself, as is the case of the '79 Pegasus. Editor Verna Wilkins' strategy was apparently to throw in everything she could get her hands on. So there are pictures—a lot of pictures, many of them Elm reruns, and none in any particular order.

I must confess that my favorite, most personal thing in the book is a misprint. A friend of mine used to do an impersonation of a certain College official introducing John Barth (author of Chimera), who spoke here last year. "Ladies and Gentleman," the routine went, "it is my great privilege to introduce to you...Donald Barth." Or Sam Barth or Robert Barth; anything but John Barth. So you can imagine my pleasure when I saw, under Barth's Pegasus picture, not "Author John Barth" but instead, "Arthur John Barth." Now that is something I will remember. Along, of course, with the pictures of my particular set of Senior best friends: Dave Citrenbaum, Joe Reggimenti, Scott Sadoff.

The 1931 Pegasus is dedicated "To The Young Men." It reads as follows: "To the young men of this generation, in this country and throughout the world, who, like Bellerophon, are attempting to ride Pegasus heavenward, to these young fools the 1931 Pegasus is dedicated." No dedication appears in the newer book.

Bellerophon, as you know, was the hero of Greek legend who tamed the winged horse Pegasus with a bridle given him by Athena. He used the horse to fight the Chimera, a grotesque beast with the head of a lion, the body of a goat, and the tail of a dragon. Later he angered the gods by trying to fly up to heaven, and was thrown from Pegasus and lamed.

Pegasus Seventy Nine is a good book. With time, it will be a better one. But for some reason—perhaps because they were afraid of falling on their faces—its editors did not risk making it a great book, one able to catch and keep pace with its older counterpart down the stretch of years.

Clause creates stir at first faculty meeting easier if the school had cited "financial exigency" in writing as a reason for the termination of tenured professor's positions.

McLain said that the Board had simply put in writing what until now had been an unwritten rule.

"The AAUP (Association of American University Professors) has always recognized the right of an institution to make a choice — bitter though it may be — to save an institution," said McLain after the meeting.

Several professors, however, objected to the Board's failure to consult with the faculty before adding the clause. Math Department Chairman Richard Brown, the most vocal faculty member during the meeting, said later "My feeling is that they (the Board) feel that what they did was for our good, but they didn't ask us if we thought it was for our good, and I think they should have."

History Department Chairman Nate Smith, who served as the faculty's representative to the Board last year, said after the meeting that "Legally, the by-laws in the faculty handbook are essentially administrative rules and information. It really is their (the administration's) handbook for the faculty. But this one section is not. If they modified it, and the Board didn't vote on it, then it's really not legal."

Smith added that the addition of the clause "doesn't resolve the problem. Since it wasn't already in there, to suddenly put it in sounds like they are getting ready to do something they haven't done before."

McLain, who told the faculty, "I must confess that I had no idea that this would alarm anybody," asked English Department Chairperson Nancy Tatum to chair a committee that will write to the Board to the faculty's disapproval.

"We would like the message that goes to the Board to voice convey our interest in spelling out the terms of the agreement," Tatum said to McLain at the meeting. "We're not going to try to tell you what to do, but we would like to know what basic principle will be followed."

A year abroad

Mowbray goes to Oxford

by CLAIRE MOWBRAY

I get off the bus on the High Street in Oxford. Walk down the steps, then up the sidewalk toward town center; my Woolworth's carrier bag shifting lightly in my hot hand this summer morning, my face set in the tense, almost angry look I save for walking through town. I am not used to cities, but I know Oxford now enough to know that if you look lost someone will ask you for money, and if you look happy, someone will comment, loudly, from a stone step, a park bench, from a group of punk rockers beside a phone box. I put the customary frown between my eyes, and walk fast.

Not everyone does. Ahead of me, eight or ten student-age kids are moving slowly, in a group, with Carfax. They slide their feet along, frequently stop to stare in shop windows, talk and laugh loudly among themselves, and move in a casual, leisurely way that tells me that they have all day, or all month, and are not aware of tiny women with baskets moving impatiently behind them, the annoyed glares of businessmen, the raised eyebrows of the dusty scaffold men outside St. Mary's. I manage to slip between them and an old man in a tweed cap, keeping my eyes forward, wondering whether one of them will recognize me as I pass by. They do not. I hear someone say "God, look. Isn't it cutes?" and someone else mention something like Well, Penn State's in Pennsylvania is it really..." before I move ahead of them, out of reach of their accents, their harsh loud voices, their typical conversations.

I know who they are. In a manner of speaking. I know their Levi's jeans with the red tag on the left pocket, I know their yellow or green or red cotton shirts with the little alligator where a breast pocket should be. I know their docksider shoes with white leather laces, their brown plastic headbands, their clean, young, tanned and perfectly made-up faces, their neat moustaches, their new-looking clothes. I know their expressions, too: smug, white-toothed smiles, bright eyes, no wrinkles. They are untroubled, they are free, they are abroad for perhaps the first time, or perhaps the fifth, and they are sure of themselves. They are undoubtedly, unmistakeably, Americans. And so am I.

In the cool quiet of the O.U. Press bookstore I hear, above everything, "How does that grab you, Doris?" In a pub three rides out of London I hear a man ask for a "cream duh minth." All over Oxford I see Harvard, Yale, Princeton, Duke, on tee-shirts, on sweatshirts, on nylon jackets, and all over Oxford I pass huge groups of tourists with cameras around their necks and "Wild, Wonderful West Virginia" splashed across their all-purpose water repellant handy carryalls. And I cringe inside. I still am not sure why. When I first came to Oxford, I was like that, too: I wandered around the town with other Americans, staring at everything at the buildings, I sang out loud on the streets with my friends, talked too loud, called trousers "pants" and courgettes "zucchini", thought a cream tea was a cup of tea with cream in it. I never thought I looked or acted particulary American, perhaps because I thought everyone had Levi's and gold earrings and crepe-soled shoes; and I saw no reason to act unhappy or sedate when I felt exuberant and bouncy. But after the first few weeks of whispering to myself or shouting to my friends that we were in England, for God's sake, and after the town became not a marvel but a town where people, old people, children, dogs and derelicts walked, slept, worked, played and lived their lives, I began to notice the differences between myself and the rest of the population of Oxford. And then, slowly, I realized that I didn't want to be a tourist anymore: I wanted to fit in.

I couldn't, of course. I was branded as an American as soon as I opened my mouth, and sometimes before. My accent was mimicked and mocked by Liverpudlians, Londoners, Yorkshiremen and Irishmen; my country and my countrymen were made fun of by anyone who got the slightest opportunity. Not always maliciously, mind you, but often enough so that after a while even an innocent joke made my hackles rise. I am not aggressive in the least, but I found myself, sometimes hotly, sometimes sullenly, defending America and Americans from all sorts of vague attacks, while at the same time wishing I belonged to some other culture which wasn't so much maligned, wishing I belonged, most of all, to England, which I loved.

I loved the littleness of everything: the cars, the streets, the towns. I loved the small, slow wandering Thames, and the other rivers which would scarcely be called streams here; I loved the low-key, gentle cheerfulness of many of the people I saw around me; the unwasteful, practical ways of a country that has known hard times since long before Dickens. Dry humor, a feeling of age and long tradition, the upholding of customs and preservation of historical sites, a sense of safety and security: these were aspects of England and the English which appealed to me. And I could not understand why, when I felt I appreciated England and tried to fit into it, I should be constantly slapped in the face verbally—by those who held me in immediate contempt because I was American.

And so I tried to forestall that contempt. I bought English shoes, a European coat, tried to dress up a bit more, carried a bag or a basket with me to do my shopping. When I spoke it was quietly, with inflections and pronunciations which were as English as I could manage. I seldom went about Oxford with a group of Americans, and tried not to fall into old habits like yelling across the street to someone I knew, or laughing too loudly at a joke. Not all these modifications were conscious—some just came with time and necessity—but often I felt what was a confused mixture of guilt and determined unconcern. Guilt because I was trying to be something I was certainly not, and denying some of what I considered the most interesting aspects of my personality. Determined unconcern because I have never been an ardent patriot, often agreed with British criticisms of America, and felt that by trying to fit in I was gaining an insight much more valuable than that which I'd go home with should I close my eyes and hold tight to my American ways.

I never really did fit in, after all—certainly was never mistaken for an English girl—but by June and the end of my academic year I felt I'd learned quite alot about English culture and attitudes, and if I never really felt anonymous, I didn't feel obvious, either. It was only when my final term was over, my room at Manchester College was no longer mine, and the American summer school kids arrived and began to take over the city that I began to cringe in shame and embarrassed recognition, and feel, when I saw or heard Americans, a repulsion and a superiority that still baffles me. Perhaps it is the same barrier that divides third graders from fourth graders in elementary school, or the same childish contempt that older brothers often feel for younger sisters. There were Americans—both students and tourists—all over Oxford, and I hated them all. I avoided them, or rolled my eyes to myself at their naive comments; I would spot them from blocks away, and point them out to my English friends, who wondered, I guess, why I cared, since ther were always Americans in Oxford, and I was one of them myself. But I couldn't help it. Those squeaky-clean, bright-eyed, tanned and self-assured groups of students—even more than the visiting tourists—were usurping my territory, taking over my town, and thinking they knew England since they'd spent six weeks in Oxford. Someone had told them it would be a "tremendous learning experience" and so they's wheedled some money out of Daddy, and gone off to "do" England. The thought made me seethe.

My seething was immature as well as futile; it served only as another useless barrier between an individual and the individuals who make up a group. Through my stubborn denial of any kinship with Americans in Oxford or anywhere in England, I was probably depriving myself of at least a few interesting conversations, and perhaps friendships as well, but I couldn't help myself. My feelings of disgust and condescension continued even through the plane ride home to America, and for a while afterwards in my hometown. It was only when I began talking to old friends and familiar people in my community that the strangeness faded, and I stopped trying to hate Americans as a group.

But my experiences in England did bring me to a few conclusions, when I had time to sit down and think about them clearly. The differences between America and Britain go far beyond the superficial differences of accent and use of words: the British may be the ancestors many of us, but they arenot us any longer. And we, as visitors, tourists, students, cannot treat them as such and expect to be appreciated or respected. We come from young, rich, pampered and rapidly changing country which takes for granted many of its luxuries and advantages, and we enter, when we enter England, a small, self-contained island, civilized for centuries before America was thought of. It is a country of tradition, of quiet, of long-established ways. And whether we like it or not, we as Americans, raised amid the clamor and catcalls of Madison Avenue, amid thousands of miles of highway, amid a somehow intoxicating sense of limitless time, space and energy, do not quite fit. We are too loud for England's reverant silence, too young for her ancientness, we move too fast for her more gentle pulse. We are like children in many respects, compared to the British: like children we are often irreverent, flippant, defiant, irrepressible, vulgar, and like children we are sometimes severely reprimanded for it. But we remain—unless we seek to change ourselves—the products of our upbringings, and our upbringings, even now, produce Americans who are children, in outlook, in values and in action.

That is not to say the British are better than we are, or that they have lost a valuable sense of humor while we have retained ours. It is not to say that no Briton can appreciate Americans, nor that all Americans would be unfitted for Britain. It is simply to suggest that the things that Americans in foreign countries are disliked for could perhaps be advoided if we were more aware of the real differences between our cultures; if we left just a little bit more of our American selves behind when we left America.

My response to Americans in England after I had begun to feel almost English was, I think, a little exaggerated one. The English are far more used to tourists than most of us American are, hardly notice them except to complain of traffic tie-ups or the lack of parking places, and so probably do not react nearly as strongly to Americans—or any foreigner—as I did. And I do not claim superiority to other Americans in any sense. Yet I firmly believe that until America becomes a little more cosmopolitan in her outlook, until she realizes that the rest of the world does not exist simply for her amusement, and until Americans begin to be a little less selfcentered and a little more aware of the atmospheres of other countries, we, in spite of our money, our power and our influence, will continue to be disliked abroad, as a nation and as a people.

Official season opens today

Shoremen down alumni, 3-0

by RICH SHATZMAN

Washington College opened its unofficial soccer season last Saturday afternoon by downing the returning alumni team 3-0. The contest was much closer than the score indicated, with the alumni playing well during the first half.

Thirty-one former players returned for the game, many of whom are still very active in soccer, playing for teams in their home areas.

Coaches Ed Athey, Tom Bowman, and Ron Athey were especially pleased with the second-half play of the Shoremen squad. "Several adjustments were made in the offensive and defensive alighnment, which seemed to bring more cohesion to our play," said head coach Athey.

Goals for the maroon and black were scored by freshman newcomers Mark Mullican, sophomore Tom Vach and senior Nelson Einwaechter.

The first goal was a picture play starting with a release from the defensive goal to Pete Hammill on the left side. This caught the alumni shorthanded in n their defensive end of the field. A Hammill pass to Lee Einwaechter in the center of the field preceeded a quick pass to V.J. Filliben on the right. Filliben beat a defenseman on the dribble and passed to Ken Maher. Maher, instead of taking a wild shot, graciously dropped the ball oft to Mullican, who scored past goalie Pete Murphy. It was a beautiful piece of teamwork, something the coaches hope to see more of as the season progresses.

Tom Vach's goal was one of his patented power shots from the left side. The third goal came on a follow-up after right wing Bernie Kelley's shot was blocked and rolled in front of the goal. Nelson Einwaechter, as he has done many times before, knocked the loose ball into the net.

The Shore season continues this weekend with the Chester River Tournament held here. The four team field is rounded out with Drexel University, Western Maryland, and Washington and Lee. The Shoremen then travel to Lebanon Valley on Tuesday, Sept. 11, and Wilson NC for the Atlantic Christian Tourney held on Friday and Saturday, Sept. 14 and 15.

Therefore, this week-end will be the only time to see the '79 version of Shoremen soccer for the next few weeks. Last year WC shared the unofficial championship of the Chester River Tourney with Drexel by playing the Dragons to a 0-0 tie. With the improvement of Western Maryland and Washington and Lee, this could prove to be an exciting and talent-laden tournament. Athey said he is "looking forward to stiff competition from all these schools."

Eight turn out for Cross Country

by JOHN LAWRENCE

"I'd be foolish if I said I was optimistic" says Coach Don Chatellier on this year's prospects for Cross Country at Washington College. "I'm the supreme pessimist. I don't like to say things I don't think will happen," Chatellier remarks looking back at last years record of one win and eleven losses.

"There are people who could help, but they're not interested. There's a strong interest in running in the nation, but competition is different. We hope it's just a temporary thing, a swing of the pendulum," says Chatellier. A major problem plaquing cross country has been a small turnout, preventing any real competition with other schools in the Mid—Atlantic Conference. Last season only saw five runners produce effectively. We came dangerously close to cancelling. There just was not anyone interested," Chatellier adds.

Chatellier says "I'm enthusiastic about the number of runners this year. We can enter as many as eleven. Eight have already picked up their gear. We may have two young ladies. There are no seniors in this year's group; some sophomores, some freshman." He feels, "you have to have a winner, an individual. Last year Peter Cameron won a race against Washington Bible College, our only win." Both Cameron and last year's MVP, Bender are back this season.

"We try to go eight to nine miles a day, around 50 miles a week. I'd like to get it up to 70 to 75 miles a week. It's a gradual thing" comments Chatellier on their training schedule. "Our course is average, it's five miles."

"The season is short. We have six meets in a month and 222 about a month to get ready. You have to be realistic—we lose more than we win. Hopefully they'll be competition within the team. We'll focus on improvement of individual ability," he says.

On their first meet September 9th, Chatellier remarks, "Hopefully we'll be better. It is important to win."

Fall optimistic about netters

by C.C. GRADY

The 1979-80 Washington College Women's Tennis team will be experiencing its "most ambitious year," according to Coach Penny Fall.

With a 14-game season, in which the competition includes Johns Hopkins and Goucher College, Fall expects a good showing from her team, despite the absence of Number one singles player Holly Young, who is currently in Paris.

Jeanette Bonsack and Janet Sparr, co-MVP players, will lead this year's team along with senior Tammy Wolf. Also lending their talents are sophomores Elizabeth Gallon and Penny Weatherhold.

The team will compete in the MAIW Team Championships this November 19 and 20. Fall described this a "good collegiate competition experience" for the girls.

An unusual aspect of the season will include a trip for the team to Florida this spring as well as the hosting of an invitational tournament here in April.

Utility increases exceed budget

by PETE TURCHI
News Editor

Unexpected increases in utility rates and increased consumption of fuel oil and electricity on campus will put the college over its budget and will probably lead to a tuition increase next year, according to Washinton College Vice President for Finance Gene Hessey.

Hessey said that although the budget, prepared and submitted to the Board of Visitors and Governors in February, was raised "to accommodate expected utility cost increases," it did not allow for the unexpectedly drastic rise in fuel costs. Hessey also said that $400,000, or 10% of the budget, goes toward utilities.

"Each student pays approximately $330 for utilities," he explained, "but our actual cost is around $440 per student. No matter what we do, the amount will go up. But if the students don't choose to save, our cost could dou-

Hessey said that all students can help decrease energy consumption by turning off lights that are not in use and by "being conscious of the energy they use. We've taken all the mechanical consideration we can take. We've got computer-monitoring on three of the largest buildings on campus, we've reduced lighting. It takes a community effort."

Some of the students who can help the most, according to Hessey, are the new dorm residents. "They are not energy conscious," he said. "They set the thermostats at 60°. Our people go around and reset them, but the students just change them back. Last year we put what were supposed to be tamper-proof indestructable covers on the thermostats. It took students three days to learn how to break them."

The decision to air-condition the New Dorms, according to Hessey, was based on "projected inflation rates and electricity costs, which were, unfortunately, very low. If we had the same decision to make today, we wouldn't do it." The Vice President did admit that it may become economically better for the College to put the New Dorms on central heating.

Although he said he understands that New Dorm residents are paying "a premium for their comfort, the government has asked that thermostats be set no lower than 78°." Hessey said that students acted responsibly during the energy crisis last year. "I really feel that the students have cooperated in the past," he said, "they just need to be

But it's not vandalism

It was probably an accident rather than an act of vandalism when one of the glass front doors to Hodson Hall was shattered at last Friday night's SGA dance, according to the Student Affairs Office. No suspects have been found, however, so the SGA may have to pay for the $150 door. That same night, Assistant Food Director Jeff DeMoss asked two students to leave the dance because of drunken and disorderly conduct. Enrollment down this year...

by KATHERINE STRECKFUS
Assistant Editor

Enrollment is down this semester compared to last Fall, but still above the total enrollments for the two previous academic years, 1977-78 and 1976-77.

Total enrollment this year is 719, a decrease from last year's total enrollment of 747. In the Fall of academic year 1977-78 however, there was a total enrollment of only 677, and the year before that, 1976-77, showed a total enrollment of 705.

This year's enrollment figures include 703 full-time students, 16 regular part-time, 14 continuing education, and 12 high school students who are permitted to take one course, according to Registrar Ermon Foster. The various categories of part-time students are equivalent, for budgeting purposes, to 16 full-time students, Foster said.

"A combination of factors" caused this year's decrease, according to Foster. "There is a smaller freshman class this year by 42 people," he said.

Another factor is the number of students who withdraw from the college for various reasons. This year, a total of 130 students withdrew, in comparison with 112 last year. Foster cited a larger freshman class last year as a reason for the increase in withdrawals. Sixty-five freshmen withdrew this year, whereas 42 freshmen withdrew last year.

"I don't think the withdrawals as a whole are much different. We always lose a few students over the summer for various reasons," Foster said. He added that some of the most common reasons for withdrawal are disillusionment with grades, change of plans for future, loss of financial aid, and transfer to colleges closer to home for financial reasons.

...And so are allocations

by KATHERINE STRECKFUS
Assistant Editor

Decreased enrollment this year is the cause of limited funds for the Student Government Association, the Elm, Pegasus, the Film Series, and the Concert Series, according to Vice President for Finance, Gene Hessey.

"Everything goes down proportionately," he said, "because they are all on a per student basis." He said that the problem is "doubly difficult," because most of the organizations face increased expenses as well as the loss of income.

The SGA will receive $400 less this semester than Fall semester 1978. The Elm's budget will be decreased by $200, Pegasus will lose $160, and the Concert Series will lose $75. In addition, Hessey said that "the loss of allocation will be greater second semester, probably twice these figures."

Hessey said that the drop in enrollment will "affect nearly all areas of the college's budget." Housing, for example, has fixed costs such as insurance and utilities whether all of the rooms are full or not, Hessey said. In addition, the Food Service has the same labor costs as last year, though food cost can be adjusted to enrollment.

"The college will look to other sources of income such as endowment to offset that loss. Even though it does present a problem, it is not insurmountable. We have been successful in recent years in balancing the budget. There is no reason why we can't be successful this year." Hessey said.

Saving money

Student help is being sought in a couple or ways this week, and in each case, we'll benefit by cooperating.

SGA President Jay Young this week asks us to "hold up our end of the bargain" in the arrangement under which the SGA is allowed to use Hodson Hall for dances. When Young says that "the College will simply not tolerate unruly behavior" in Hodson, his warning is supported by recent history: A year and a half ago, a joint decision by Director of Food Services Dave Knowles and the Student Affairs Office prohibited the SGA from further use of Hodson Hall because of a series of incidents at dances.

The ban was lifted a week later when the SGA agreed to provide "a group of students who will be responsible during dances." That arrangement, for the most part, worked well last year. But after the two incidents at last weekend's dance, Knowles hinted that an even more responsible security force (of non-students) may be necessary. A little restraint on the part of students will allow us to continue to supervise our own dances, and save us some money in the process.

College Vice President for Finance Gene Hessey also called for student assistance this week by outlining ways we can help save money by conserving energy. Surprisingly enough, this is the College's first attempt to make students energy-conscious. With a tuition increase already on the way due to rising utility rates, this seems like a good time for us to start listening.

reminded. After all, we're paying the tab, and that means the students are paying the tab too."

Other conservation efforts on campus will include the Hill Dorm renovations in the near future, followed by extensive work in Somerset. "I can sympathize with all these students," Hessey said. "The system is either all the way off or all the way on. Until that's controllable, our ability to conserve energy in those buildings is limited."

In an effort to explain the budget-making process Hessey said, "We just attempt to guess what the cost increases will be, then add them to the budget. But," he said, "the guesswork is getting pretty tricky."

Washington already uses the cheapest grade of fuel oil available, and fuel oil is 50% of the budget. Another increase in that field was the addition of a position in the physics department."

Letters to the Editor

Vandalism through the ages

In case anyone at Washington College is of the opinion that student vandalism is a recent phenomenon, let him or her take notice of this incident:

In 1870, a band of marauding students from Christ Church, one of the most prestigious of the colleges at Oxford University, removed a number of valuable statues from the college library and built a bonfire around them in the college quadrangle. The London Times was not impressed, and said so in an editorial:

"Astonishment mingled at first with incredulity, is the feeling with which the story that comes from Oxford has been received by the public, and especially by University men. The practical jokes of Undergraduates are sufficiently notorious, and have at times verged on sacrilege and misdemeanour, but this exceeds anything that lingers in the memory of the oldest inhabitant. It must go forth to the world that the most brutal and senseless act of Vandalism that has disgraced our time has been committed by members of the great Foundation of Christ Church, young men belonging to the higher classes of England, brought up in the midst of the most refined civilization, and receiving the most costly education that the country can provide....Truth is stranger than fiction, even on a subject which has so much exercised the invention of novelists as University life."

The Dean of Christ Church at the time, Henry Liddell (father of Alice Liddell, to whom Lewis Carroll wrote Alice in Wonderland), took a more conciliatory view of the proceedings:

"Young men of large fortune have little to fear from such penalties as we can impose....The late Lord Lyttleton, who turned out a very steady, useful man, was the first who painted the Dean's Door. The late Lord Derby is believed to have been the ringleader of a part who pulled down the figure which still gives name to the fountain in the Great Quadrangle. The attack in my garden last summer...was led by two noble Lords, one of whom had never been a member of any University, the other did not belong to us but graduated with honour from a College of high repute in the University and actually held, as he still holds, the position of a Lord of Her Majesty's Treasury. Can it be a matter of surprise that, when such things receive such countenance, there should be individuals in each successive generation of wealthy undergraduates who think it a nobel pastime to imitate and improve upon the freaks of their predecessors?"

Whatever the guiltiness of the perpetrators of recent acts of vandalism at Washington College, they are in good company.

Sincerely,
Carlos Wilton, '78

SGA Forum

Cooperation with security force urged

In light of several small incidents that occurred at the dance this past weekend, perhaps now would be the best time to discuss the various policies the College, the Dining Hall, and the SGA has concerning social events.

First of all, the College allows us use of its facilities only under the condition that we provide some sort of qualified supervision and are responsible for damages. SuperVision of this type could be very costly, so, in an effort to satisfy the College's requirements and to keep costs down at the same time, last year the SGA initiated a program whereby a group of students volunteered to watch the doors to Hodson and generally monitor behavior at social events. By this action, we as students took it upon ourselves to regulate our own behavior. We were satisfying the College's demand for supervision, the SGA's need to be frugal, and demonstrating our ability to handle all phases of a social event.

Unfortunately, we of the SGA do not feel that everybody fully understands the workings of the system, the need for the system and the valuable service that the volunteers provide. It disturbs us greatly to see students taking advantage of other students by trying to sneak into dances or by compromising other students by asking to be let into dances for free.

It is even more disturbing to see someone's behavior get so out of hand that one of those volunteers is forced to take some action and then see the student give the volunteer even further harassment for doing his job. These volunteers are doing us a great service. It really isn't right not to treat them like it.

Along those same lines, the SGA is also responsible for any damages that take place at a social event. If you break something (like the door to Hodson Hall) it is your responsibility to the rest of us to own up to it. The same holds true if you witness someone break something. If someone doesn't take responsibility we will have to pay for it out of our social budget, so all of us suffer.

The College will simply not tolerate unruly behavior that either causes damage to its facilities or infringes on the rights of its students. We as students have taken it upon ourselves to uphold these policies. If the College is going to continue to allow us the freedom that we currently have, we are going to have to hold up our end of the bargain.

Band lacks support

by WENDY MURPHY

"I think that if it is a Washington College band, most of the support should come from the student body," says Amzie Parcell. Assistant Professor of Music, as he begins his first year as Band Director.

At the beginning of the academic year, a list of students who were interested in music was sent to Parcell by the Office of Student Affairs. Despite his various efforts including phone calls, ads and posters, Parcell said there are only 15 band participants from Washington College.

Parcell speculates that out of a college this size, he should, "be able to set up a band of thirty-five to forty students," and adds, "maybe this is just a stage the band is going through."

The band's weakest areas for college representation are the clarinets and the low brass section, which includes the trombone and the tuba. As of this Monday, Parcell had no students from this school in either of those areas.

The number of band participants has gradually declined over the past two or three years, Parcell said. Last year, only six students participated from Washington College. The band existed last year only because its director John Kiaus encouraged some music teachers from Kent County, and a few members of the College's faculty to pitch in their musical talents. According to Parcell, "It is the same as lacrosse and soccer, if the students want the band, they must support it."

Parcell ran an article in the local Chestertown paper on Wednesday, September 13, to attract adult townspeople who have had previous instrumental experience to join the band. He said he hopes that the article will not only increase the size of the band, but will also produce an outlet for the creative energies of members of the community.

The band's scheduled for their first concert on November 4-5. They will combine with the Wesley College Band of Dover and the Delaware Brass Ensemble in order to give two performances. The first will take place at Wesley College on the fourth, and the second will be held on our campus on the fifth.

Proper film will improve picture quality

by RICK ADELBERG

Selecting the proper film for your camera is an important factor in improving the quality of the pictures that result.

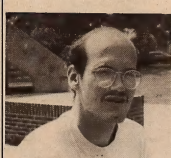
Film is produced in various speeds called the ASA rating. This rating indicates degree of sensitivity to light. The higher the rating, the more sensitive the film.

The higher the speed, however, the poorer the quality. For example, a film with ASA 25 produces better quality than a 400 speed film. In addition, the higher the ASA, the less light required for a good exposure.

When taking pictures indoors, use a high ASA film if you want to avoid using flashes. If you do use a flash, however, be sure to use a low ASA film. Slow film is best outside if the subject is fairly stationary. For sports or action shots' use the faster film, so you can use a higher shutter speed. This will enable your camera to stop the action.

Black and white film comes in ASA 25, 125, and 400. Use the 125 for normal pictures and all around use. Color film comes in ASA 100 and 400. Use the ASA 100 for best results. Color slide film comes in ASA 25, 64, 200, and 400. It also comes in kodachrome, and Ektachrome. Kodachrome is slower (ASA 25 and 64) and gives the clearest image. Ektachrome (64, 200, and 400) is used for action and low light photography. Always use the slowest film possible for the situation. The type of film you chose depends on the Particular situation.

NEXT WEEK: How to use instant picture cameras.



Decreasing enrollments in colleges, caused by the end of the "baby-boom", also means fewer newcomers to the labor force. A large consulting firm that surveyed 360 plants has found that 93 percent reported increasing turnover rates and 70 percent had to lower standards in order to fill openings. That also means jobs in many areas are getting easier to find.

Dawn of the Dead
Phantasm
Halloween

by NICK NAPPO
Fine Arts Editor

If you can handle the first ten minutes of George A. Romero's Dawn of the Dead, you can probably handle the goriest stuff any horror film will ever dish out. Like, for instance, the remaining 110 minutes of Dawn of the Dead. But really they're nothing compared to the first ten minutes:

In a housing project in nighttime Pittsburgh a S.W.A.T. team is shooting it out with corpses who for some reason have shuffled back into life. The dead can't use guns, move stiffly, but prove to be hungry. Ravenous, in fact. A band of Puerto Rican radicals is blasting away at the S.W.A.T. team. Shadows seem to be taking shots at one another.

Scott Reiniger in DAWN OF THE DEAD

National Guardsmen are committing suicide. The city cops are shooting everything that moves. The only way to kill the dead is to destroy their brains. In the middle of this confusion are actually a few live civilians. The number of this last group is lessened by one when an obese S.W.A.T. man kicks down a door and blows the head off a black man standing next to his wife. Completely off.

There. I began my review just like George A. Romero begins his film. If it seems calculated to offend, so does his opening seem calculated to keep people away from the theatre. I'm not sure why Romero does it. I think it's a shame. Believe it or not, the man has some things to say.

From the nightmare city, we follow two S.W.A.T. men (Scott Reiniger and Ken Foree) who helicopter out at daybreak with a young pilot and his wife. They pass over grits picnicing with the family in the middle of open fields, sniping at the slow-moving dead. There's beer, betting, and laughter, an audience included. The four finally make their pad on the roof of a sprawling Pennsylvania shopping mall. There they fortify the Civil Defense storeroom.

The zombies, driven by urges from their past lives, shamble through stores, ride escalators, and move at a pace that's oddly congruous to the tempo of canned music. Romero scores satiric by turns jabbing at consumerism and exploiting it. Or both: Foree and Reiniger modeling an entire gunshop, admiring the glitter and heft of each piece separately and in sets. Like much of Dawn, the scene is obsessive and funny. It's hard to dislike a film whose climactic sequence is set to a piped-in polka.

Firing, foraging, or hotwiring trucks, the two S.W.A.T. men demonstrate the unnerving efficiency of the volunteer soldier. If the blaxploitation film hadn't died an untimely death, Foree would be a millionaire. He has the silent quality of a man who converts his fear into the energy to strike back. Reiniger, on the other hand, only barely bridles his character's exuberant destructiveness with paramilitary precision. His performance is one of the more frightening things in a film I re ly. PROPHECY

By KIRK FOLK

It's billed as "The Monster Movie," and Paramount's ad campaign features three stages in the evolution of a nasty little embryo, who promises to bloom into an even nastier critter when it hits the screen. None of this, however, prepares the viewer for the dripping mass of play-dough which finally appears after hiding in the bushes and breathing heavily through the first half of the movie.

Ugh. We're led to believe that the "monster" is a mutated bear, but I'll bet good money that it's really Dinner Dave after a rough night on the town. Whatever it is, it's about as scary as a box of Post Toasties and functions on almost the same level of intelligence. This is forgiveable though because it puts the creature in good company with the movie's "human" cast.

Talia (Is there life after Rocky?) Shire plays a pregnant concert cellist who doesn't even have the sense to drop the mutated baby bear she's carrying when it bites her on the neck. Robert Foxworth is appropriately dumb as a Health Department inspector out of his element, and the rest of the cast act with about as much intensity as a row of squash.

Today's "monster movies" need scientific explanations for their "monsters" to satisfy the cynical audiences of the '70s. There is a reason for the creature's condition, but no reason for Prophecy itself. The story revolves around some ecological problems which are important to our age, but instead of making a point, it exploits to make a buck. The audience is left with a mediocre cast and one of film's most deplorable "monsters." Personally I was rooting for the monster. After demolishing the cast, I wanted it to seek out the director, producer, writers, and especially the special effects team who gave it birth.

That should be one pissed-off bear.

DRACULA

by SUE JAMES

Under a graveyard on a high cliff beside the ocean, Dr. Van Helsing (Lawrence Olivier), a professional in the occult, enters the tomb of his recently deceased daughter, Mina. She is believed to be immortal now: a new addition to Count Dracula's group of vampires. Van Helsing knows that the only way to save her soul is to destroy her by using sacred means. He enters her grave along with Dr. Seward, whose daughter, Lucy, later becomes the "wife" of Count Dracula. A figure clad in the garments of the grave appears—Mina. Moving up from the feet, the camera focuses on her face, ghastly white, with ulceric holes and blood-red eyes. Mina smiles at her father.

The star of Dracula (Universal) is Broadway veteran Frank Langella: 6'2", with dark brown hair and dark, penetrating eyes. The romantic vampire he plays is still lustful in his old age (300), and has immeasurable strength. Who else can scale the stone walls of a century-old castle, and break through the walls of a lunatic asylum? Dracula, of course, who "throughout history has filled the hearts of men with terror and the hearts of women with desire," as the promo goes. Langella's Dracula has has won the hearts of many people—especially women.

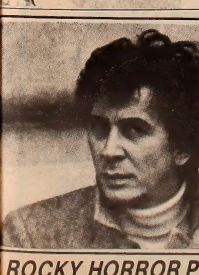
The Stalker in HALLOWEEN



project has' and of a madness that might, after all, be possible to slip into. Which characters are real, which are remembered, which imagined? Why did the Tall Man take the boys' mother and father? Why does he stalk them up until the last frame of film?

Halloween, directed by 30 year old John Carpenter, is the only film of the six reviewed in these pages that does not depend on special effects. A straight psycho-on-the-loose story, it is the most disturbing film here.

Many hours and slashings later, the killer, who has been stabbed and shot repeatedly falls from a third floor window. Then Carpenter makes his move.

When they get to the window, he's gone. And here is some answer to the question of who took mother and father, who stalked the boys in Phantasm and who will not die until the last frame of film has passed. How we take horror movies, the best horror movies (and Halloween is one) depends in the end how much, more or less, we fear the Reaper.

by NICK NAPPO

The story is simple. He stabbed his teen-age sister Halloween night when he was six. Fifteen years to the night later, he breaks out of the nuthouse and returns to the scene. But it is still late afternoon when he follows the two blistfully unaware teen-age girls joyriding through the suburb. Carpenter places the camera on their hood so the big green Country Squire stationwagon he stole from the asylum is framed behind their heads and one of them leans forward and clicks on the radio and Blue Oyster Cult's "Don't Fear the Reaper" comes on:

Romeo and Juniet
Are together in Eternity
40,000 men and women every day
We could be like they are 40,000 men and women every day
So come on baby take my hand
Don't fear the Reaper
We'll be able to fly
Don't fear the Reaper

What has 8 heads, 14 legs, 4 paws and a tail, and stars in the motion picture Alien?

The Alien, right?

Nope. It's the crew of the space tug Nostromo, a 5 men, 2 women and a cat, who are the film's real stars. This more than anything else is the reason Alien (20th Century Fox) is not the heart-stopper it starts out to be. In Dan O'Bannon's screenplay the Alien, instead of being a true monster, slowly metamorphoses into a mere projection of the beast that O'Bannon presumes is within everyone, and especially within men.

For the first hour, though, Alien is scary as hell. Responding to a distress signal from an unnamed planet, the crew stumbles upon the cavernous abandoned spaceship that serves as a breeding ground for the title creature. Director Ridley Scott equips the crew's suits with built-in TV cameras, and the derelict ship appears on the Nostromo's monitors with the shock of a live news report. Soon a freshly-hatched Alien is being hauled aboard attached to John Hurt's face like a big yellow crab.

Back en route, the crew bickers about removing the thing from Hurt, who is still breathing but unavailable for comment. He regains his appetite as well as his speech when the mess slides off his face, apparently dead, so the entire team sits down to a sort of reunion meal.

Now this crew is out of a perverted episode of "Star Trek." Lots of ethnic diversity, a black, women, even a cold, precise Science Officer. There's no Chinese, though the cat looks Persian. But they don't talk like this on the TV show: "Sure wish I could eat something else," Yaphet Kotto says, smiling at Veronica Cartwright, who smiles back as Harry Dean Stanton pipes up, "At least with this food you know what you're getting."

Suddenly Hurt begins choking and as he's held down what should burst from his stomach but the Alien, this time in the form of a blind black snake which scoots off after grinning at the horrified crew.

Mr. Spock might not know what to make of this gruesome baby (Benjamin Spock certainly wouldn't), but we have a hunch it's got to do with the lustful remarks at the table. Still, we're terrified. This pivotal scene is the high point of the film.

In other words, it's all downhill from there. The Alien, still evolving and shedding rubbery skins all over the place, starts picking them off one by one. It's the haunted house bit in outer space (stick together). Stanton breaks off from the group to look for that damned cat. "Here Kitty, here Kitty Kitty Kitty." Suddenly he's facing a 10-foot black insect of an Alien. "You're not Kitty."

The Spock-like Science Officer (Ian Holm) turns out to be a robot sent by the evil corpotation or CIA or something. Just in case anybody picks up any dangerous Aliens. It sounds highly illogical, but they need them for weapons. So Holm tries to protect the creature. He tries to kill Sigourney Weaver by stuffing a rolled-up porno magazine down her throat.

Weaver, however, is not downed in her quest to kill the Alien, to, in her well-chosen phrase, "blast the fucker into space."

By now we could hazard the guess that the Alien is not alien at all, but the embodiment of some evil human sexual urge. This would account for the color and shape of the thing, and the moralistic tone the movie has adopted. Seen in this light, the film's finale makes more sense as a sort of preachy women's lib tour de force.

Sole survivor Weaver (and the cat) take off in an escape ship after calling the Nostromo's computer, Mother, a nasty name, and blowing her and the larger ship to smithereens. But the Alien is in the shuttle with her. You'd think he'd gotten the hint by now. Appropriately for this last confrontation she's down to tee-shirt and panties.

But that's as far as she's going to go. She gets rid of him as she would a tiresome date. She's independent. She's seen The Turning Point and An Unmarried Woman, by God. And the last we see of the poor Alien, now almost in the shape of a man, is floating out to the farthest reaches of space.

She told him where to get off.

State Department official to be first Forum speaker

by KATHY WURZBACHER

The first speaker in the William James Forum will be Sandra Vogelgesang, according to Dr. Peter Tapke, Chairman of the Department of Philosophy and faculty advisor to the Forum.

Vogelgesang, the Special Assistant for Policy Planning in the Bureau of European Affairs of the Department of State, will speak at 7:30 in Hynson Lounge on Thursday, September 20.

The areas of the world that Vogelgesang covers are Eastern and Western Europe and Russia. She will discuss the question, "Is Jimmy Carter Really Helping Human Rights?" She has written a book on human rights which is to be published soon, according to Tapke.

One of the "most eminent English-speaking philosophers of this time" will speak on Homecoming Day, said Tapke. Sir Alfred Ayer will come to Washington College to speak on Hume's theory of morals, politics, and religion. Ayer will fly in from Wolfson College, Oxford, England in conjunction with a three-day visit to the University of Delaware. He is the author of Language, Truth, and Logic as well as various other works in Philosophy. Ayer will talk at 3pm on October 27 in William Smith Auditorium.

The officers of the William James Forum are Dave Wheelan, President; Jon Mueller, Vice-President; Rita McWilliams, Secretary; and Douglas Delano, Treasurer.

Vogel, SGA plan Homecoming

by KATHY WURZBACHER

Homecoming Weekend should be extremely busy, according to Jay Vogel, Director of Alumni Affairs. The festivities will begin at the Alumni House with an Alumni Cocktail party on Friday, October 26. The beginning matches of the Volleyball Tournament and a bonfire in the Kent Quadrangle sponsored by the Student Government Association will also be held on Friday.

On Saturday, the annual parade through town will start at 10 am. At the same time, the Faculty, Alumni, Student distance run will begin and at 10:30, the local alumni chapter will sponsor a yard sale on the lawn next to the Alumni House. Next on the agenda is the Alumni Lacrosse game at 11:30 and a soccer game against Johns Hopkins at 1:30.

The Philosophy Department will host a three-session "Joint Philosophical Colloquium" beginning at 10:30 on Saturday and continuing throughout most of the day.

There will be competition between an Alumni team and the men's crew later in the afternoon. An Alumni-Faculty buffet will begin afterwards from 6-9 p.m. in Hynson Lounge with music provided by the Rich Deprospo Trio.

The Homecoming weekend will end with a dance sponsored by the SGA in Hodson Hall. The SGA has tentatively planned for the band Appalosa. Vogel said that "while all the activities are positively scheduled, the times are subject to change.

Another view of life abroad
Mueller remembers "open, friendly people" of Europe

by JON MUELLER

The day I went up to Oxford the first time I took one of those smelly diesel trains that still provide most of British Rail's local service. It was noisy, uncomfortable and slow, but rather quaint, and gave a pleasant view of the Thames valley, perhaps the most suitable first look at a route I would travel a few times more.

It was a day-time train, and nearly empty, after most of the passengers got off in the London suburbs. In the carriage with me were an Oxford undergraduate and two American girls, like me going up to Oxford for a year. I had been two nights without sleep, and was running on the adrenalin that flowed stronger and stronger as we ran closer to Oxford, and all I cared to do was watch the English countryside that I was finally seeing.

The others talked, a few seats behind me, but at that time I had no desire to join in; I was completely amivalent about speaking to my fellow Americans. I didn't realize then that I was experiencing a feeling that would be repeated, and grow stronger over the year ahead.

Oxford really is the city of dreaming spires. My first impression of the city, from that railway carriage, was of church and college spires thrusting above the city's sprawling, close-packed little buildings.

As the train pulled into the station, the English student put on his tweed jacket. He had been giving the American girls a lesson in U.S. history.

Now he said, "Yes, I think it is a good idea for you to come to England to study American history."

The way I felt, those first weeks in Oxford, was that English people might think I didn't belong there because I was American, but actually I did, bec because I was an undergraduate, too. I actually cultivated my Americanism at first, to preserve my individuality, until I realized that there were a thousand other Americans studying there, and nobody cared about one more or less. I never tried to change the English, but I don't think that they desired that I change, either.

"I never tried to change the English, but I don't think they desired that I change either."

My attitude toward the other Americans in Oxford, once I discovered their existence, which I think was generally shared by most of us, was one of accepting neutrality. Initially I was startled, and a bit threatened, by so many compatriots. I accepted their presence, but had no desire to associate with them, at least as a group, but took them as individuals, the same as I took the British. The American tourists who over-ran Oxford in Summer Term were a slightly different matter. I desired to avoid contact with them if possible, which wasn't hard. By that time I was so hopelessly Anglicized that they all took me for an Englishman, even when I talked. They might ask for directions, but that was all. Americans are so insecure that they hesitate to initiate contact with foreigners.

A young American woman on my flight over, who had lived and travelled abroad extensively, told me, "Being an American abroad can be a lonely experience. Just don't expect it to be easy and you'll be all right." I didn't find it like that at all. Americans make themselves lonely, by the insecurity that makes them so superficial. My European memories are not of cold, hostile foreigners. They are of open, friendly people.

I was astonished by the number of English people I met in Oxford who had been to the U.S. I had to become accustomed to hearing about places in my own country where I have never been from foreigners. English people who had never been here were all abysmally ignorant about the U.S., but curious, and they all wanted to come here. This was something completely unexpected which I found throughout both England and Germany. A German student I talked to told me, "To the European, America is still the land of opportunity." This country still commands a great deal of respect abroad, and American failure to recognize it stems from a paranoic desire for sycophancy and perhaps our own guilt, of what, I couldn't say. It's not my guilt.

Mueller, a Washington College student, spent last year at Manchester College at Oxford University.

Stephenson, Parcell join Music Dept.

by FREEMAN DODSWORTH

There are two new faces in the Washington College Music Department, this Fall, those of Helen Stephenson and Elizabeth Parcell.

Stephenson, an Annapolis resident, is currently working on her doctorate at the Catholic University of America, in Washington D.C., where she received her Masters degree in Music. She is an accomplished soprano, and will be teaching the vocal section of the department. In addition, she will participate in performances at the college—such as a faculty recital scheduled for November.

"I like teaching the smaller classes here, because there is more give and take with the students, as opposed to larger schools," says Parcell. But she is no stranger to WC, being the wife of Amzie Parcell, musicologist and music historian, who has been on the music staff for a year. She said this job signifies a coming out of retirement, after having put aside teaching for a few years in favor of having children. Parcell received her Bachelor's degree and her Masters in music, at the University of Missouri and went on to further study at Indiana University.

The decision to hire the two part-time teachers came after John Klaus' resignation, early this summer. Klaus had been teaching both instrumental and vocal music, which is a hard combination to come by in a music teacher, said Kathy Mills, Music Department Chairman. He is now at Cornell College in Iowa, where he will teach Band and Music, as well as being in charge of their orchestra.

Mills said that the two part-time positions, are "working out well, better than we could have expected, because of the variety that the two teachers will offer, as opposed to just one."

Drexel takes Chester River Tournament

by RICH SCHATZMAN
Sports Editor

"Drexel had the best team," announced Coach Ed Athey upon the competition of the Chester River Tournament this past weekend. Drexel won both of their games while each of the other three teams involved lost one. The Shoremen split their two games while Western Maryland and Washington & Lee shared last place due to their 1-1 tie.

Winning two soccer games in a tournament is really not too difficult, but winning them both within a five hour period is quite an accomplishment. That is exactly what the Drexel Dragon's did on Friday afternoon. Immediately following a 4-0 drubbing of Western Maryland, they took the field against Washington College.

The first half ended in a 0-0 deadlock with Drexel controlling the play for the most part. Both defenses were superb and Chris Kiefer was exceptional in the Shore goal. Early in the second half, however, Drexel forward Dave High beat the Shoremen defense up the middle and scored into the left corner of the goal. The Shoremen never really challenged after that point until Mark Mullican took a shot that appeared to be labeled for the upper right corner of the goal. It went just wide, Drexel's defense settled down, and the game ended with Drexel on top of a 1-0 score.

Lack of offense was certainly the reason for this defeat as Drexel's goaltender was only required to make two saves. Kiefer, on the other hand, had five.

After Friday's game, the offense must have gone to bed early because they were raring to go on Saturday afternoon. Washington & Lee was a formidable opponent, but the Shoremen's 2-1 victory was really not as close as the score indicated.

With just nine minutes gone in the game, V.J. Filliben found himself in a race with the W&L goaltender for a loose ball. They both got there at the same time, and the ball popped straight up in the air. While the goalie stayed on the ground, V.J. jumped up and went after it again. During his effort, he was bumped by another W&L defender, and he was hit inside the penalty box. This allowed Lee Einwachter a free shot against the goalie. He beat the keeper, and the Shoremen led, 1-0. Just thirty seconds after the celebration, W&L silenced the crowd with a goal of their own. After a pretty centering pass, forward Jeff Renner made a beautiful head shot into the upper right corner of the net. The half ended in a 1-1 tie.

The second half was dominated by the Shoremen, but they were unable to score until freshman Dave Hastings took a beautiful pass from senior Tom Kohlerman and scored with 14:30 left in the game. The Shoremen forced W&L's goalie to make 10 saves while getting only two goals. One has to wonder if the injury to Tom Vach (a broken leg in scrimmage Thursday), the best shooter on the team, will have any effect on Shoreman soccer this season.

A Commentary

Athletic scholarships outlawed this year

by RICH SCHATZMAN
Sports Editor

Beginning this year, financial aid for athletes in Division III schools is no longer available. The only financial aid that a Division III athlete can receive is based entirely on need. The reason for this change is to lessen the importance of athletics and strengthen the importance of higher education.

Approximately seven years ago, the National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA) divided into three parts. This division was based mostly on school population. Division I consists mostly of larger colleges and universities. Since that division, Division III has become quite independent. As a result of this independence, three years ago a rule revoking financial aid for athletes was established and went into effect this year.

There is, however, one loophole. If a Division III school would like to give financial aid, they are allowed to declare one sport as a Division I sport provided that sport is not football or basketball. Then again, there is a restriction stating that those athletes in a Division III school who are receiving aid as Division I athletes are not allowed to participate in any other sport.

As far as the student athlete is concerned, this ruling definitely benefits the poor student and hurts the wealthier ones. A very poor athlete would actually be better off attending a Division III school, for the financial aid package granted on the basis of need can go beyond the package received from Division I scholarships. A scholarship in the larger schools consists of tuition, room, board, and books; a Division III package can go beyond that and pay for clothes and even give spending money.

The rule, however, was established mainly for those upper and middle class athletes who are trying to select a college. It almost forces the person to select a college strictly on the basis of the institution's appearance, and that's the way it should be, isn't it?

Lacrosse outlook: 28 new prospects

Kent County News

Twenty-eight lacrosse prospects have entered Washington College, enhancing chances for a Shore rebound in 1980.

Coach Bryan Matthews lost only Gilman's Dave Parker (Maryland) and Severn's Steve Keaney in his drive to rebuild flagging Shore lacrosse fortunes. Washington College tumbled to a 3-8 record in 1979 after losing 13 regulars from the 1978 club.

The "stick picture" is bright for '80. Matthews already has returning a solid team headed by defenseman Leckie Haller and sophomore standouts Peter Jenkins, Paul Hooper, Jesse Bowman and Bob White. Seniors Greg Schaffner and Billy Hamill are expected to return in the spring.

The influx of newcomers, however, will soldigy a weak bench and should rocket "Wash. Coll." back into the NCAA tournament spotlight. There have been other parallels. Freshman Jimmy Chalfant and Carl Ortman headed a strong contingent in 1964 when the Shore ten was 10-2. The arrival of John Cheek, G.P. Lindsay and Myrt Gaines and company in the mid-1970s had a similar effect.

Three new goaltendels will give Bruce Winand and Steve Mullinix a stiff run in the cage. Chris Anglim from Levittown Division, Jim O'Neill from Parkville and Donald Sutherland from Lawrenceville, all have outstanding credentials. Anglim is a solid 5-9, 185 pounds.

Kip Sparrow from Lawrenceville, Jeff Kauffman from Loyola, Chris Cox and Rick John from Boys Latin and Brian Carr from Henderson High School are top attack prospects. Sparrow was all-state in New Jersey, Cox and Kauffman had outstanding MSA seasons in Baltimore. Carr is 6-5. Kauffman and Carr play the crease.

Mike Barrow from Severn, Bob Zizza from Levittown Division and Paul Castilino from Corning had standout high school careers. Zizza from Delaware is his speed. Castilino, also plays defense, but at 6-1, 185 can move.

Carl Cunningham from Randallstown is another fine prospect who is coming off a great high school senior year.

Jeff Gruem from Severna Park, Mike Marsann rom Dulaney, Jim Hoffman from Hereford, Ross Lansinger from Essex Community College, Scott Pray from Rhode Island, Mike Faust, from Delaware, and Kenny Wayson from Key School are also highly recommended. Pray at 6-1, 185 is highly touted Faust was a high school All-American.

Eight new defensemen have Matthews rich in backline depth. Tim Melville is 6-2, 190 and aggressive. Tim Cloud, former Severn standout, by the way of Franklin and Marshall College and Anne Arundel C.C. will definitely help. Add Levittown Divisions John Langue, Mike Schnapp from McDonogh, Lance Yardell from upstate New York, Bill Coffey from Lawrenceville, along with Steve Snee and Doug Hallum—and Matthews is loaded with defensemen.

Another freshman who is expected to play "fail ball" is Brian Corrigan, Gene Corrigan's son. Gene Corrigan, University of Virginia athletic director, was an outstanding player, and has coached W&L, where he has also served as A.D. Little is known about Brian Corrigan who comes from a great lacrosse playing family. Uncle Dick Corrigan was a great player at Pennsylvania.

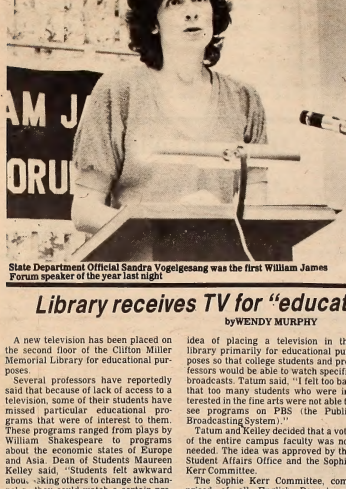
The beginning of classes last week also saw the return of Jay Atkinson, burly Ben Tuckerman, Tom Adams and Steve Furman.

Whether Noble Powell, Kevin Gavin and Dick Grieves will return is not known at this time.

Matthews reported Friday that sophomore defenseman Kevin O'Connor, senior defenseman Bill Herring and sophomore goalt tender Bruce Winand all had outstanding summer lacrosse league seasons. Gerring and Winand were Baltimore all-stars and O'Connor was a standout in the Charlesteville (Va.) loop.

The Shoremen begin Monday, Wednesday, and Friday fall sessions on Monday, September 10. Matthews expects to cut to 40-45 players after the first week of practice. The Shoreman will work out until October 27.

Three definite scrimmages are on tap. Maryland will be here Thursday, Sept. 27 for a 4 p.m. scrimmage. Salisbury State will travel north on Wednesday, October 24, also at 4 p.m. Washington will close against an alumni aggregation on Saturday, October 27 (Homecoming) at 10:30 a.m.



Two more scrimmages are tentative: the Eastern Shore L.C. on Sunday, October 14, and St. Mary's College, possible on Tuesday, September 25 here at 4 p.m. A workout with Baltimore U., previously set, has been cancelled.

The Shore stickers will workout on the upper Kibler field. Practice sessions are open to the public, as are scrimmages.

Newspaper to cut back to meet costs

Elm budget exceeds fall allocation

The ELM may be forced to eliminate two eight-page issues or drop to a four-page format for the remainder of the semester in order to erase a $700 difference between its proposed budget and its student activities allocation this fall.

Those were the alternatives presented at Wednesday's Board of Publications meeting after the ELM submitted a budget request of $5,307, nearly $700 more than its $4,619 allocation.

The difference was attributed to a decreased allocation due to this semester's smaller enrollment and increased publication and transportation costs for the ELM. The paper's allocation is down more than $400 from the fall 1978 allocation of $5,039. At the same time, the ELM expects expenditures to be up more than $400 over last year's $4,900 first semester costs.

The Board authorized the ELM to spend only its $4,619 allocation, forcing the paper to reduce either the size of each issue or the number of weekly issues published this fall.

College Vice-President for Finance Gene Hessey warned at the meeting that next semester's allocation may be even smaller due to attrition.

Pegasus contract approved

Also at Wednesday's meeting, the Board approved a $6,156 contract for the 1979-80 PEGASUS. Editor Bonnie Nelle Duncan reported that she will use no color photographs and will print only 625 copies, 75 less than usual, in order to cut publishing costs to produce a 160-page book. Last year's PEGASUS was 144-pages long.

With an expected year-long allocation of $7,411 for the PEGASUS, the Board also voted to put $200 of this semester's allocation toward the long-standing yearbook debt of $1,834.50.

Writers Union request granted

The Board also voted to give $300 from its own fund to the WASHINGTON COLLEGE REVIEW and the BROADSIDES with the stipulation that one issue of the WCR and eight BROADSIDES be published each semester this year.

Both publications, which are funded by the Sophie Kerr Committee, went to the Board for additional funding because of an almost $1,500 debt from last year. Of the 1979-80 Sophie Kerr allocation of $3,000, only slightly more than $1,500 remains for the two publications. Both indicated that they would request additional funding from the Student Government Association.

"CRAB" receives matching grant

Introducing himself as "a spokesman for a group who prefers to remain anonymous," CRAB representative Randy Watson submitted a request for $64.80 for a total of seven issues of the CRAB this semester. The Board voted to match any allocation, not to exceed $32.40, the CRAB receives from the SGA.

Library receives TV for "educational purposes"

by WENDY MURPHY

A new television has been placed on the second floor of the Clifton Miller Memorial Library for educational purposes.

Several professors have reportedly said that because of lack of access to a television, some of their students have missed particular educational programs that were of interest to them. These programs ranged from plays by William Shakespeare to programs about the economic states of Europe and Asia. Dean of Students Maureen Kelley said, "Students felt awkward about asking others to change the channel so they could watch a certain program."

Dr. Nancy Tatum, Chairman of the English Department, suggested the idea of placing a television in the library primarily for educational purposes so that college students and professors would be able to watch specific broadcasts. Tatum said, "I felt too bad that too many students who were interested in the fine arts were not able to see programs on PBS (the Public Broadcasting System)."

Tatum and Kelley decided that a vote of the entire campus faculty was not needed. The idea was approved by the Student Affairs Office and the Sophie Kerr Committee.

The Sophie Kerr Committee, comprised of all English Department Faculty and President of the College Dr. Joseph McLain, is paying one half of the cost of the television. The Office of Student Affairs and Washington College are each paying one fourth of the coast through income from parking tickets and audio visual funds respectively.

"First preference will be given to faculty members for programs their students are to watch," According to Kelley, "The professors should sign up for use of the television for whatever time they will need it. Other students may come in and get a key to the room after they indicate what they want to watch."

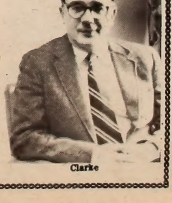
The television is located in a room directly behind the listening room but due to difficulties in the aerial, it has not yet been hooked up.

Clarke proposes major calendar change

by GEOFF GARINTHER
Editor-in-Chief

A major calendar change proposed by Dean of the College Garry E. Clarke would have the 1980-81 academic year beginning after Labor Day, two weeks later than the traditional opening of school.

Clarke was to meet today with chairmen from three academic divisions—Dr. Edgar Gwynn (National Sciences), Dr. Michael Goldstein (Social Sciences), and Dr. Thomas Pabon (Formal Studies)—to discuss the results of an informal poll of department chairmen conducted last week.



Clarke plans to take the proposal to the Academic Council and then to the faculty for further discussion.

According to the proposed change, freshmen would arrive next year on September 4 and classes would begin September 8. In the original schedule for next year, freshmen are scheduled to arrive August 21 and classes to begin on August 25.

The proposal eliminates one week of classes, Fall Break, and the two advising days.

"Something's going to have to be done about that," said Clarke of the elimination of advising days. Possibilities, according to Clarke, include having a two-week period in which advising materials would be available, advising on Friday afternoon, or weekend advising.

The rest of the proposal would have first semester classes next year ending on December 12, and the last final on December 20. Second semester classes would begin on January 19, and end on May 1. The last final would be May 9 and commencement would be held May 17.

ELM

Meeting every Monday at 7 p.m. in our office in the basement of Hodson Hall.

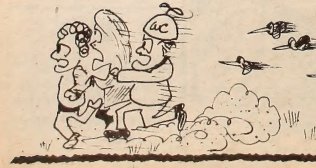
Running on empty

The ELM is going broke. Continuing at our current pace, we expect to run out of money somewhere around November 16, two issues short of our expected output and more than a month before the close of school this semester. More about what we plan to do about that later. For now, an explanation of how the situation came about seems to be in order.

The SGA, the PEGASUS, and the ELM all receive their funds from the activities fee paid by students at the beginning of each semester. Each organization receives a percentage of the fee; the total allocation for each organization is obtained by multiplying its percentage by the number of students enrolled.

This presents two problems: First, the allocation has been raised only once in the last fifteen years — this, despite the fact that the cost of bands, yearbooks, and newspapers have all gone up in the meantime. Second, those total allocations vary with the enrollment in any given semester although the SGA can't hold fewer dances, the PEGASUS print shorter yearbooks, or the ELM publish fewer issues simply because fewer students have enrolled.

For example, this semester last year, the ELM had an allocation of $5,030 available. In those days, prior to the latest gas crisis, postal rate hike, and publication cost increase, a semester's worth of this paper cost $4,900. This year, we submitted a $5,300 budget, representing roughly an eight-percent increase, which is only slightly higher than the usual six-percent increase in the College's budget each year. But because enrollment is down, the ELM has been allocated only $4619, leaving us almost $700 short.



The solution to all of this doesn't seem all that elusive. Each organization should receive a fixed allocation, one that wouldn't be subject to fluctuations in enrollment. And that allocation should be increased along with the other areas of the College's budget.

The Board of Visitors and Governors, which must authorize any increase in the student activities fee, can't help us this year, however; it's too late for that. So we've got a decision to make: Either we begin publishing four-page papers the week after next, or we eliminate 2 eight-page issues somewhere along the way. We're open to suggestions from our readers concerning which route to take.

WC Volleyball: "awesome"

Washington College Volleyball is awesome. For the past three years I have greatly enjoyed seeing consistently good, always citing power volleyball here at WC. Anyone who is a sports enthusiast should come out tonight for the opening home match-up against Towson; you will not be disappointed.

Coach Penny Fall was correct when she pointed out last year in the Elm that the turnout for women's volleyball was lacking. The support of enthusiastic fans would sweeten tonight's victory, and these women deserve that support. It should be an awesome match. Consider being a part of it.

Sincerely,
Steve Kinlock

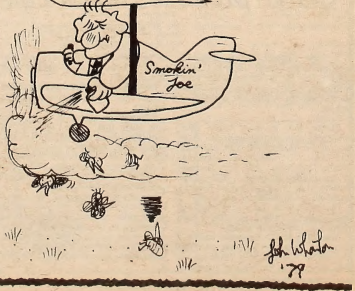
Danforth Fellowship applications invited

Inquiries about the Danforth Graduate Fellowships, to be awarded by the Danforth Foundation of St. Louis, Missouri in April 1980, are invited, according to the local representative, Dr. John Taylor, 6 Ferguson Hall.

The Fellowships are open to all qualified persons who have serious interest in careers of teaching in colleges and universities, and who plan to study, in a graduate school in the United States, for a Ph.D in any field of study common to the undergraduate liberal arts curriculum.



Approximately 55-60 Fellowships will be awarded to college seniors who are nominated by Baccalaureate Liaison Officers. Another 40-45 awards will be made to Ph.D. graduate students, nominated by Postbaccalaureate Liaison Officers.

Applicants for the baccalaureate awards must be college seniors or recent graduates and may not have begun graduate level programs of study. The deadline to seek information about the campus nomination process is September 28.

The Foundation is currently making a special effort to bring qualified persons from racial and ethnic minorites into the profession of teaching. Approximately 25 percent of the awards are expected to go to Blacks, Mexican-Americans, Native Americans and Puerto Ricans.

The Danforth Graduate Fellowship is a one-year award but is normally renewable until completion of the advanced degree or for a maximum of four years of graduate study. Fellowship stipends are based on individual need, but they will not exceed $2,50U for single Fellows, and for married Fellows with no children. Fellows who are married, or are "head of household," with one child, can receive up to $3,500. There are dependency allowances for additional children. The Fellowship also covers tuition and fees up to $4,00U annually.

Currently, the Danforth Foundation serves the following areas: higher education primarily through sponsorship of programs administered by the Staff, precollegiate education through grant-making and program activities, and urban education in metropolitan St. Louis through grant-making and program activities.

At the controls with Dr. Hamilton

by SUE JAMES

Look...up in the sky...it's a bird, a plane, it's...

"Batman" blasting through a big speaker surrounded by a square of electronic key keyboards in a Chestertown apartment. Right in the middle is Dr. Eugene Hamilton, Assistant Professor of Math, who plays these electronic devices as a hobby.

Hamilton's background in music began in elementary school with the snare drum; then it was on the trombone in eighth grade, and finally the piano in high school. Hamilton's interest in the keyboard resulted from, as he puts it, "playing around on my father's organ."

Along with teaching himself how to play the keyboard, Hamilton has taken lessons from Paul Richardson, the organist who plays for the Yankees and the Phillies. Hamilton still keeps in touch with Richardson, and when they get together they exchange ideas about music theory and the organ. But in all, Hamilton has taken two years of organ lessons, and only nine piano lessons.

Hamilton started his private collection of keyboards while he was in graduate school. The first piece he bought was an organ. Presently, he owns a two-keyboard electric organ, a Fender Rhodes electric piano, a Hohner 36 Melodica (a mimi-organ which is played by blowing air into a shaft), and an A.R.P.2600 synthesizer. Along with these different types of keyboards, he has a Peavey amplifier, a Cerwin-Vega speaker, and a Maestro Rhythm Unit Everything is set up in a way that allows him to move from one keyboard to another in ample time. If you're wondering what an A.R.P.synthesizer looks like try to imagine a control panel used by a telephone operator. An electric keyboard is also included with the synthesizer, and for easy accessibility, this can be placed on a flat surface nearby.

Synthesizers are used by many popular groups for "sound effects," but Hamilton used his A.R.P. (which he considers "Number One" compared to the A.R.P. Odyssey, a supergroup favorite), to add variety to the songs that he plays. He does not like to use sound effects because "it takes too long to switch over to a sound effect from a regular sound." Regular sound here applies to the instruments used in an ordinary band (trombone, saxophone). His favorite music is jazz, especially Jimmy Smith's.

Hamilton, however, will demonstrate how to set up the A.R.P. for sound effects. He first pulls out a notebook which contains different diagrams explaining how to produce more sounds than anyone could imagine. For the effect "Primeval Forest," Hamilton places the required number of "patch cords" (resembling an ordinary headphone cord) around his neck. He then pushes the designated levers up or down on the ntrol panel and adds the patch cords to the designated jacks. He has now made a "patch configuration:" birds and various jungle animals squawk from the speaker. Mathematical, eh?

For anyone interested in synthesizer music, Hamilton might be coming to the Coffee House this term for a return performance (he played there last semester). That is, as long as he doesn't "have a lot of work to do."

Miller joins staff

Former teacher finds niche in Admissions

by PETE TURCHI
News Editor

While the admissions staff was bringing in over 200 new students to Washington College this year it also brought a new member into its own offices: Alison Miller.

Miller, the most recently added member of the admissions department, taught at the Kent School, did social work, sold yacht insurance and organized boat charters before coming to Washington. The main requirement for someone who wants to work in college admissions is that they "know and enjoy people," says Miller. She goes on to say, though, that "there's more than most people think in a college interview. Washington College isn't suited to a lot of people, and you actually have to tell people that."

Miller's college work emphasized English and Education, but she says she "didn't enjoy teaching. Maybe it was the age (of the students)." She taught kindergarden at the Kent School but has also worked with older children. Her social work was only on a temporary basis, but now she says, "This (college admissions) is it. At least for a while. I'm still interested in taking some graduate courses, maybe in psychology."

Miller will travel with other members of the admissions staff throughout New Jersey, Connecticut, Maine, and New England this fall.

Taylor, Premo direct mock legislation

by RITA McWILLIAMS

Will Delegate Torrey Brown convince the Ways and Means Committee to continue the funding of Medicaid abortions? Can Elderidge Spearman of Congressman Walter Foustroy's office persuade the legislature to ratify an amendment to the Constitution granting representation in Congress to residents of the District of Columbia? These were two questions that concerned the 260 participants in the 3rd Maryland Girls' State Convention that was held at Washington College this June.

Professors Daniel Premo and John B. Taylor directed this year's Mock Legislature, a part of the program sponsored by the Women's Auxiliary of the American Legion. Issue areas, presented as bills by Premo and Taylor, were chosen to spark debate and to enable the participants to understand the frustrations involved in decision-making as well as the law-making process.

Premo and Taylor invited guest speakers to act as lobbyists for the three day session. Four members of the Maryland General Assembly appeared: Senator H. Erle Shafer and Delegates Robert R. Neall (Minority Whip), Torrey Brown and Timothy F. Maloney. Thomas C. Smith, a staff member of the Maryland House of Delegates Judiciary Committee, DET SGT Warren Pitt of the Narcotics Division of the Maryland State Police, and Lou Curran of the Maryland Chapter of NORML.

The conclusion of the session saw the girls opposing both decriminalization of marijuana and increasing the drinking age to nineteen. They were undecided over whether or not to curtail public funding of abortions and over granting legislative representation to the District.

Taylor summed up the program by saying, "Both the girls at the Convention and the guest speakers expressed considerable enthusiasm and satisfaction, we were pleased, on behalf of the College, to be able to provide this realistic educational experience for a bright and lively group of high school students."

Controlling instant pictures

by RICK ADELBERG

There has been a trend toward instant picture cameras. The cost of each print is 60 cents in comparison to about 50 cents for regular pictures.

There are several ways to improve the quality of instant pictures. One is to stay between 5 and 20 feet away from your subject. The lens is sharpest in this range. Second, control the temperature of the room. The warmer the temperature, the faster the pictures will develop and the darker they will get. Placing the picture next to your body adds head that can improve contrast. When developing the picture take this into account. You may have to vary the time 20 seconds one way or another.

Another technique is to vary the lightness and darkness setting. This will help get the exposure correct. Generally it should be in the middle. At this setting you can control the darkness by the length of the developing time.

Some further hints: Never let the film get hot because it will ruin the color. Clean the rollers inside the camera every 4 rolls to eliminate spotting. Pull the film out in one continuous motion. Do not stop halfway. Hold the camera very still. They have slow shutter speeds. Copies can be made if you get a good shot. Ask the local camera store to send it to Kodak. Remember, these cameras are limited so don't expect too much quality. The best you can do is to follow these hints and be careful.

Next week: 35 mm cameras

Police Chief meets RA's

Chestertown's crime rate went up when the College opened this fall because now there are more victims of crime, Chief of Police James Cockerill told Resident Assistants Tuesday.

Cockerill asked RA's to warn students to help prevent crime by locking their car doors.

The Police Chief also warned against climbing the water tower. "Not only is this a dangerous practice," he said, "it's a violation of the law." Cockerill said that violators will be arrested.

"Please don't get the idea that we're doing this in any way, shape, or form to harrass the student body," he said. "We hope to develop a rappert with the students."

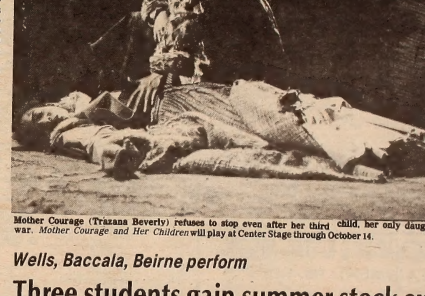
At Center Stage

"Mother Courage" misses responsive chord

by PETE TURCHI
News Editor

Different theatres have different motives. A college theatre serves as a workshop for students as well as entertainment for the college community. A major theatre may only run big-name ows, with their motive being packed houses. A smaller theatre, such as Arena stage in Washington and Center Stage in Baltimore, usually exists with smaller audiences while performing new or unusual plays, or familiar plays reinterpreted.

Center Stage's current production of Bertoll Brecht's Mother Courage and Her Children is supposed, I assume, to fall into that last category. Brecht's play, written in 1939, is nothing if not dated. Brecht was writing an epic, and he believed that the audiences' emotions should be left behind. His play is made up of many scenes, is over two and a half hours long, wanders off on tangents in a few "songs", if they can be called that, and generally succeeds in keeping the viewer uninvolved.



And, unfortunately, uninterested. At the time the play was written in Germany it was relevant and people saw it as a sign that they should not give in, that Mother Courage was a heroic figure who did not let the war and the loss of her loved ones stop her.

Today, as a result of another World War and several other major wars, the public is much more aware of the ideas that Brecht was pointing out. The story of Mother Courage seems like a tired enactment of an early history lesson. Modern theatres have preserved the play almost intact, and, certainly not for financial reasons, there will probably always be a director willing to pump life into this play long gone dry.

The acting in Center Stage's production is thoroughly enjoyable. Trazana Beverly is energetic and crisp, leading the way for other fine performances by Michael McCarty (the cook) and Keith David (Eilif). One other actor who promises to be entertaining is Robert Jackson as the Chaplain. Unfortunately he was substituted for Avon Long just a few days before the show opened and he was still reading from the script on opening night.

The set for the play is a brown and gray cyclorama with a dark panel on either side onto which narrative notes are projected between scenes. The acting is admirable, the set is superb... but Brecht's play will never again strike a responsive chord with its audience. The most interesting chords struck in the production are those in Paul Dessau's music for Brecht's interminable lyrics.

Those who watch the play, that is, those who don't leave the theatre during one of the intermissions, will find the third act lively and interesting. Indeed, with the songs cut entirely and about a half hour more cut out of the first two acts, Mother Courage and Her Children could be a thoroughly watchable play. As it is, only theatre majors and historians will want to catch Center Stage's production before it leaves on October 14.

Wells, Baccala, Beirne perform

Three students gain summer stock experience

by GINGER KURAPKA

Although acting may not be what Morgan Wells, Jodee Baccala and Dan Bierne will end up doing for the rest of their lives, all three got a taste of it this summer.

Wells worked in San Antonio, Texas at Earl Holliman's Fiesta Dinner Playhouse on three plays. In Owl and the Pussycat and in Everybody Loves Opa he was on the tech crew. "That was everything from lighting to set design," he said.

His big break came in Fiddler on the Roof. Asked along with four others to audition for chorus parts, he was one of two who made it.

"The hardest part was the dancing," he said, because he'd never had any experience. In the play he did the bottle dance and the Russian dance. "I worked on the dances for a week before rehearsals even started, and I'd warm up for 2 hours before performance," he said. "It was a very athletic type of dancing."

Each play featured a well-known performer, so Wells was able to work with Gary Burghoff and Martha Raye. "The cast becomes like a family after eight weeks on a show. It was great working with them," he said.

"I don't think I'd like to do it all may life," but the deciding factor will be his audition next summer for Man Of La Mancha. "I have to audition for the producer so that will make it or break it," he said.

A probable political science major heading for law school he said, "It was a difficult decision whether or not to come back, but I'm glad I did." He had a chance to do Once More With Feeling with Cyd Charisse this fall, although "it might have been a letdown because it's a much smaller cast."

"I was in the right place at the right time to get the part—Fiddler, but it's good to be back. I've quit having dreams about missing cues."

Dan Bierne was also in the right place at the right time to get involved in the Shakespeare in the Park festival in Baltimore this summer. "I was helping out at the Gilman Summer Theater when I saw an ad in the paper about auditions on the last day they were held." He and a friend ended up waiting 5 hours, "and it turned out to be an interview for an audition."

Perservearance paid off though, when after several auditions he got a small Part in As You Like It. Then a principal dropped out, and because he was there, he got a larger part. "Hanging around and just being there got me the part."

He also acted in The Tamer Tamed, a play by a Shakespearean contemporary and related to The Taming of the Shrew. Both plays were produced outdoors in August and early September. "The costumes and set were really good, and very professional looking."

"My reward was being able to look at professional actors and learn from them. I could look at others to see what they were doing right or wrong." The experience was also valuable in that it showed him the importance of a strong stage manager. "We always have a strong stage manager at WC, and I learned how badly you need one."

Jodee Baccala spent her summer in Virginia Beach singing "Bless the Land". "The 39th Street Dinner Theater, "a guinea pig for the Holiday Inn" produced Godspell, said Baccala.

Baccala auditioned at Catholic University in Washington, and the cast, all college students, mostly came from Catholic University and University of Maryland. They were all theater majors except one dance major and Baccala, a music major. "We were the oddballs," she said.

"Since the dinner theater was a financial success for the Holiday Inn, they're enlarging next year." The show will be either Oklahoma or, if the rights are released, Grease. "If I'm cast, hopefully I'll go back," she said.

Shoremen split NC Tournament

Kent County News

Hobbled by injuries and short-handed due to students with academic situations, Washington College's soccer team gained a deadlock in two games in the weekend's Atlantic Christian College Tournament in Wilson, N.C.

The Shoremen bowed to Wofford College, 2-0, in Friday's opener, but bounced back to tie Coastal College, 2-2, Saturday.

Earlier in the week on Tuesday, September 11, Washington College whipped Lebanon Valley, 1-0, at Annville, Pa.

Coach Edward L. Athey, however, has been bothered by the loss of sophomore Tom Vach (broken leg), injuries to freshmen Mark Mullican and Dave Hastings and junior Ken Maher, and the absence of halfback Tom Kohlerman and wing Nelson Einwaechter on road trips. Kohlerman is a senior and involved in an academic program that prevents him from making long trips. Einwaechter is on probation and probationary students can not miss classes.

Athey has moved V.J. Filliben from center half to "up front" pairing him with Maher at the inside positions in the Shore Four-man front. Fullback Curt Nass has been moved into the center halfback position. Freshman Billy Bounds has been filling in for Kohlerman at right halfback. Ben Tuckerman, meanwhile, has been moved from fullback to left wing to assist in the absence of Einwaechter.

Mullican and Hastings are first line reserves at the inside bullets, but the former has been plagued by a pulled groin and the latter has suffered from a severe ankle strain.

Ken Maher booted in the only goal with 3:06 gone in the first half at Annville and it stood up. Athey, however, was not happy. "We played poorly and were not coordinated up front," he said later.

Washington College outshot Wofford College from Spartanburg, S.C., in Friday's tourney opener, 15-13, but the Carolinians got the points on the board, scoring with 23 minutes gone and with 2:50 left in the game. Chris Kiefer stopped five shots for the Shoremen.

Filliben and Tuckerman scored unassisted to lift Washington College to a 2-1 lead over Coastal College from Conway, S.C., in Saturday's contest, but the Chanticleers tied the score on a penalty shot 35 minutes into the second half and the game ended with that score.

Athey said Monday that both Wofford and Atlantic Christian, the teams that met in the tourney finals, "would stack up with Haverford and Drexel." Washington College left "at halftime with the score deadlocked at 1-1.

The Shoremen met Ursinus College here Saturday in a game at 1:30 p.m.

Navy comes to Kibler Field on Wednesday for a 3 p.m. contest, followed by Swarthmore College here on Saturday, September 29 at 1:30 p.m.

SGA letters receive Congressional replies

by FREEMAN DODSWORTH

The Student Government Association decided by unaminous vote last year to send a letter to the United States Congress dealing with the controversial reconsideration of Title IX of the Education Amendments Act of 1972.

Title IX states that on the basis of sex no person can be excluded from any educational program receiving federal money. This includes sports, and it is the section dealing with sports that is being reconsidered. The letter sent by the SGA was in the form of a resolution that voiced the disapproval of Washington College students at the reconsideration of Title IX, and was sent to Congressmen whose committees might have some bearing on the subject.

The reconsideration of Title IX comes as a result of months of lobbying by large schools with revenue-producing sports such as football, who feel that it forces them to take away money from these sports in order to fund the women. Fall says that this act "hits them where they hurt the most, in the pocketbook. But money shouldn't be a factor in a matter of basic human rights such as this."

Under Title IX, women's athletics must be funded on a level with that of men's. In other words, women must be treated financially equal to men. Director of Women's Athletics Penny Fall, who suggested the letter, says "the most popular misconception is that what men have, women must have, meaning that if you have a men's football team, you must have a women's football team. This isn't true at all." What it means, according to Fall, is that women must be treated the same as men. For example, if men receive money for meals on away trips, women should, too.

Fall was pleased by the unaminous vote on the letter in the student senate, saying that it "indicated there is concern for women's athletics at Washington College, a male-dominated school."

Responses from Congressmen to the letter we also very favorable, coming as personally-written letters, dealing with Washington's situation exclusively. SGA President Jay Young said the SGA was "pleased with the responses because they indicated that they (the Congressmen) thought deeply on the subject."

College attempts to recover overdue loans

by BONNIE NELLE DUNCAN

In accordance with a ruling from the United States Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, Washington College is taking steps to recover $82,000, an amount which represents delinquently overdue repayments of the National Direct Student Loans on the part of 99 former students.

Part of this outstanding debt goes back to the early 1960s, when the NDSL program was first established, according to Washington College Vice-President for Finance Gene Hessey. The program provides funds to institutions for students who need loans to meet their educational expenses. Repayment is to begin nine months after the recipients graduate or leave school and the recepients may take up to ten years to repay the loan, provided they pay three percent interest on the unpaid balance during the repayment period.

Hessey said that 19.78 percent of Washington College students receiving aid from the NDSL Program defaulted on repayment of the loan. "Among private colleges, there are only four other schools in Maryland with a higher delinquency rate," said Hessey. "The average delinquency rate in the entire state is over ten percent, so all colleges are having a serious problem with this."

The Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, the federal agency which administers the NDSL, has directed all institutions that deal with the loan to take action to recover delinquent repayment or turn the debts over to the government for collection. The HEW directive states that associated colleges must reduce the delinquency rate below ten percent before next year's aid requests can be considered. "In a sense," stated Hessey, "the government will become our collection agency if we are unable to recover the loans, and the government will retain 20 per cent of the repayments that they are able to get as their collection fee."

Forty-nine of the 99 delinquent loans have already been turned over to the government. The College had difficulty tracing these debtors, Hessey said, because some of them go back to the years before the social security number was required on applications, and there has been no way to find those who did not inform the College of their addresses. The College is working on receiving payment from the remaining debtors by sending them letters from the Deans of the College and then turning them over to the College's own collection agency if repayment is not forthcoming.

BUSH Day planned for tommorow

by RITA McWILLIAMS

"We have the equipment, we have the materials, we have planned entertainment. All we need now to make BUSH Day a success is manpower," says Student Government President Jay Young in regard to the fifth semi-annual BUSH Day to be held here tomorrow.

THE SGA has expanded BEAUTIFICATION USING STUDENT HELP Day from planting and landscaping, as in the past, to a day-long event, including two bands, a party wagon, and an outdoor buffet dinner.

BUSH Day will begin at 9 a.m. on the triangle in front of William Smith Hall. Approximately $750 has been spent on shrubs and equipment for the cooperative effort between faculty, staff, and students to improve the grounds and campus.

Number One Dog, a country swing group, and Off the Wall, a country rock band, will both perform in the afternoon beginning around 2. A party wagon will be on hand to join the bands and the day will end with dinner served outside. The scheduled rain date is Sunday.

Chris Lemmon, organizer of this year's BUSH Day, says "I'd like a lot of student participation--it will make our job easier and may also help to prevent damage of property."

We Goofed

In the article in last week's Elm concerning the calendar change proposed by Dean Garry Clarke, the statement that the proposal would eliminate one week of classes is incorrect. According to Clarke, only two days of classes would be lost in what he emphasizes is a "very tentative" proposal.

And in the soccer story reprinted from the Kent County News on page eight, the suggestion that senior Nelson Einwaechter is on academic probation is also incorrect. Einwaechter is actually involved in a teaching program that prevents him from travelling to away games. We regret the errors.

Committee Chairmen elected at first meeting

by KATHY WURZBACHER

Sending Senators to a leadership conference, the BUSH Project, and the election of committee chairmen were the major items on the agenda at the first Student Government Association meeting of the year Monday night.

After swearing in the newly-elected senators, SGA President Jay Young told them that the success of the SGA "depends on your willingness to work and to be involved."

"The focal point of the entire meeting was to stress the potential and responsibilities of the SGA," said Young later.

At the meeting, the SGA tentatively decided to send Dave Pointon, Vance Morris, Colleen Müller, A.J. Villani, and Bill Baldwin to the Goucher College Workshop October 6.

Concerning tomorrow's BUSH Day, the SGA plans to plant "bushes between the library and Bill Smith Hall," and to "upgrade the Hodson Hall landscaping."

The SGA also elected the following committee chairman:

Bill Baldwin—Social Activities
Kevin Kroenke—Resident Committee
Bob Hockaday—Organizations Committee
Dan Duff—Dining Hall Committee
A.J. Villani—Elections Committee
Tim Connor and Ann Dorsey—Judicial Reform Committee
Dave Fitzsimmons—Faculty Report Committee
Anatol Polillo—Survey Committee

Notice

Due to financial exigency, the Elm must go to a four-page format. We hope to return to eight pages next semester.

On a calendar change...

Students stand to gain in several ways if Dean Garry Clarke's proposal to change the first semester calendar is adopted. The proposal, which Clarke admits is still very tentative, would have classes begin two weeks later than the pre-Labor Day start, end at the usual time in late December, and in the process eliminate only Fall Break, two advising days, and two days of classes.

The advantages are obvious. Under the current system, next year RA's will be scheduled to arrive August 19, freshmen August 21, and upperclassmen August 24. Pushing everything back two weeks accomplishes several things, two of which involve money: Students will have two more weeks on vacation and on the job, which is especially important to workers with Labor Day bonuses coming, and we'll miss the August heat, with its higher utility bills.

In exchange, all we have to give up are two class days (most won't argue with that), two advising days (many students see two entire days set aside for advising as a waste of time, anyway), and the Fall Break (that Break may look inviting now, but just remember those sweltering days of August). Any way you look at it, we come out on top.

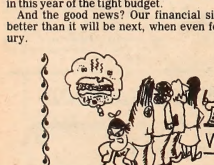
Did anyone notice that students had little choice about whether they wanted to vote at lunch during last week's SGA Senate elections? To the surprise of those of us with visions of quiche almondine dancing in our heads, the lunch line was re-directed through Hynson Lounge, where we were allowed to get trays only after voting. It was little wonder when the Election Chairman later reported that voter turn-out was great.



Lost in the shuffle were the five residents of Richmond House, who were allowed to go straight for the quiche after learning that they had no representation in the Senate.

...And a new format

There is some good news and some bad news about the Elm's new four-page format. The bad news is that several features of the paper have to go: our fine arts editor is virtually out of work, since his contributions are generally more lengthy and less newsworthy; center spreads like last week's weekend pictorial and the previous week's horror film feature are gone; photography must be drastically curtailed, and the pictures we use will be smaller; free advertising is a thing of the past; and "Roving Reporter," which may or may not be missed, is gone.

In general, writers, photographers, and typists are out of work, and looking to the WCR and the Pegasus won't help much in this year of the tight budget.

And the good news? Our financial situation this semester is better than it will be next, when even four pages may be a luxury.

Sixty enroll in continuing ed

by Katherine Streckfus
Assistant Editor

Courses offered by the Program for Adult Continuing Education (PACE) began this week with an approximate enrollment of 60 students. Four of the ten scheduled courses were cancelled however, because "the others didn't have enough applicants," according to Director of Continuing Education Ann Hoon.

PACE offers non-credit courses that are generally held in the evening once a week for 8 weeks.

"Considering it's the first time we've had the courses and didn't even start advertising until August, I think we've done very well," Hoon said.

The students range in age from 24 to 70. The majority are from Chestertown, but there are also students from various towns in both Talbot and Queen Anne's counties.

"We've got the whole gamut of backgrounds," Hoon said. In the Introduction to Opera taught by Professor of Music Garry E. Clarke, for example, there are students who have no previous experience studying Opera and a student who graduated from Juilliard," Hoon said. She added that all of the students have one thing in common, that they are "highly motivated and want to know more about that subject."

Hoon said that the College will continue the program at least through Spring semester, when different courses will be offered.

Officials crack down on loans

Campus Digest News Service

Delinquent student loans are the cause of growing concern in Washington D.C.

More and more college students are refusing to pay back government loans borrowed to attend college. These defaults have resulted in the loss of millions of dollars for government programs. One program figures 800,000 defaults involving $700 million.

Officials are starting to crack down on non-payers despite angry parents and student groups. Deputy U.S. commissioner of education Leo L. Kornfeld, intends to make the default rate drop during the Carter Administration. "President Carter has said the default rate will drop during his administration, and we'll make it drop," insists Kornfeld.

Private collection agencies have been hired by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare to track down non-payers and dun the delinquent college-loan students.

HEW is also threatening to cut federal aid to some colleges if the schools don't improve their system for cutting defaults.

Individual states are putting on the heat with telephone calls to the former students and parents, lawsuits; and by part of the borrower's pay if the former student is a state employee. The Oregon legislature has even authorized withholding rebates on rent and on refunds on state income taxes.

Officials on state and national levels insist that all this trouble is paying off and the state of New Jersey is sure of it. Last fall, when the state made public the names and addresses of 582 defaulters, they were swarmed with telephone calls from embarrassed parents and students.. Some former students even called in to promise quick payment if their names would be withheld.

Of course all this publicity is causing a lot of dissent among some student groups which claim the government has no business to "hound" graduates just starting jobs. They reason that most borrowers do pay back their loans and that the government is being unjust to give former students a bad time.

CIA infiltrates academia

Penthouse News Release

The U.S. Central Intelligence Agency is deeply involved with American universities and professors, and is fighting hard to resist efforts to oust the spy agency from academia, Penthouse magazine charges in its October issue.

"According to intelligence sources, at least 200 academics and administrators are covertly working for the CIA on more than 100 American campuses," the magazine says.

"They form a link with the CIA that has become so pervasive that there is some doubt whether a complete break between the two can ever be achieved."

According to journalist Ernest Volkman, the CIA's operations on campus include using professors as researchers and spies during trips abroad, and recruiting both American and foreign students as agents. Third World students studying in the United States are special targets for recruitment since theCIA would like to have future foreign leaders on its payroll.

*Penthouse*also charges that the CIA cooperated with SAVAK, the secret police of the Shah of Iran before the Islamic revolution in Tehran, in identifying anti-Shah Iranian students. The families of such students later were visitied in Iran by SABAK agents who tried to convince the families to dissuade their children from political activities.

Although many professors find CIA ties to be lucrative, Harvard University's President Derek Bok—who inaugurated an effort to regulate CIA activities at Harvard ovet three years ago—believes that "CIA covert recruiting threatens the integrity and independence of the academic community."

In response to guidelines written by Harvard to restrict some CIA activities and to expose others, the spy agency said flatly it would ignore the Garvard guidelines.

President Carter's CIA director, Adm. Stansfield Turner, has declared: "If we were required to abide by the rules of every corporation, every academic institution, it would become impossible to do the required job for our country. Harvard does not have any legal authority over us."

In addition to Harvard: the CIA is especially active in other Ivy League schools—a traditional recruiting ground for agency spies and executives. But in recent years, *Penthouse*discovered, the agency has also been active in other univierisites. Among them:

— UCLA. A visiting Canadian scholar, Paul Lin, was put under FBI surveillance because he had lived in China for 15 years.

— University of Illinois at Chicago Circle. "There has been extensive CIA involvement at this campus because of the large number of Iranian students enrolled." The magazine says the CIA worked closely with the FBE and the Chicago Police Department's "Red Squad" to harass Iranian students who opposed the Shah.

Library receives $4000 for Special Project

by RITA McWILLIAMS

Washington College has granted Miller Library $4,000, a 100 percent increase over last year, to the faculty for special purchases for the 1979-1980 year. The Library Committee has invited the faculty to present written proposals for the use of this Special Project Fund.

Proposals should be in a package format. Criterion for choosing between proposals will be their suitability for undergraduate study in a concentrated area. Last year's winning proposal was interdisciplinary in nature. The Fund was used to buy books on French comedy which, according to the proposal, would appeal to the English, history, drama, and foreign literature fields, as well as art.

Students interested in a special program using the Special Project Fund should talk to professors in their respective fields of study. Betty Wasson, the College Librarian, said, "If all of the College community is interested in this program, some really exciting proposals may be entered." Deadline for the proposals to the Library Committee is October 15.

Pianist appears Saturday night

Peter Armstrong, a specialist in the music of Ferruccio Busoni, the legendary Italian-German pianist, will be appearing at Washington College in William Smith Auditorium on Saturday, September 29 at 8:30 p.m. Mr. Armstrong, who at eleven won the New York Education League Competition and at age 15 was guest soloist with the Philadelphia Orchestra at the Worcester Festival, is on his way to becoming a legendary pianist himself. Mr.

Armstrong's all-Busoni recital at Lincoln Center last May was praised as "an artistic triumph" and the New York Times lauded both Mr. Armstrong's "keyboard mastery" and his elaborate works. Last season, Mr. Armstrong toured thirty East and West coast campuses in addition to being featured on both radio and T.V.

"The Piano Music of Ferruccio Busoni" will be presented in the form of a lecture-recital. After a short talk on Busoni and his works, Mr. Armstrong will play the "Elegien," "Sonantinas" and "Toccata" which contain Busoni's most radical contributions to music. This lecture-recital is sponsored jointly by the Washington College Lecture Series and the Music Department. Mr. Armstrong's performance is free and the public is invited and encouraged to attend.

Fall attacks campus chauvinism

by CeCe GRADY

"There has to be an enlightenment on this campus that women are just as important, just as bright, and deserve just as much as the men," says Women's Athletic Director Penny Fall.

With female enrollment on the decline already, Fall believes that the future of women's athletics here at Washington will have a profound effect on the number of applications received from women in the future.

"Women are not only looking for quality scholastic programs but for other programs of interest, too," she says.

In an attempt to upgrade the support of women's athletics, a group has been started called "Friends of Washington College Women's Athletics." The group, which will be composed of a cross-section of college and community people, will be a "word-spreading" organization.

"In terms of facilities, coaching, and uniforms, the athletic program here is first class," said Fall. "The biggest problem that screws up the advancement of the women's program is the administration's reluctance to allow us to hire another full-time coach."

According to Fall, the next women's sport to enter Washington on an intercollegiate level will probably be basketball. "We have tried to start field hockey here several times," she says, "and each time we ended up with three girls who showed a genuine interest in the sport."

Fall believes that, rather than the women's athletic program in particular, it is the attitude toward females in general that is responsible for the decreasing enrollment by women at Washington College.

"It's unfortunate that women aren't taken as seriously as they should be," said Fall. "We have a quality group of young women on this campus and it's about time they get the recognition that they deserve."

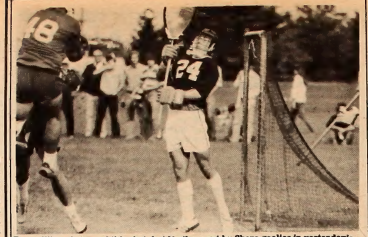
Shoremen came back to tie Navy, 2-2

by RICH SCHATZMAN
Sports Editor

"It's nice to tie them because they hate us, but I would have loved to beat them," said center fullback Dan Hudson after Wednesday's 2-2 tie with the US Naval Academy. That was the general feeling of the entire squad as they scratched and clawed their way back from a 2-0 deficit.



Navy scored their first goal just three minutes after the contest began as Dave Humphry got an unassisted goal that seemed to surprise the Shore defense. The first half ended that way, but the Shoremen looked like the better team. Most of the half was played on Navy's side of the midfield stripe. Washington just kept pounding and it looked like they were just teasing Navy. Then, with 12 minutes left they finally got a golden opportunity as freshman Mark Mullican found himself with a break-away. He didn't get a good shot off, however, and the chance was lost.

The second half looked like it was going to be a carbon copy of the first as Navy scored again, this time only two minutes into the half. Halback Jeff Hueber came up with an unassisted goal making it 2-0 Navy. But one could sense that the Shoremen would be back in the contest. Finally, with 35 minutes left in the game, Ken Maher took a pass on the right side from Dan Hudson and made an incredible shot into the left corner of the goal. This was the spark the Shoremen needed as they continued to keep pressure on the Midshipmen defense. Ten minutes later V.J. Filliben got knocked down going for a loose ball in the penalty area. This allowed Tom Kohlerman a free shot on the goalie. The keeper, however, was equal to the task as he stopped the shot with a diving stop. "I really can't believe I didn't score, but it seemed to give us an added incentive," said a dejected Kohlerman after the game. "I'm not sure if my missing that shot made us try harder or if we'd have gotten that last goal back anyway. Either way, I should have made it."

The "last goal" that Kohlerman spoke of occurred with just 15 minutes left in regulation right after a Navy halfback got thrown out of the game, which forced the academy to play with one less man. Filliben beat two defensemen on the right, fed to Mullican in the middle and Mullican scored. The player that was ejected from the game was tossed because of his language, but he could have been thrown out for the way he pounded Ken Maher. Maher was constantly on the ground, but refused to lose his cool. Afterward, he said, "I think it frustrated him more than me because I just didn't let it bother me. The other guys saw what was happening and they just kept telling me to relax. I guess he got frustrated since I didn't rattle, and he took it out on the official."

For the rest of regulation and in the overtime, Washington dominated play. Navy seemed content with a tie and the Shoremen were hungry. But a good defense down the stretch allowed the Middies to hange on for the tie.

SHORE NOTES: Ben Tuckerman has been moved from fullback to left wing, and Curt Nass has been moved from fullback to center halfback. Both changes appear to be permanent. "Ben has the speed we need at wing and when he gets himself settled, he has a darn good shot," said Coach Athey. Swarthmore will be in on Saturday. They lied Navy 1-1. This could be a super game, so don't miss it.

Bruce Winand stopped this shot, but 16 others got by Shore goalies in yesterday's scrimmage against University of Maryland, a 16-6 Shoremen loss. Graham -photo

Faculty seeking salary increase

5 percent "emergency supplement" by January; 20 percent more by next year

by GEOFF GARINTHER
Editor-in-Chief

The faculty voted unanimously Tuesday to send a resolution to tomorrow's Board of Visitors and Governors meeting calling for a five percent "emergency supplement" to faculty salaries in January and an additional twenty percent increase effective next September.

The resolution, presented by AAUP (American Association of University Professors) Chapter President Dr. Michael Bailey, cited the College's alledged failures to make faculty salaries competitive with those at comparable schools and the increasing difficulty of supporting a household on a faculty salary as reasons for the requested increase. (See inset for the full text of the resolution.)

In a breakdown of faculty salaries across the state prepared by the local AAUP chapter to accompany the resolution, Washington ranked 27th out of 29 at the level of Full Professor; 32nd out of 36 at the level of Associate Professor; and 34th out of 37 at the level of Assistant Professor. The AAUP breakdown also asserted that faculty ssries. saries are lower today than they were in 1965-66 in terms of actual purchasing power. The position of faculty salaries was also said to have worsened in relation to comparable schools and the national average of college faculty wages.

"This loss of ground," stated the AAUP memorandum accompanying the salary breakdown, "is particularly disappointing in light of the administration's commitment to improve our status."

The only discussion of the resolution came from Associate Professor of Political Science Dan Premo, who gave an emotional speech in its support.

"After nine years here, I find that from the standpoint of economic security, I am worse off now than I was in 1971," said Premo.

"It is therefore that I strongly urge the adoption of this letter," he added. "I feel it's in the absolute best interest of the College, to which I do not feel a traitor ... (but where) I can no longer hold my head proud and feel any sense of dignity."

Premo's brief speech was applauded by the faculty. The subsequent motion to send the resolution to the Board through College President Joseph McLain was then passed by unanimous voice vote.

The Resolution

Whereas faculty real income has been steadily declining for several years;

And whereas in December, 1977 the administration and the Board undertook a commitment to increase faculty salaries to a level where Washington College would be, in the words of President McLain at the faculty meeting of December 5, 1977, "competitive with all and superior to some of our sister institutions;"

And whereas our current level of salaries remains significantly lower than that at comparable institutions such as Western Maryland and Goucher College, and is, in fact, almost lowest among all intstitutions of higher learning in Maryland;

And whereas many members of the faculty are finding it all but impossible to support adequately a household on a Washington College salary;

Be it resolved that it is imperative that in January 1980 each member of the faculty be paid an emergency supplement equal to 5% of his or her current annual salary.

And be it further resolved that in order to forestall a similar hardship in the future, faculty salaries must be increased by 20%, effective September, 1980.

Response to "exigency" clause ratified by faculty

by GEOFF GARINTHER
Editor-in-Chief

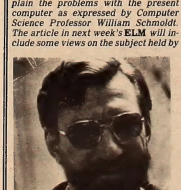
The faculty Tuesday ratified a letter to the Board of Visitors and Governors recommending the formation of a joint administration-faculty committee to prepare "a set of procedures governing contractual and curricular changes, should financial exigency arise."

The letter resulted from the faculty's objections to the "financial exigency" clause added to their handbook during an executive session of the Board last February. The clause reads: "In addition to the above provisions, a tenured faculty member's contract may be terminated by Washington College because of financial exigency.

Discussion of the clause became heated at September's faculty meeting when several professors objected to the Board's failure to consult the faculty concerning the addition of the clause.

An ad-hoc committee led by English Department Chairperson Nancy Tatum was then formed to draft a letter expressing the faculty's objections.

Read aloud at the meeting by committee member Dr. Michael Bailey, Chairman of the Economics Department, the letter states that "the real issue woes beyond faulty communication.



"As it stands, the amendment is so vague and sweeping that it has the potential for causing much more serious damage to faculty morale and college solidarity than it could ever balance by legal benefits in the future."

The letter was amended at the request of College President Joseph McLain to better reflect his role in the establishment of the ad-hoc committee and was ratified unanimously by the faculty.

College computer is "obsolete," says Schmoldt

by PETE TURCHI
News Editor

In recent years, an increasing number of Washington College faculty members have expressed their desire for a larger, more modern computer to replace the school's ten-year-old IBM 1130. This two-part series will first explain the problems with the present computer as expressed by Computer Science Professor William Schmoldt. The article in next week's ELM will include some views on the subject held by faculty members in the natural and social sciences.

Schmoldt

"An outdated piece of equipment": that's what Computer Science Professor William Schmoldt calls the IBM 1130, Washington College's current computer.

Schmoldt goes on to say that not only is the machine "obsolete," but a great deal of the software, such as computer cards and print-out sheets, is no longer manufactured by IBM and is, therefore, not readily available. Although he says that "we have gotten very good use out of the computer ... until recently it has been virtually trouble free," he adds that a $700 Radio Shack computer has a larger memory.

According to Schmoldt, there would be great advantage in getting a more modern computer for students in the social and natural sciences as well as for those students in computer courses. "We'd like to give people who aren't mathematics and computer science majors the opportunity to use sophisticated software packages, (statistical pcskages, in particular) ... which require larger, more modern machines," he says. He continues: "We to maintain the computing center as an academic resource."

As far as the benefits for his own students, Schmoldt says that FORTRAN, the computer language used by the IBM 1130, is "limited and no longer considered a good first language (for students to learn." A new computer would use a different language, such as PASCAL, which Schmoldt says is, "more like programming in the way that you think."

Not only would current computer courses be improved with the advent of a new computer, but more courses could be added. "I don't think we can have a strong computing program with out a better computer," Schmoldt says. "The demand for courses in computing is greater than the 1130 can handle. The enrollment in the introductory courses had to be limited this semester because the computer can't handle the larger student demand."

Although he estimates that 90 percent of the work done on the computer now is related to computer science courses, Schmoldt says this figure would probably drop to about 60 percent with a modern computer for which statistical packages are available. On the whole, he says he believes that the new computer should be "a much more accessible tool to everyone than it (the IBM 1130) is at the moment." Six or seven people would be able to use the new computer simultaneously, and it would take less time to de-bug, or remove the errors from, a program.

Although no formal prposal of any kind has been made as of this writing, Schmoldt says that he has been working on an in-depth study of the available replacements for the 1130, and that the College may be able to purchase a new computer with a memory over 15 times that of the current machine for something in the neighborhood of what the IBM originally cost. Schmoldt summarizes his case for a more modern computer simply. "Our need is immediate," he says. "We're trying to accomodate rger enrollments in computing and the needs of other departments for an easily-accessible computing device."

Faculty salaries: losing the race with inflation

Standing in the midst of colleagues who often seemed more concerned about Robert's Rules of Order than substantive issues, Professor Dun Premo seemed refreshingly candid in his comments at Tuesday's faculty meeting. Calling himself docile for having put up with the College's failure to meet its original commitment to pay him a fair wage, Premo said that, economically, he is worse off now than when he started teaching here in 1971. How can someone with his education, his experience, and nine years teaching at the same college feel his economic security threatened?

The figures provided by the local AAUP at the meeting speak for themselves. Salaries for Washington College professors rank near the bottom at every level in comparison with other schools in the state. At the national level, Washington's average compensation lags twenty-one percent behind the average across the country.

So Tuesday the faculty voted unanimously to ask the Board of Visitors and Governors for a five percent "emergency" raise this January and a 20 percent raise effective next September. This may seem an arrogant request. But even if the College were to grant the increase in full, faculty salaries here next year would rank only somewhere near the average among schools in the state. That estimate doesn't take into account the anticipated salary increases at other schools next year. Nor would the increase make up for all the years that salaries lagged behind the rate of inflation.

The College's continued failure to pay professors decent sslaries will accomplish three things: good teachers will become (1) increasingly difficult to attract, (2) increasingly difficult to keep, and (3) increasingly bitter during their stay.

Hill Dorms named to National Register

by WENDY MURPHY

Middle, East, and West Halls, commonly referred to as the Hill Dorms, have recently been named to the Department of the Interior's National egister of Historic Places.

The decision was publicly announced by Maryland Republican Representative Robert Bauman on Monday, a day before Washington College heard the news.

George Hayward, Vice President for Development and Public Relations, said that the school needs funding for renovation of the Hill Dorms. In order to apply for money from the Maryland Historical Trust, the buildings must be named on the register. He said, "I submitted an application proposing that the Hill Dorms be placed on the National Register of Historic Places. I was surprised to find that none of the Washington College buildings were listed on the National Register."

The application for nomination was then sent to the state Governor's Committee in July 1978. After approval there, it is sent to the Department of the Interior's Heritage, Conservation, and Recreation Service. It was once again approved and Middle, East and West Halls were named to the register. The nomination was then forwarded to Pamala James, the National Register Coordinator for the Maryland Historical Trust, who will consider the application for funding.

The Hill Dormitories, the oldest college buildings still standing, were built after the main college building was burnt down in 1827. The main building stood on Mount Washington, now referred to as the Hill. Between 1827 and the completion of Middle Hall in 1844, the college classes were held at rented quarters in Chestertown.

It was proposed in 1833 that Middle Hall be built on Mount Washington at the sight of the original college structure. Some members of the Board of Visitors and Governors opposed the proposal. The following is quoted from the application report: "After nearly ten years of debate, further investigations, financial stress, and a few resignations of members, the Visitors and Governors finally agreed in 1844 to follow the Burchinal plans and to begin construction on the building. Mr. Elija Reynolds of Baltimore was selected as the general contractor." The Burchinall plans referred to are ones put together by the Chestertown builder. Professor Benjamin Green, a Washington College Vice-Principal and teacher, designed and oversaw the landscaping of the terrace.

Middle Hall had lecture halls on the first and second floors and sleeping quarters on the third floor. This arrangement soon proved not to be enough space. Because of the lack of space, East and West Halls were suggested. They were completed in 1854 with a structure similar to that of Middle Hall in that the first two floors contained classrooms and the third floors were used for sleeping quarters. All three buildings had fireplaces in each room, and students who lived there were sent monthly bills for the wood they used.

The appearance of the dorms has changed over the years. The first plumbing systems were installed in 1890. There used to be a porch on the back of Middle Hall which was removed in 1956. The fireplaces are no longer usable. The metal roof and sandstone window sills still remain. There has also been other minor renovations.

The college tries to preserve the exteriors and to renovate the mechanical systems, such as heating, electricity, and plumbing, but they need funding in order to carry out plans. The college is now eligible for funding from the Maryland Historical Trust. Hayward said, "If funding proceeds on schedule it is possible that renovations will begin early next summer."

Most of the information on the history of the Hill Dorms was contributed to the college by Frederick W. Dunschott, a 1927 alumnus of Washington College, and Vice President Emeritus. He has compiled the history of the college and is in the process of completing a book entitled History of Washington College, which should be available in about one year.

Education Department to be evaluated next month

by BILL MORTIMER

The Department of Education at Washington College will be evaluated next month under the Standards for State Approval of Teacher Education guidelines.

After a period of six years since the last evaluation in 1973, the Teacher Education Program, under the direction of Mr. Sean O'Connor, will be evaluated by a team of between 12 and 14 members of the Maryland State Department of Education. According to O'Connor, the team will look at three aspects of the program: the Professional Education Program of the College in so far as it relates to the training of teachers, and a look at the total organization of the college itself. Under the standards developed by the National Association of State Directors of Teacher Education and Certification (NASDTEC), criteria will be evaluated, while also taking into account the philosophy and condition of the college. "They must be able to feel the heart and philosophy of a college," O'Connor noted.

This evaluation Process occurs normally every five, rather than six years. For several reasons, however, the evaluation of Washington College's Teacher Training Program was delayed the extra year. During November 14, 15, and 16 the team, composed of professors from other colleges, instructors of school systems and members of the Maryland State Department will perform the evaluation.

Before the team arrives, they must read a self-evaluation document, which O'Connor is currently writing. He says that "By interviews, materials and some observation, they will see if we answer the standards which have been set up at the national level." The actual approved approach to teacher education and certification which is employed by most states include three general aspects which, as described in the guidelines book of "Standards for State Approval of Teacher Education" are these: (a)the development of programs of teacher education by an institution in accordance with the established standards; (b) the official review and evaluation of each of the proposed institution programs in terms of the established standards and procedures by the state education agency and the subsequent approval of programs if the standards are met; and (c) the understanding that the teacher candidate, upon successful completion of a program approved, as attested by the institution, will be entitled to official recognition by the state education agency.

According to Dr. George Kent, a Consultant in Teacher Education for the Maryland State Department, the purpose of the evaluation is to "assist colleges in developing programs that prepare teachers and assure that the preparation of the state is adequate; that they (the students working towards teacher certification) possess qualities adequate for teaching."

The report is then submitted to the satisfaction of the state department, and it is determined that the college's programs meet the NASDTEC standards, the graduates of the program will receive certain benefits. The graduated would be certified immediately upon graduation without the analysis of transcripts. Reciprocity is another benefit which graduates of a certified course enjoy. "Given our mobile society" noted Kent, "students may find themselves in a different state . . . there was a time when students moving from one state to another were subject to various tests" before they could be certified in the new state. With the system of reciprocity, a teacher graduating from a certified course can move between thirty-three states which function under that provision without being subject to certification standards. Finally, with the system of accreditation, programs which are qualitatively superior in the preparation of educational personnel are increasingly more apparent. Thus, the benefits of evaluation are far-reaching.

"Burdensome task that it is, it certainly helps me get a very good overview of the program with its strength and weaknesses" said O'Connor. He also said that he feels that the next year's evaluation will be benefical because it should help to promote improvements.

Faculty reaction to Continuing Education mixed

by GINGER KURAPKA

Faculty members involved in Washington College's newly established Continuing Education Program report mixed reactions so far. Dr. John Baxter enjoys his class because "it's fun to have an audience to teach economy to." And Dr. Donald Munson said, "it's a good idea overall" although he also feels that "the people taking the course have to realize that it's not, and not intended to be, like an undergraduate course."

Of the ten courses originally offered, five had to be dropped because of lack of interest. Both Dr. David Newell's Death and Dying Course and Attorney Thomas Sisk's Law course were well-responded to in the original survey but had to be cancelled because of small or non-existent enrollment. "Most of the students are much older than those who expressed interest (in the two course). The younger people possibly couldn't afford to enroll," said Newell.

The program has practical advantages. "Because the classes meet only once a week, in the evening, it's easier for the typical adult who's working to come in and participate," said Dr. John Miller. In addition, "there may be some advantage to having a class exclusively of older adults. Their concerns and interests are very different from the undergraduates," he added.

Baxter also feels "people don't want to sit in with undergraduates because it makes them feel uncomfortable not being among their peers."

The wide base of experience and background of the students has forced some teaching methods to be changed. "Because of the cross-section of people, you can't teach an intro course," Munson said. I think the point of the course is to expose them to a field they know little about." For basically the same reasons, Baxter feels that it's easier to teach these people, although it's hard to find the right level on which to teach them." By virtue of the fact that they are older, "my responses to the students will be different because what they bring to the class is different," Miller said.

Although turnout this semester has been small, most faculty members feel the program should be given a full year before any decision is made on its continuation.

BUSH Day survives rain, will continue tomorrow

by KATHY WURZBACKER

The rain was the only deterrent to a day both Student Government President Jay Young and Chris Lemmon, organizer of BUSH Day, called "enjoyable and very successful."

There is another truck load of bushes to be planted between William Smith Hall and the Library tomorrow morning at 10 a.m. The land is already tilled, but the rain kept it from being planted.

"It was quite unfortunate that there weren't enough faculty involved, but that may have been due to the rain" said Lemmon. About 25 different people helped to plant and till the ground outside Hodson Hall. "I wish more people would have shown up—it was a rather disappointing turn-out. Maybe this Saturday we'll have a better work force" says Young. Lemmon said he hopes there will not be any damage to the new bushes.

The rain, however, did not stop the bands Number One Dog and Off The Wall from playing. Though the party wagon survived the rain, the outdoor buffet was held inside.

U.S. Senator Biden to discuss SALT II Thursday

Washington College News Bureau

Joseph R. Biden, Jr., United States Senator from Delaware, will discuss "SALT II and United States Security" at the William James Forum of Washington College on Thursday, October 11. The meeting, which is open to the public, is scheduled to begin at 8:30 p.m. in Hynson Lounge.

Senator Biden received nationwide attention last August when he led a delegation of six United States Senators— members of the European Affairs Subcommittee—to Moscow to discuss SALT II with Alexei Kosygin and other members of the Supreme Soviet.

As a member of the Senate Intelligence Committee as well as the influential Foreign Relations Committee, Senator Biden is in an especially strong position to weigh the pros and cons of the proposed SALT II treaty and is regarded as one of the best informed senators on this subject.

Senator Biden, a Democrat, was elected to the Senate in 1972 when he was still only 29 years old—the youngest man ever elected to the U.S. Senate. Shortly before taking office his wife was fatally injured in an automobile accident. He has since remarried, and was elected to a second term in the Senate in 1978.

In addition to this interest in foreign affairs, the junior Delaware Senator introduced the "Sunset Bill," passed by the Senate in 1975, which aims at curbing wasteful federal spending and requires a thorough review of federal spending programs every four years.

He is a strong advocate of the strengthening of criminal laws to combat violent crime, an ardent conservationist and a champion of the rights of senior citizens.

A resident of Wilmington, Senator Biden is a graduate of the University of Delaware and the Law School of Syracuse University.

Silver announces internship program

Students interested in participating in the Maryland General Assembly internship program next semester are urged to attend a meeting on Monday, October 8 at 4 p.m. in Smith 14. Those students who are interested in the program but are unable to attend the meeting should contact Dr. Howard Silver as soon as possible.

The General Assembly internship program provides the opportunity for students to gain first-hand knowledge of the legislative process and Maryland politics. Students spend two days a week in Annapolis during the legislative session, which runs from January 10 to mid-April, working for a state legislator.

The program is open to Juniors and Seniors in all Majors with a GPA of 2.5 or better. Political Science 311 or 391 is required to be eligible for the program.

Two course credits are given for successful completion of the internship. A regularly scheduled seminar, with assigned readings and written work, will be part of the program. Students must arrange their own transportation to and from Annapolis. A stipend to cover expenses is provided by the legislator.

Silver, who initiated the college's participation in the program in 1977, said he looks forward to "another successful learning experience for those who participate."

Montaigne scholar to speak Thursday

Donald M. Frame, Moore Collegiate Professor at Columbia University, will give a talk entitled "Motives for Self-Portrayal: Montaigne and Others" on Thursday, October 11 at 8 p.m. in the Sophie Kerr Room of Miller Library at Washington College. His talk is sponsored by the Lecture Committee and the public is invited to attend.

Frame will examine the process by which Montaigne came to write about himself and why he chose the essay rather than a narrative form. He will also situate the Essays within the autobiographical tradition by comparing them to the writings of Saint-Augustine, Rousseau, Dostoyevski and Camus.

Frame was educated at Loomis School, Harvard College and Columbia University. He taught at Loomis School for two years before beginning his graduate work at Columbia, and except for three years of active duty as an officer in the United States Navy, he has been teaching at Columbia since 1938. He also has been a Visiting Professor at New York University, the University of Pennsylvania, Fordham University, Rutgers University and a Phi Beta Kappa Visiting Scholar.

Frame is condsidered to be the most eminent Montaigne scholar of our time in America. His interpretation of Montaigne and the Essays is the result not only of long and penetrating research but also of a profound kinship with Montaigne. Few scholars know the text of the Essays as thoroughly as he does.

Frame is the author of four books on Montaigne as well as a brilliant translation of the works of the learned essayist. Through these and his numerous articles and book reviews concerning French literature of the Renaissance, he has had a decisive influence on Montaigne scholarship in the United States. His most recent book is entitled François Rabelais: A Study.

Frame has served for a number of years on the Editorial Committee of the Modern Language Association of America and on the National Humanities Faculty Board.

Bronze figures on exhibit Sunday

A collection of bronze figures by the French sculptor Antoine-Louis Marye will be exhibited in Gibson Fine Arts Center beginning Sunday, October 7 from 2 to 4 p.m. Refreshments will be served.

The two-week exhibit also will be open on Tuesdays and Thursdays, October 9, 11, 16, and 18 from 4 to 6 p.m., Sunday, October 14 from 2 to 4 p.m., and the evening of a concert on October 9.

Marye was one of the major Romantic artists of the 19th century and was best known for his work depicting wild and domestic animals. Born in Paris in 1796, he was trained as a sculptor and goldsmith, later turned to doing animals in bronze and became a master of the art.

Twenty-two figures representing some of the best of his work will be shown. The College art exhibits committee arranged for the show from The Baltimore Museum of Art with the support of the Maryland Arts Council.

Chamber orchestra to perform Tuesday

The Concerto Soloists of Philadelphia; a Chamber orchestra, will perform in Gibson Fine Arts Center in the opening program of the College concert series on Tuesday, October 9 at 8:30 p.m.

This ensemble of fifteen strings, harpsichord and flute, under the direction of Marc Mostovoy, is making a return engagement following a performance here two years ago.

Other programs in the 1979-1980 season will feature The Elizabethan Broken Consort, six musicians from the Baltimore early-music group Pro Musica Rara, on November 15; and violinist Isidor Saslav in a recital with Ann Heiligman Saslav at piano and harpsichord on January 30.

Also, the well-known classical guitarist Oscar Ghiglia, on February 19; and Bolcom and Morris, piano and mezzo soprano, in a program of American popular songs from the early 1900's, on March 19.

All concerts will be held in the Gibson Fine Arts Center at 8:30 p.m. Students are reminded to present their season tickets for admission.

* Swarthmore shuts out Shoremen, * Volleyball Tournament opens today **********

by RICH SCHATZMAN
Sports Editor

"They are the best team we've played so far, but we're going to have to play a lot better if we're going to beat Haverford or Ursinus," said Coach Athey after Saturday's 4-0 drubbing at the hands of Swarthmore College.

The statistic that gives the best indication of how the contest went is the one that shows Swarthmore having twenty shots-on-goal compared to Washington's four. With plenty of games left to play in this season, the Shoremen will have to shake off their defeat quickly. Albright College will invade Shore country this Saturday and it will no doubt be a better game than last week's. It will be the last home game for three weeks, so take a walk out to the field Saturday afternoon.

Keyser, Lucas lead harriers to victory

by ROB UNGER

Freshman Peter Keyser and sophomore Jeff Lucas tied for first to lead the Washington College cross country team to an 18-37 victory over Coppin State in the season opener last Saturday.

"We were very pleased because we do not win many," said Coach Don Chatelier. Chatelier explained that he only expected to win one or two meets during the season. A poor turnout and the inability to recruit "outstanding" runners were cited by Chatelier as key factors. According to the rules, a team must have five runners finish the race in order to score. Washington's team consists of only six. Furthermore, superior runners usually overlook Division III schools because they cannot offer athletic scholarships.

Ironically in this era of increased interest in running, the number of runners competing for W.C. has decreased. Until four or five years ago, the cross country team attracted at least fourteen runners per season. It is believed that many joggers enjoy their own leisurely pace and do not want to bother with competitions. When the team works out, Chatelier notes, they often pass many of the same people everyday.

"Working on our own sense of personal accomplishment, we try to do as well as we can as individuals", says Chatelier, summarizing the team's philosophy.

However, Pete Keyser approaches it differently. "We thrive on raw humor and a sort of external, verbal humbleness which feeds us internal strength", he says.

The team will continue its season with their next meet tomorrow against Gallaudet and Western Maryland in Washington.

On a brighter note, this weekend marks the opening of the Washington College Invitational Women's Volleyball Tournament. The five-team field consists of Juniata, Franklin and Marshall, Essex Community College, Gallaudet, and Washington. Head coach Penny Fall feels that Juniata has to be the favorite in the tourney. "They were an M.A.C. (Middle Atlantic Conference) finalist last year and they have everybody back," said Fall. "However, without our injuries, we would have probably been a co-favorite."

The injuries Fall refers to were suffered by co-captains Sue Bennett and Tami Schauber. Bennett is suffering from a respiratory condition that forbids her to participate in strenuous activity. Schauber has an anterior compartment syndrome—an inflamation in the front of her lower leg. It will require surgery and she will be out for at least three weeks and quite possibly the rest of the season. Cheryl Loss will have the inevitable task of trying to fill Schauber's shoes. "Cheryl has played very well lately and I look for her to continue playing the volleyball she has played so far," said Coach Fall. "In fact, all the girls have adapted to the injury problem quite well. Their concentration level has been extremely high and they've all shown a lot of character."

The ladies showed this character last Monday night when they played Catonsville Junior College, a team ranked sixth in the nation in Junior College Volleyball. It was their first match without Schauber, and although they lost by what seems to be topsided 15-6 and 15-7 scores, the two games lasted for over an hour. The Shorewomen then turned around and clobbered Penn State-York 15-2 and 15-5.

It will be very interesting to see how the team performs this weekend against not only four fine Volleyball teams, but also against the adversity that has befallen the team due to injury. "Every team in the tourney is capable of winning it and I'm looking forward to seeing some super Volleyball," commented an excited Fall.

"Every President since Kennedy has known that there has been a minimum of 5,000 and as many as 22,000 Russian troops in Cuba since the missile crisis," said Senator Joe Biden (D-Del.) last night. Despite e competing with the second game of the World Series, the noted SALT II proponent drew an audience of more than 75 people to Hynson Lounge last night, where he predicted, among other things, a probable defeat in the Senate for SALT II and a Republican in the White House in 1980.

Board approves clause in faculty handbook

by GEOFF GARINTHER
Editor-in-chief

"My reaction is one of disappointment," said Dr. Frank Creegan, the faculty representative to the Board of Visitors and Governors, after the Board last Saturday apparently dismissed the faculty's request for the formation of a joint committee to study procedure should "financial exigency" arise.

Board Chairman Robert H. Roy, contacted Tuesday, said that a formal reply addressing both the "financial exigency" issue and the requested facultysalary increase had been drafted and would be sent to the faculty later in the week.

The "financial exigency" clause became an issue at the September faculty meeting where several professors expressed disappointment that the clause had been inserted in their handbook by the Board without any discussion with faculty. The faculty then approved the formation of an ad-hoc committee to draft a letter expressing their objections, which the Board received Saturday.

Apparently the controversial clause, said to have been voted on by the Board in executive session last February, was never actually approved by the Board. Saturday, the Board members voted unanimously in favor of a motion to retain the clause.

"The Board will determine "financial exigency," said Roy at the meeting. "If such a determination should ever (become necessary), good will will prevail to the maximum degree."

Creegan later said, "Given the fact that the Board had not approved the by-laws at the February meeting, this was an excellent opportunity to express the faculty's objections' He was disappointed, however, saying that, "a number of Board members misunderstood the request."

But Creegan added that the issue may not yet be resolved. "I think the Board made it clear that any future discussion should be directed at the administration."

Ayer highlights calendar

Homecoming will feature Philosophical Colloquium

by RITA McWILLIAMS

New events planned for Homecoming this year include two Philosophy Clubs on campus for a joint Philosophical Colloquim, skydivers to open the soccer game, and a yard-sale sponsored by the KENT-QUEEN ANNE Alumni Chapter. In addition, the traditional sporting events, parties, parade, and dance will be held.

The Fullerton CLub of Philadelphia and the Washington College Philosophy Club are meeting here Saturday, October 27th for three discussion sessions. The highlight of the Colloquim will be at 3 pm in William Smith Lecture Hall when the prominent British philosopher Sir Alfred Ayer will speak on "Hume's Theory of Morals, Politics, and Religion." Earlier in the day, Hans-Martin Sans of Ruhr University will lead a discussion concerning "Technological and Human Values," and Joseph Magolis of Temple University will talk on "Culture, Nature, and Person."

Homecoming will be formally launched on Friday night with a volleyball quad-match. The Washington College Volleyball team will be competing with Hood, Notre Dame, and West Chester State. Immediately following, Alpha Chi Omega Sorority will sponsor a bon-

College seeks alternate funding sources

by BONNIE NELLE DUNCAN

The Department of Housing and Urban Development's third rejection of Washington College's bid for a loan has forced the school to look elsewhere for funds to complete Hill Dorm renovation this summer, according to Washington College Vice President for Finance Gene Hessey.

The Maryland Higher Education Facilities Program, which makes "borrowed funds" available to in-state colleges for renovation and the purchase of new equipment, may be one source of funds, Hessey indicated. "We may also submit a proposal to a coupie of foundations. We have to give up on HUD for the time being if we want to get anything done this coming summer although if we are unable to get enough funds from other sources, we may re-apply to HUD in the next fiscal year," he added.

Hessey does not know on what grounds Washington's request for a HUD loan was denied since the College has not yet received an official report from the Department. United States Senator from Maryland Paul Sarbanes released to the state organization of private colleges, of which Washington is a member, the names of the only three schools that received affirmation to their HUD loan requests this fall, and Washington was not among these.

Several professors see need for new computer

by PETE TURCHI
News Editor

In recent years, an increasing number of Washington College faculty members have expressed their desire for a larger, more modern computer to replace the school's ten-year-old IBM 1130. In an article last week, Computer Science Professor William Schmoldt said that there would be great advantage in getting a more modern computer for students in the social and natural sciences, as well as for those students in computer courses. This article, the second in a two-part series, presents the opinions held be some faculty members in the social and natural sciences on the subject of the school's computer facility.

"It would be great."

That comment, by Chairman of the Economics DepartmentMichael Bailey, summarizes the reaction that many Washington faculty members have when presented with the idea of a new computer. "I think it would be marvelous," Bailey continued. "I teach several courses that require use of the computer, and there are a lot of things we can't do with the existing facilities."

Bailey said that many statistical programs that he would like to use require a much larger memory than that of the IBM 1130. "I urge the Economics majors to take the computer science course before their senior year," he said. Still, the machine itself places restrictions on what he can accomplish.

Bailey said that there are three reasons his department would like a new computer: it could be used more than the 1130 currently is in teaching, as it would allow greater student-computer interaction; department members could use it for research; and students could use it for their own projects. "I'd like to use it a lot more in my classes," he said. "Right now Bill Schmoldt helps a lot of the students...he helps us do a lot that we couldn't do otherwise." Chairman of the Psychology Department Michael Goldstein agreed that "Schmoldt has been just dynamite—but there are limits to his time." He added that when potential employers inquire as to the computer facilities at Washington, the members of the Psychology Department "say the people in the computer center are so good that it makes up for the computer."

Currently the department uses a micro-processor to store data. The data is printed out, then it must be punched onto cards for the computer. Some new computers would make it possible to hook up the micro-processor so that data could be fed straight through to the Whatever happened to the Academic Report?

In the Spring of 1977, the Student Academic Board released the 22-page Academic Report, an evaluation from the students' viewpoint of academic life at Washington College. Last Monday, this year's SAB met for the first time. In the two-and-a-half years in between, the SAB has done little to follow-up or expand upon the Academic Report.

The Report described the College as "academically stagnant," attempted to identify the problems, and offered some solutions for this "lack of direction." Among the recommendations were expansion of the career counseling program and revision of the freshman orientation program, both of which have since been accomplished by the administration.

But phrases like "intellectually passive" are still being used across campus to describe the atmosphere of the College. What has the SAB done to enliven academic life here since the Report's release? It has, to its credit, suppressed a movement among students that sought to do away with senior requirements. But little else has been done during the past two years.

Where should this year's SAB begin? Gathering student opinion concerning the institution of an English composition course, a need the Report said was "embarrasingly plain," might be the place to start.

SAB discusses Vandalism Report at first meeting

by MELANIE PULLEN

The Student Academic Board elected officers and discussed the faculty report on vandalism, violence and theft at their meeting September 23.

"Vandalism, Violence, and Theft: A Report to the Faculty" is the result of a study last semester by Ad-Hoc Committee Chairman Robert Day, and members John Conklin, John Klaus, and John Taylor. The report stated on page 16, "the committee views acts of vandalism as symbolic protests against what might be a relatively undemanding course load." It also stated that, "the freedom to explore on a voluntary basis a number of cultural and intellectual experiences is viewed as empty time, and in spite of a panoply of concerts, lectures, and films, the students complain that there is nothing to do."

In response to this, one SAB member at the meeting said, "It sounds to me like they don't want us to party at all. Social life is also a part of the learning process. We need a student union because really we have no place to spend what leisure time that we have." Another SAB member said, "They want to make the courses tougher so that the students have no time."

In reference to page 19 of the report, which stated that the rhythms of the community "have more to do with lacrosse games and Thursday night at the Tavern than with course preparations," a SAB member said, "Why can't both of these things be a part of our college program?"

Page 17 of the report stated, "The faculty should be aware that many of our students regard our academic program as easy—one where A's are difficult to earn, but where dull and lazy students can pass (and even earn C's and B's) with ease. F's are more difficult to earn than A's." In response to this an SAB member said, "This survey must have been based on a small minority of people."

Some members of the SAB said they feel that alcohol is not the cause of vandalism, but a symptom of the problem. If more restrictions are placed on the students they will have a rebellious attitude. Some members of the Board also felt that the treatment of people put on academic probation is too lax. Some members also said that there is not enough interaction between faculty and students.

A committee, headed by Nina Tocci with members Jake Parr, Peter Bertram, Bernard Kelley and Judi Beschal, was formed to respond and propose alternatives to the report.

The SAB's plans for this year include a discussion of the need for more business administration courses, the necessity and practicality of senior requirements, changes in the four course curriculum and its effect on student academics, and the idea of co-teaching interdisciplinary courses.

Brian Seigal was elected Vice-President, and Judi Beshel was elected Secretary. The SAB is headed by Student Government Vice-President Paul Drinks.

The Board, is a liason for the student body and faculty at Washington College concerning academics. It's function is to gain more student input into the academic decisions of the college and to find out the students feelings about the academics offered.

The SAB meets this Monday night in William Smith Hall.

computer on the magnetic tape used by the smaller machine. Although Goldstein would like to be able to do this, he added, "I don't want to imply that the new computer has to have that ability."

He said that his students "simply cannot do the kind of analysis demanded by present psychological professional standards with the current computer. It does have some effect on hiring."

The Psychology Department presently averages from 27-30 majors, over 50 percent of whom, according to Goldstein, take some computer science course. "We would like them all to have some degree of computer science sophistication," he said, "not only for departmental work, but because they're good employment skills. As an educator, it seems to me very clear that a modern student these days needs to know about...computer science, and the present facilities cannot handle the number of students we need to introduce to the machine."

Goldtein said that he feels that of all the departments that use the computer should be consulted before any definite plans are made, and suggested that a committee be formed to advise the College on the needs for a new computer.

Dr. Richard Brown, Chairman of the Department of Mathematics and Computer Science, is the man who would take a final proposal to Dean of the College Garry Clarke. Brown said that he and Schmoldt "will make sure that every department that has a real interest in this is solicited. We should then simply make a proposal for that particular computer that will meet our academic needs." When asked his opinion onthe matter Brown said, "There is no question. It is a fact that we need a new computer."

A new machine would, according to Professor of Political Science Howard Silver, "broaden the alternatives for teaching techniques." He said that he does not use the computer a lot now, but that's because the IBM equipment the College has cannot handle the statistical packages made by the American Political Science Association. More political analysis is being done, and it would be good for the students to be able to do some of that."

Professor of Sociology Steven Cades also said that he uses the computer "very little now, because for sociologists the computer is principally a tool, and the machine we have is sufficiently slow that we need a highly-skilled operator. The time it takes for us to solve problems that sociologists would solve make the computer virtually inaccessible."

In the way of an example, Cades says that in a student survey he is currently working on he will have to give Schmoldt and Associate Director of the Computer Center Tom Lloyd a carefully-prepared list of questions and procedures, "because they know how to use the machine to get the results I would like for students to be able to do it themselves, but it would take a raft of computer courses for them to be able to do it on this machine."

Cades said that he has had the opportunity to use more modern computers and has found "they make possible exploration of questions whichfolks thought previously they couldn't ask." Also, after seeing other machines be said that he would like to see the College's financial resources used on "one large machine as opposed to several smaller computers."

Cades added that he feels all liberal arts students should have some experience with a computer. "Five hundred years ago," he said, "literacy meant language. Two hundred years ago it meant mathematics and science. Now there is a third kind of literacy...so much of the world operates on the basis of the computer that we can choose to be a servant of the people who know the language, or we can try for some degree of computer literacy. We can't have that kind of literacy with the 1130. It's like trying to write with a stylus and clay tablets."

Goldstein: "As an educator, it seems to me very clear that a modern student these days needs to know about computer science, and the present facilities cannot handle the number of students we need to introduce to the machine."

"Third Century Fund" approved by Board

by GEOFF GARINTHER
Editor-in-Chief

The Board of Visitors and Governors last Saturday formally approved a fund-raising drivetermed the "Third Century Fund"—The first step in the long-awaited Bicentennial Campaign.

To be chaired by Board member Philip J. Wingate, the Campaign thus far includes the formation of a steering committee and the acquisition of John R. VcFarland as a consultant to the Third Century Fund.

McFarland is most recently President of the Johns Hopkins Fund during its $100 million campaign. He has served as Director of Development at Kalamzoo, Grinnell, and Allegheny Colleges, and has twice been employed by Ketchum, Inc. as a campaign consultant.

"He serves as a consultant to the Board, the President, and myself,"said Vice-President for Development George Hayward of McFarland. "He'll plan thestrategy and the calendar for a campaign."

The steering committee, which will be chaired by Philosophy Department Chairman Peter Tapke, was formed "to consider suggestions from all quarters of the College community about ways we should celebrate our Bicentennial," said Hayward.

No monetary goal has yet been set for the Campaign. "In any campaign, a number of prospects have to be analyzed," said Hayward. "Some of them will be approached for commitments to the Campaign. Until we can go through this procedure, we can't announce any goals."

Hayward said he hopes the Campaign can be launched by next Spring.

Adventurer John Goddard to speak October 22

by CLAIRE MOWBRAY

Monday, October 22 is a bad night for a lecture. Most of Washington College will be unpacking or out to dinner; some will probably still be at home, and at least two will be in the Bahamas. But there is a reason to be here that night, especially if you've ever seen a certain poster which reads "Life is either a daring adventure...or nothing", and had any reaction to it at all. John Goddard, the first man to explore the entire length of the Nile River by Kayak, will present a film of that expedition at 8 p.m., and will conduct a question-and-answer session afterwards. And if life can indeed be reduced to the above equation, John Goddard seems to be a man who tries to embody it.

His philosophy is reported to be: "To dare is to be...to fear is to fail." At age 15 he set for himself 127 goals, among them "to climb Mt. Vesuvius," "to explore the Congo River", "to write a book," and "to milk a poisonous snake." Since graduating from the University of Southern California, he has accomplished 106 of his goals, and in so doing has traveled more than one million miles, conducted 14 major expeditions, and studied 260 primitive tribes. In a Life magazine article he explains his obsession with travel and adventure. "When I was 15," he says, "all the advices I know seemed to complain, 'Oh, if I'd only done this or that when I was younger.' They had let life slip by them. I was sure that if I planned for it, I could have a life of excitement and fun and knowledge."

"Kayaks Down The Nile" will be presented Monday, October 22, at 8 p.m. in William Smith Auditorium. It is a 95-minute film, sponsored by the Washington College Lecture Series.

Want to learn to light a match with a .22 rifle? John Goddard has done that too.

Clarke on vandalism: "a quiet year so far"

by GINGER KURAPKA

"It has been a quiet year so far, with little damage," said Dean Garry Clarke in his report to the faculty October 2nd, on the administration's reaction to the Vandalism Report.

Due to the Report, Somerset has been separated into three dorms, and "things are quieter," said Clarke. Freshman orientation was "more academic in nature, and there was more emphasis on rules and regulations," he added. RA's checked each student into his room, and according to Dean of Students Maureen Kelley, "There was more stress on the RA's role as the one who needs to maintain order, and they were given a greater sense of responsibility for the general atmosphere in the dorms."

More trash cans have been added on campus around Miller Library and the women's dorms, and still more will be placed in Hodson Hall and around the men's dorms. This year there are five "academic" interest areas": In addition to the Spanish House, Richmond House and the language and the two writers' suites, in the new dorms have been added. Clarke also said that,

"Local police have been conducting regular speed checks on College Avenue."

The Student Government Association and the Student Affairs Committee are revising the Student Judiciary Board. Until that revision is complete the Student Affairs Office will handle matters of discipline. "It's been primarily freshmen so far, and I think acting quickly has had an effect (on those involved)."

Kelley said she would like to see more recreational facilities available to the students. "One of the problems is that there aren't many things for kids to do on campus to get out of the dorms," said Kelley. Improvements such as lights on the tennis courts, lighted basketball courts and a game room will be considered. "Ideally, it would be nice to have a new Student Center," added Kelley.

"The problem (of vandalism) has been lessened," concluded Kelley, "although realistically there tends to be more of a problem in the colder months when there's less to do. But so far this year things have been very good."

fire in the Kent quad.Student Government Association Social Chairman Bill Baldwin is attempting to secure Cowboy Junkies to perform at the bonfire. A registration party for the visiting alumni will also be held on Friday night in the Alumni House.

Saturday begins with the Homecoming parade and Faculty Challenge Run at 10 1m. Bob Hockaday, SGA Treasurer and organizer of the parade, says "I'd like to see a lot of student participation especially from the Greek organizations." Prizes are set at $50 for first, $25 for second and third. The prizes may be doubled by the Senate before Homecoming. Anyone interested in entering a float in the parade should talk to Hockaday before the 20th.

This will be the second year for the Faculty Challenge, organized by Reference Librarian Jeri Chaffin. The Challenge consists of a faculty-student-alumni five mile run. Dr. Richard Gillan placed first in the run last year. Anyone interested in entering the race, either individually or in a relay team, should contact Chaffin in the library.

New to Homecoming is the Alumni Chapter yardsale. It will begin at 10:30 on the quad in front of Bill Smith, directly across from the Alumni House. Money from the sale will go toward the Alumni Scholarship Fund.

The Washington College Crew Team will row against the Naval Academy at noon on Saturday. The Shoreman Soccer Team will play the Blue Jays of Johns Hopkins at 1:30 with sky-divers to begin the game. Half-time entertainment will be provided by the U.S. Army Percussion Drill Team. The Cross Country Team meets Lebanon Valley and Western Maryland at 2 p.m.

Two Varsity-Alumni sports events are scheduled – lacrosse at 10:45 in the upper field, and crew competion will follow at 2:15 at the boathouse.

The Alumni-Faculty Cocktail Buffet will be held from 6 to 9 in Hynson Lounge featuring the Rich DeFreepo Trio The SGA closes the weekend with an all-campus dance, beginning at 9, featuring Koffee Bean, a Baltimore-based top-forty band.

Jay Vogel, Director of Alumni Affairs, stresses the importance of student participation. "The success of Homecoming has always been dependent on student involvement." He said, "the focus is on the present students, while encouraging Alumni, especially the recent graduates, to come back."

Vandalism returns over weekend

by PETE TURCHI
News Editor

Several acts of vandalism last weekend resulted in damage to both school and private property.

The first incident occurred Saturday night when, according to a Kent House RA, the Lance Company's vending machine on the first floor of that building was broken into. Two Kent residents identified the vandal as a student from the Worcester dormatory and later that night the same student was seen with two others in that same area. The RA said that he heard the three talking, then heard one of them rip the inter-campus phone off of the wall.

Another Kent House RA saw the same student outside of Kent at about three a.m. He said that one of the vandals said they were merely "re-arranging" an outdoor stage, which lay on the ground in pieces.

Another incident occurred Sunday night when a male guest of two Kent residents broke some bottles in a first-floor hallway and beat in a door with a hammer.

On a larger scale, Associate Dean of Students Ed Maxcy said that he received reports of mailboxes that had been tampered with over the weekend. He said that one student found her mail opened and lying on the floor, and another student found an open envelope from home from which a check had apparently been stolen. Maxcy said that students whose mailboxes have no glass in the front have complained before about missing mail. The damaged boxes were to have been repaired this summer, but parts were not available. Central Services Director Thomas Shreck suggested to the Dean that new mailboxes be bought and placed at a location more convenient for Central Services, and where the boxes would stand less chance of being tampered with. Although the cost of the new boxes would be substantial, Maxcy said that the College "owes it to students to protect their mail."

Maxcy also said that one reason for the mailbox vandalism this weekend might have been that there was a function held in the Coffee House Saturday night. He has suggested that the SGA begin supervising events held there as well as those held in the cafeteria.

The Dean says that the nine students are on disciplinary probation so far this year for vandalism or drunkeness, and three students have been given official warnings. With the Student Judiciary Board currently being revised by the SGA, the Deans are acting in the Board's stead. Maxcy says that "the majority of the people we have seen have been freshman men—they do not seem to realize that their reason for being here is academic."

Franklin and Marshall wins it

Spikers shutout in WC Tournament

by MARK NASER

The women's volleyball team did not fare well in last weekend's Washington College Invitational Volleyball Tournament. The women were 0-4, but Coach Penny Fall was "not surprised at the outcome of the weekend, losing Tammy (Schauber), and not having much opportunity to work together as a unit."

So far this season, the women have lost both of their co-captains: Sue Bennett to a lung ailment and Schauber to a leg injury. That leaves current co-captains Mandy Scherer and Darlene Coleman with some big shoes to fill. Fall, however, does not seem flustered. "Darlene and Mandy, when they get adjusted to their new roles as co-captains, will help settle things down. I think that the upheaval will diminish and we can settle into an every-day pattern."

The inconsistency Fall talked about showed at times last weekend. They opened against Gallaudet, which Fall called a "good team." The match went three games, (4-15, 15-4, 1-15). In the rubber game, the women never quite got rolling. This was perhaps their most inconsistent match of the Tournament.

The next match, however, was their best. Against eventual Tourney-winner Franklin and Marshall, it lasted 1 hour, 45 minutes. The first game was a WC win, 17-15. The F&M women swept the last two, 12-15 and 10-15.

Saturday's matches were no more successful. The first game against Juniata College was close. WC was tied at 10 behind a couple of forceful spikes by Cheryl Loss and two nice blocks by Scherer. But they lost the next three points and eventually the game by a score of 11-15. The next game was not even close After rallying to a 6-4 lead, the spikers scored no more points, and lost the game 15-4, and the match.

The next match, against Essex Community College, went three games but resulted in another Shore loss. The first game saw the women pull ahead 8-0 on the services of Coleman, Julie Wheeler, Scherer. Loss added a couple of spikes, but Essex rallied and the game was tied at 12. Essex went on to record a 15-13 victory. The Shore won the next game 15-6 on some nice team play, with Ann Most digging several spikes and Joan Burri placing some soft shots in between opponents. Scherer and Colemen also played well, but Essex retaliated by winning the third game, 15-7.

Fall stated that "They did not show me much consistency in this tournament. We now have a young team rather than the veteran team that we thought we had. This is why I had the tournament so early in the season. We can pick up on our mistakes and hopefully turn this into a decent year. Right now, we are underdogs, but if we stay healthy and play as a team, we can go far in the final tournament."

Fall, looking back on the tournament, thanked "the Dining Hall and the friends of Women Athletes" for helping to make this tournament a "top-notch" affair. She hopes that in the future it will be the "best on the Eastern Shore."

Judicial reform, vandalism report discussed by SGA

by KATHY WURZBACHER

Last Monday's Student Government Association meeting, focused on the reports of the Judicial Reform Committee, the Vandalism Report Committee, a proposal for a new computor, and a motion to renew intermural football this fall.

The "first reforms the Judicial Reform Committee has decided on concern the jury," according to Tim Connor, co- chairman. The committee has decided on a board of eight to act as the Jury, and each case should have five board members on it.

The Committee to answer the Faculty Report on Vandalism, Violence and Theft, met and several decisions were made, according to Chairman David Fitzsimons. The committee suggested that "senators and RA's have to meet with students to get feed-back" on the vandalistic conditions. The committee is putting out an open letter to the faculty to come to the next meetings to be held before the next SGA meeting. "Once the committee has something concrete to say, they will comment on the Report in more detail," says Fitzsimons.

The SGA voted to support the effort of Professor William Schmolt to buy a new computor for the school. Acquiring the new computor could "possibly create four of five new courses" says SGA Treasurer Bob Hockaday.

There was a proposal to start intramural football again this Fall. The SGA voted and decided to sponsor the games if insurance matters do not interfere.

Board denies one faculty request, to study another

"Exigency" clause retained, salary increases "studied"

by GEOFF GARINTHER
Editor-in-Chief

The Board of Visitors and Governors has denied one faculty request, for the formation of a joint committee to establish procedure should "financial exigency" arise, and sent another to committee, where an increase in faculty salaries will be studied.

Both requests had been approved unanimously at the October faculty meeting and sent to the Board for consideration at its October 6th meeting.

The request for the joint committee followed the Board's insertion in the faculty handbook of a clause that allows for the termination of tenured professors should "financial exigency" arise. The second request called for a five percent "emergency supplement" to faculty salaries in January, and a further twenty percent increase by next year

Roy Responds

Board Chairman Rob Roy responded to both issues in a letter to Faculty Secretary Amzie Parcell dated October 10th. Writing that, "the faculty has been alarmed, we think unnecessarily, because no change in policy is intended," Roy outlined two reasons for the Board's denial of the request:

1. Members of the Board are trustees of Washington College and by law have the responsibility for the College's welfare. We cannot delegate or share our proper responsibility with others.

2. The Board believes that attempts to define "financial exigency" or to explicate special procedures would be neither feasible nor wise. Just as in the past, primary consideration will be given to the rights of each individual with equity and good will as desiderata. Whenever possible, and unless doing so would injure the rights of the individual, there will be no communication in advance of action but this should not be interpreted as a sharing of final responsibility, reposed by law in the Visitors and Governors and delegated by them to the Administration of the College.

Salaries of "primary importance"

Turning to the salary increase issue, Roy wrote that the faculty's request had not been acted upon because it called for "commitments which cannot be made without a careful study ..."

"The Board realizes that Faculty and Staff salaries are of primary importance and has charged the Committee on Budget and Finance with the task of making such a study," continued Roy. "You may assure your colleagues that the study will be made with em-

Calendar, exams shortened in proposals

by GEOFF GARINTHER
Editor-in-Chief

The Academic Council has sent to the faculty for consideration at its meeting Monday night proposals concerning the shortening of both the academic calendar and final examinations.

Another proposal currently under consideration in the Council would allow students who do not attend the first class meeting of a course, or students who wish to enroll after the first meeting, to be admitted to the course only at the discretion of the professor. This proposal may go to the faculty at its December meeting.

13-14 week semester

The first of the proposals to be considered at Monday's meeting states that, "The Academic Calendar shall consist of two semesters, each not less than thirteen nor more than fourteen weeks (exclusive of orientation periods, vacations, and final examinations)." Currently, each semester must be at least 14 weeks long

This first proposal would, according to Dean of the College Garry Clarke, "provide a certain amount of flexibility" in his attempt to start the first semester after Labor Day.

According to the calendar proposed by Clarke for first semester next year, freshmen would arrive on September 4th, classes would begin on September 8th and end on December 12th, and the last final would be on December 20th. The calendar eliminates the five day Fall Break, but provides for a "Fall weekend" October 24-26. It also eliminates one of the two advising days.

If the faculty approves the proposal to shorten the semester, Clarke said that "in effect, they would be endorsing this new calendar."

Clarke added that shortening the academic calendar, however, wouldn't solve all the problems with the first semester, because in 1981 Labor Day falls on September 7th.

Two-hour finals

The second proposal to be considered Monday at the faculty meeting states that "Final examinations are not more than two hours in duration.

"I have personally found," said Clarke, "that I can find out enough about a student during a course so that I don't need a three-hour final, and I think a lot of faculty members feel this way."

If the faculty approves this proposal, Clarke said he plans to request a reinstatement of the policy that allowed students with more than two exams in one day to request special examinations. Any decisions on such requests would then be up to the discretion of the professor.

Under consideration

Still being considered in the Council is a proposal that would require students to attend the first class meeting in a course if they wish to remain enrolled in it. The professor would decide it a student should remain in the course after missing its first meeting. A second part of the same proposal would leave admittance to students wishing to add a course during the two-week drop/add period up to the discretion of the professor.

Halloween "battle" causes $200 damage

What started as a traditional Halloween "battle" between fraternities turned into what many were calling "The War" by the end of Tuesday night. Three students were picked up and released by local police, another was taken to Kent-Queen Anne's Hospital after catching a piece of flying glass in his eye (he was not seriously injured), and an estimated $200 in damage was done to Middle Hall and Little House.

At a special RA meeting Wednesday afternoon, fraternity leaders agreed to organize a fund-raising cocktail party in Hynson Lounge next Friday after Registration to pay for the damages.

Despite small numbers, blacks feel little pressure

by KATHERINE STRECKFUS
Assistant Editor

Although black students comprise only one percent of the student body, they say they have experienced little or no racial discrimination at Washington College.

There are seven black students out of a total enrollment of 719 this semester. Of the seven, there are four freshmen, two transfers, and one senior.

Although their reasons for choosing Washington College vary, most of the students say that academics was the major factor in their decision. Freshman Vance Morris, a Kent House resident and a Senator in the Student Government Association, said that the small percentage of black students here "didn't make any difference because I came here for an education. The main reason I chose it is because it is a good school."

Senior Nina Tocci said that she did not investigate the percentage of black students at the College before enrolling, because she "didn't want that to interfere with my education. The fact that it is all white wouldn't have deterred me."

Freshman Dave Blackwell said that he chose WC because he can combine academics and sports here. He wants to play basketball, but "go for the education first." Victor Davis, a freshman transfer, said, "I transferred for sports, I want to play soccer, and I heard it was good in lacrosse."

Other reasons mentioned for choosing Washington College included its location, size, and cost. Freshman Sandra Danner said, "I wanted to come to a small college. It's a good distance from home."

Restoring respect

"I can get into a little petty vandalism once in a while, but this hardcore stuff has got to stop."

That statement, as laughable as it seemed when it was overheard in a serious conversation a few weeks ago, would have been almost welcome in the wake of Tuesday night's Halloween festivities. Eggs were thrown at RA's' a fire extinguisher was shot at a professor, and an estimated $200 in damage was done before the night was over.

Even more damaging than the monetary costs is the cost to student self-image. RA's at the scene of the "battle" later reported that the situation was uncontrollable, and several said they feared physical harm. Students evidently are losing respect for each other, their faculty, and the administration.

Fraternity leaders have taken one step toward repairing these losses. They've agreed to hold a cocktail party in Hynson Lounge next Friday for students and faculty to raise the funds for the damage done to Middle Hall and Little House. The next, and more difficult, step will be to prevent a repeat of Tuesday night.

Board of Censors requests list of College's films

by PETE TURCHI
News Editor

The Department of Licensing and Regulation of the Maryland Board of Censors has requested that Washington College submit a list of all films to be shown on campus.

Dean of the College Garry Clarke, who received the form letter that was sent to all colleges and universities in Maryland, said of the request that "I tend to think that our instructional program is none of their business. The film series here is given in conjunction with (Dr. Marty Kabat's) film class." Clarke went on to say that he has discussed the matter with a Dean at Western Maryland who has looked into the matter further.

The Board of Censors has said that the request does not apply to schools where no admission for the film is charged, and if the films are shown at no profit, as they are here, then the school may simply request an exemption form. The representitive from Western Maryland found out, however, that the Board would not send the necessary exemption forms until the list of films was submitted.

Clarke said that he's sure the Board of Censors "has the legal right to ask us for the list," but he doesn't "think it's any of their business." He said that there is one film in the series which may have attracted the attention of the Board, "but since that Misty Beethoven business is over I don't think we'd have anything to worry about anyway."

Clarke's official action to date has been to ignore the request, and he said that he has heard not more from the Department of Licensing and Regulation. "Every year they talk about getting rid of the Board of Censors, but they never do," he said. "It's just some silly remnant of victorian Maryland that they're trying to force on us."

College fund-raising efforts for the 1978-79 fiscal year brought in more than $1 million for the second consecutive year, according to Vice-President for Development George Hayward's report year. Hayward reported that when excluding bequests, the total is up by five percent over last year.

Gifts from alumni rose 72 percent, from $79,000 to $142,000. "We've tried to

Vandalism attracts student concern

I do not pretend to know in exact terms the extent of the vandalous acts committed recently on campus. But certainly I have heard and heard about quite a lot.

Monday night past some people thought it appropriate to drive a car in front of Reid and tear a door down. (At least that is the explanation I got of the loud noise that only sounded like five trash cans being run over.) Also, on the same night, someone stole 2 bottles of champagne out of a refrigerator in the Spanish House kitchen.

No matter how big or small a violent or suspicious act may be, I ask all reasonable-minded students to report anything you witness along these lines and, most importantly, not to turn your heads when you hear something going on that may seem destructive or vandalous. I know that most of you would prefer not to see these things happen—well, it won't get better by itself.

Faculty reaction

Reaction among faculty members to the Board's response seemed negative concerning the refusal of the proposed joint committee, but hopeful about the possibility of a salary increase. AAUP chapter President Michael Bailey said, "The letter indicates that they understand the faculty's financial problem, or at least have some sympathy for it."

But Bailey said the Board seemed to misunderstand the faculty's request for the joint committee. "The letter indicates that the Board thought the most important thing was the matter of procedure— of who would ultimately decide "financial exigency." It seems to me the faculty was more concerned for some kind of consultation on (what would happen after that decision.)

National AAUP responds

Bailey sent a copy of the Board's response to the national AAUP. He is still examining their detailed reply, but said that "one of the things that emerges out of the reading is that something ought to be set up ahead of time ...

"I think it would be in the interest of the College to set up procedures now, while there isn't a problem—the same way you put a roof on your house on a sunny day instead of waiting until it rains."

In the Board's interest

A set of procedures governing contractual and curricular changes in the event of financial exigency would actually work to the Board's favor, according to History Department Chairman Nate Smith, a former faculty representative to the Board.

"What we're preparing is really in the Board's interest, as well as the faculty's," said Smith. "What we offer them is a way to work out rules that, in effect, would bind the faculty no less than the administration.

"(But) they don't want to get into that. They want to rely on honorableness and trustworthiness, but honor and trust don't provide the assurances we need. Nobody that deals with labor relations would accept that — it's like a sword hanging over your head.

"What they're saying to us in that letter is that you've got to trust us with total discretion in the area of destroying tenured contracts," continued Smith. "The fact is that that's not the way business is done."

Most of the students said thy have not encountered racial prejudice or discrimination on the College. Tocci, who has attended WC since her freshman year in 1976-77, said, "If some students have prejudices against blacks, they haven't made it evident to me. I haven't seen any outward signs." In addition, she said, "Professors don't like some students anyway, so if they don't like me, I don't think it's because I'm black."

Although Danner attended a big school with a majority of black students, she said it was not difficult to adjust to WC. "It doesn't bother me. People are people. I think I have as many friends here as the white students."

Vincent Hynson, a resident of Chestertown, transferred from Valley Forge Christian College in Pennsylvania where he said there are about 12 blacks out of 500 students. He said the major difference for him between Valley Forge and Washington College is that "At Valley Forge, everybody knew everybody. Not living on campus here, I don't expect to know everybody." He added, "I find the professors here very helpful. I really do think it has got along with just about anybody."

Blackwell, however, said "there has been some name-calling and stuff but it really hasn't bothered me."

In addition, Davis described the "invisible stare," when "people not used to going to school with blacks look right past them and ignore them." He also said, "The kids I've met treat me fairly. I'm enjoying myself."

No statistics available

The total of six black freshmen and transfers is an increase over the number of black students accepted at Washington College in recent years. Director of Admissions Mickey DiMaggio said, however, that there are no statistics available. "We don't know how many black applications we get each year because we don't break it down into a minority thing. The yearend summaries of trends don't keep records of this," he said.

The Admissions Staff, therefore, does not know whether more blacks applied to the College or if a higher percentage was accepted than in recent years.

"We don't know why it has increased. We haven't recruited anymore," DiMaggio said. "The whole process ..."

Homecoming features variety of events

by RITA McWILLIAMS

Four men falling from the sky, the Three Mile Island Band, Mohammed Ali on the soccer field, and "the greatest living Philosopher" made for a memorable 1979 Washington College Homecoming.

The festivities began early Saturday morning with the faculty challenge 5-mile run opening the parade. Professor Sean O'Connor led the race. Reference Librarian Jeff Chaffin placed second and Kenny Merz came in third. Approximately fifty people participated in the race, which included four relay teams -- the Library, Talbot, Alpha Chi Omegas, and the Education Department.

Following the runners were a variety of fire engines and town sponsored groups. But the floats were the highlight of the parade. The Sigs won first place with the Three Mile Island Band playing their rendition of "Glow, little glowworm, fire, fire." Second place went to the Red Hots with their Three Mile Island float, and third place went to the Alpha Chi Omegas with a farm-themed float featuring a cow.

The soccer team defeated Johns Hopkins 1-0, while the cross country team lost to Lebanon Valley and Western Maryland. The Alumni Lacrosse team beat WC, 14-13. The Crew team finished a half-boat length in front of the alumni team.

Sir A.J. Ayer spoke to a packed audience in William Smith Hall to end a series of philosophical discussions attended by members of the Fullerton Club of Philadelphia and the Washington Philosophy Club.

The Rich DeProspo Trio performed at the Alumni-Faculty Buffet, which was followed by the Homecoming Dance. Koffeebean played to a large number of students and alumni.

Howard Hecht and Professor Timothy Maloney in rehearsal for "Tartuffe."

Tartuffe opens tonight in Tawes

by MIKE GARVEY

Tartuffe, by Moliere, will be the Drama Department production this Fall. A French classical comedy, the play centers on the antics of the title character who, as the French translation of his name suggests, personifies the hypocrite. Tartuffee manages to get himself into the good graces of the will-to-do Monsieur Orgon, who bestows upon Tartuffee gifts of food, clothing and maney money. He also promises his daughter in marriage. For many personal reasons, M. Orgon refuses to acknowledge Tartuffe's true nature until it is finally revealed by the other members of the household, who have been aware of it all along. The problem of hypocrisy with its political, social and religious implications is exposed.

Drama Department Chairman Timothy Maloney chose Tartuffe because of its "good style of those studying actively in the department to work in," Maloney said. "Anything out of the realistic or naturalistic style is a tylistic challenge." The production will utilize the full stage but, as is usual for the Department's shows, the audience will be reduced to half of the auditorium, so that, according to Maloney, "it doesn't look so barren."

Maloney, who last performed on the Washington College stage three years ago, will join the cast as Monsieur Orgon. Tartuffee will be played by Ted Legates. Five actors in the eleven-member cast have never before acted at Washington. Tartuffe, the first of three scheduled productions for the department this year, will run from November 2 through the 4.

Club allocations discussed at SGA meeting

by KATHY WIRZBACHER

At Monday's Student Government Association meeting, Chairman of the Organizations Committee Bob Hockaday reported on club allocations. Only about half the clubs were covered and the committee will meet again to finish the remaining allocations.

The French Club requested $100. "The money will be used for a French Film and field trips, primarily" said Hockaday. The main expense would be $50 for the film so the committee voted to give the French Club $50 for the year and the additional $50 ,if they get the film.

The Caving club requested $148.31. "The clubs major expense is gasoline because the best caves are some 3UU miles away, 600 miles round trip" said Hockaday. Some of the club members help with other expenses so the Committee voted to give the club the full request.

The Philosphy Society Constitution requested $50 each semester to cover speaker fees and office expenses. The Committee voted to give them "$25 for the remainder of the first semester and $50 for the second semester" said Hockaday.

The King Crab will receive the $150 they requested for printing costs.

The Table Tennis Club requested $60. They need the money for new nets in Queen Anne's tables, balls and prizes for the Fall semester Table Tennis Tournament.

Pvt. Wars, Lone Star: a pair of winners

by PETE TURCHI
News Editor

After about the first ten minutes of a play, it is usually obvious to the audience, the actors, and the director how well the show is going to go over. The audience at Center Stage last week watching Pvt. Wars and Lone Star by James McLure knew they were watching the winners.

Pvt. Wars immediately calls to mind the movie *M *A*S*H*. The first of the two one-act plays takes place on the outdoor terrace of a veterans hospital in 1973. While the play is funny in the way a very good television show or movie is funny, it is also deeper than that; it is a play that successfully deals with important subjects without taking itself too seriously.

Gately (Jamey Sheridan) seems to be the most emotionally stable of the three veterans, and he acts as a sounding board for Silvio (Vasili Bogazianos) and Natwick (Daniel Zitkie) for a good part of the play. It starts on a comic note and only later, after we have seen Silvio flash the nurses do we hear that he has had his genitals blown off by shrapnel; only after we have seen Natwick (reminiscent of Winchester on the TV series "M*A*S*H") as childish do we witness him admitting that he is an "asshole."

no deeper meaning. Although the comedy in the plays is not very original for the most part, it moves well enough to make the weaker jokes acceptable.

Lone Star is very much the same kind of play as Pvt. Wars but it focuses much more on two of its characters, brothers Roy (John Goodman) and Ray (Steve Rankin). Sitting behind Angel's Bar, Roy reminisces about his escapades before the Vietnam War, drinking, his 1959 pink Thunderbird convertible and Cletis (Billy Padgett).

This latter play echoes many things from the first; the same three characters are evident, though the names have been changed; one short scene is repeated almost identically; and both plays have a motto of sorts. Both of the mottos are time-worned expressions: "I don't want to talk about it," in the first play, and "Things just aren't the same anymore," in Lone Star.

The plays are similar in two other ways; they are both very crude and extremely funny. McLure's dialogue is quite explicit, but he uses the language as a fundamental part of character and few people in the audience seem offended by it.

McLure's two one-acts were staged for the first time at the Actors Theatre ble that the playwright could want any better response than the plays are currently receiving.

If for no other reason, it is worth the trip to Baltimore to see Barry Robison's set for Lone Star, complete from the spare tires lying in a pile to the old car seat, from the faded posters peeling off the walls to the weeds growing against the bar. Both plays were directed by Center Stage Artistic Director Stan Wojewodski, jr. and are running through November 25. Student Rush tickets are offered for $3 ($4 on weekends) one half hour before every show.

Shoremen on 8 out of 9 streak

by JOHN LONNQUEST

The Washington College soccer team has played nine games in the past month, winning eight and losing only one.

On October 4th the Shoremen beat Mary Washington 3-1 in Fredrickburg. They returned home on Saturday, October 6th to dominate Albright 2-0, and then headed back on the road to beat Washington Bible in the rain, 3-1. The only loss was at Haverford where the Shoremen dropped a tough one to their conference rivals, 1-0. The Shoremen quickly bounced back to beat Widener 4-0 in a very physical game. October 20th found the Shoremen at Fairleigh Dickenson University, where they won 3-2 on the strength of three first-half goals. Maintaining their winning ways, the Shoremen beat York 2-1 in overtime. Last Saturday's homecoming victory over Johns Hopkins and last Monday's 2-1 win over Ursinus completed the Shoremen's sweep.

Homecoming proved to be an exciting game as the Shoremen defeated Johns Hopkins 1-0. The weather was ideal, and the game was played in front of an enthusiastic homecoming crowd. In the past two years the Washington-Hopkins games have been close, and this year's game was no exception.

In the first fifteen minutes both teams appeared to be testing each other. Playing ball-control soccer, the Shoremen soon began to dominate the game, controlling play in the Hopkin's end of thefield for most of the first half. With 9:05 remaining in the first period, Mark Mullican put the Shoremen ahead when he cut across the right hand corner of the penalty area and drilled a shot into the upper right corner of the goal.

The second half was much like the first.The Shoremen were unable to capitalize on several good scoring opportunities. As the minutes ticked off, the Bluejays started to pressure the Washington goal, but a determined defense heid the visitors scoreless to preserve the win.

After their victory against Hopkins Saturday, the Shoremen had to play Ursinus the following Monday in a re-scheduled game. Ursinus is considered the most improved team in the Conference.

The Shoremen came out strong in the first half, moving the ball around a confused Ursinus defense. Much of the Washington offense started on the left side as the sagging Ursinus defense gave left midfielder Peter Hamill room to operate. With Hamill moving the ball downfield, the offense moved into full gear. The first Shoremen goal came at 23:45 when Tom Kohlerman fed Mark Mullican in front of the goal and he chipped the ball past the Ursinus goalkeeper.

Kenny Maher made it 2-0 in the beginning of the second half when he beat the Ursinus goalkeeper and pushed the ball in the goal from twelve yards out. Ursinus came back twelve minutes later to close within 2-1 but the Shoremen kept pressure on the visitors and the game ended at2-1. The victory left Washington with a 3-2 conference record and 10-2-1 in regular season.

The Shoremen close our their regular season against Western Maryland this Saturday on Kibler Field at 1:30. By beating Hopkins, Washington qualified for the state division II and III championship. On November 10th they will play the winner of the Washington Bible Salisbury St. game, and if they win there the Shoremen will play for the state championship on November 17th.

Shore Notes: V.J.Filliben leads the team in scoring with 9 goals and 3 assists. Mark Mullican has 6 goals and 2 assists, Kenny Maher 5 goals and two assists, and Ben Tuckermen 3 goals and 3 assists. Curt Nass scored his first collegiate goal in the 2-1 overtime victory against York. In the last nine games, Washington has outshot their opponents 152 to 76. If the Shoremen beat Western Md. and Salisbury their 12 victories would be the greatest number of wins in a single season by any Washington College Soccer team.

Rebuilding year looms for cagers as era ends

by RICH SCHATZMAN
Sports Editor

October 15th not only marked the beginning of a new basketball season for Washington College, but also a new era. Doug Byrne and four-year captain Joe Wilson, both 1,000 pt. scorers, have been lost through graduation. With the added departure of Steve Dickerson because of graduation and the transfer of freshman Gus Stratakis, head coach

Commentary

Tom Finnegan and assistant Steve Siegrest were left with just five players. It would be very safe to say that this year is definitely a rebuilding year.

Joining the five returning players—Joe Moye, Harry McEnroe, Rich Schatzman, Craig Langwost, and Rich Dwyer—are ten freshman and one transfer sophomore. They are Buddy Lister, Stanley Smith, Bill Graham, Carl Fornoff, Cecil Sapp, Victor Riemer, Chris Glavaiss, David Blackwell, Bryan Hall, Paul Hynson, and Jim Corey.

With all these new faces, and because of the youth on the team, it makes it practically impossible to predict how much success the Shoremen will have this year. Most people feel that the loss of Byrne and Wilson will severely weaken the team, but this doesn't necessarily have to be true. Each year, the team concept of basketball becomes more and more important. In past years at WC the team has been based around one or two key players! while this year will be much different. After three weeks of practice, the only man that has a solid starting position is 6940 forward Joe Moye. This leaves four positions open for fifteen players. Because of this uncertainty, everyone is forced to work hard every day. All the practices have been much more intense thatin past years and this will help make the men who do play that much better. It also gives Finnegan something he hasn't had in years—depth. Injuries and the loss of players will not hurt this year's team nearly as much as past clubs.

But the fact remains that it is up to the new people to make or break this season. They must make the adjustment to the physical game that is played in college. They must also learn to keep their poise and composure in tough situations that are posed by crowds and officials on the road. For these reasons, this year will be a very interesting one. Being very close to the situation, it is my opinion that the Shoremen will surprise a lot of people this year. It will be a very tough, scrappy team that will be fun to watch.

Drama Department's Tartuffe was, well, fun

by PETE TURCHI
News Editor

I knew last week that I would be away for the weekend and that I would only be able to see the College's Drama Department's production of Tartuffe once, so Sunday afternoon I talked to some people to see how it had gone the first two nights.

"Great," the guy who lives next-door to me said. "You'll love it. It's a lot of fun." At dinner I talked to someone much less enthusiastic who said, "They're young. They did the best they could with what they had. It was fun, though." And there it was. Every one of the seven or eight people I asked about the play said it was fun.

Moliere's comedy is about the title character, who has pulled the proverbial wool over the eyes of M. Orgon, a wellto-do Frenchman. The action concerns the efforts of the other characters toward getting M. Orgon to realize that he has been duped.

One of the most interesting aspects of the production was that it was Richard Wilbur's translation, written entirely in rhyme. There is the obvious problem, that if the actors do not control the rhyme it will bounce away with the whole show, but Director Timothy B. Maloney seemed to have broken his actors of the rhyming habit quite early.

The second most interesting aspect of the production was thatMaloney assumed one of the leads, M. Orgon. While his performance easily led the show, with the very slight exception that he stood out physically from the rest of the actors, at no time did it seem as if the audience was watching a veteran theatre person surrounded by struggling amateurs.

This was possible for many reasons, not the least of which was the fact that M. Orgon is probably the most submissive character in the play. Mandy Fansler, as Mme. Pernelle, was the first person who had to control the action as she talked continuously at an assemblage of various relatives and their servants. Fansler easily turned in her best performance on the Washington stage to date and paved the way for Sally McKenzie as Dorine.

The character of Dorine is that of a classic bossy, talkative lady's-maid. McKenzie was bossy and talkative and, most importantly, she kept the play moving. She stomped across the stage at double-time and manipulated the other characters with a voice that defies simple description.

Ted Legates, as the title character, was very convincing as the man everyone loved to hate. He gave the play a touch of reserve and calm which distinguished him clearly from the rest of the characters.

Several other players deserve mention here, one of whom is Beth Church. Church, as Orgon's wife, was in only her second part atWashington, but she seemed much more comfortable on stage than she did last year. She, along with McKenzie and Howard Hecht, who played Orgon's brother, was one of the people who asserted themselves and helped greatly to integrate Maloney into the cast. Six newcomers to the College's stage were in the play. Two of the most notable were Hecht and John Williams, as Orgon's son.

Hecht helped to make Maloney's presence more natural dramatically as well as physically. Williams had only a small role, but promises to be quite capable in larger parts. Beth Miller, who played Orgon's daughter, also showed great potential.

The costumes, especially those of Maloney, who looked like General Lee at Appomattox, Legates, who, in jet-black, looked like Rasputin, and Nick Nappo, who played a bailiff and wore a hat stolen from Deputy Dawg, were by far the most interesting visual aspect of the play. The set, designed by William Segal, was rather simple, open, and large.

From the reactions of the people at Sunday performance it would seem that the Drama Department's production was successful in entertaining people, making them laugh, and even in making Moliere's Tartuffe ... fun.

Shorter semester next year

Faculty approves change of calendar, but not of exams

By GEOFF GARINTHER
Editor-in-Chief

The faculty Monday night voted in favor of a proposal to shorten the academic calendar, but rejected a proposal that would have cut the length of final examinations from three hours to two.

The calendar change proposal stated: "The Academic Calendar shall consist of two semesters, each not less than thirteen nor more than fourteen weeks (exclusive of orientation periods, vacations, and final examinations)." The policy as it stands stipulates that the semester be at least 14 weeks long.

Dean of the College Garry Clarke, who presented the proposal from the Academic Council to the faculty, said it would "provide a certain amount of flexibility," in starting next year's first semester after Labor Day. Clarke said before the meeting that if the faculty approved the proposal, in effect, they would be endorsing this new calendar."

Passed by voice vote

The proposal passed by a close voice vote, but not before some discussion against it.

"I think that's something we ought to give up very reluctantly," said History Department Chairman Nate Smith of the 14week semester.

"I think that the 14-week term isn't an excessive academic term," continued Smith, "and I'd hate to see it diminished without a very good reason.

"We oughtn't to give that up without very great benefits to reap from it," he added.

Passage of the proposal means that the first semester next year almost certainly will begin after Labor Day, with classes starting on September 8th.

Two-hour finals rejected

The second proposal presented by Clarke stated: "Final examinations are not more than two hours in duration." Finals have been three hours long since the 1977-78 academic year.

Math Department Chairman Richard Brown was the first to speak against this proposal, saying that "It is always possible to give a two-hour exam in a three-hour period, but not to give a three-hour exam in a two-hour period."

Associate Professor of Mathematics Albert Briggs was also opposed to reducing the length of finals, saying "Some people regard the final exam as the crowning achievement of a very considerable academic effort."

The proposal was rejected by a nearly-unanimous voice vote.

Mini-courses, faculty lecture series discussed in SAB

by RITA McWILLIAMS

The Student Academic Board discussed non-credit minicourses, a faculty lecture series, and the need for more upper-level computer science courses at their November 6th meeting.

The mini-courses will be on subjects of interest that are unavailable in normal departmental classes. Some proposed topics include Photography, Bartending, Bike Maintenance, the History of Kent County, and the Writing of Resumes. Students, faculty members, and Chestertown residents will be recruited to teach the courses. The minimal funding necessary for the mini-courses will be requested from the Student Government Association. Tentatively, the mini-courses will be held next semester.

Each SAB representative is to approach their individual departmental professors to develop a series of faculty lectures. The lectures are intended to give faculty a chance to speak on topics of special interest in which they are involved. The program is designed to give professors and students a medium in which to know each other better while learning in an informal atmosphere. Paul Drinks, the president of the SAB, says of the programs, "We're hoping to expose students to new areas of interest and broaden their scope of experience."

Both the mini-courses and faculty lectures are intended to fill a perceived gap in student life here.

Jake Parr, the SAB representative from the Math Department, called attention to the need for more upper-level computer science courses, the need for a new computer and an additional professor to expand the department. He said, "We're in the computer age" and pointed out that many students in other desciplines are interested in attaining proficiency in operating computers to augment their education.

Changing the calendar, but not final exams

The faculty this week made two decisions that directly affect students: they approved Dean Garry Clarke's proposal to change the calendar, and then rejected a proposal to reduce final exams from three hours to two. What does all this mean for us?

The calendar change means upperclassmen next year probably will be returning to school on September 7th instead of August 24th. It also means losing two days of the three-day Fall Break (henceforth known as "Fall Weekend") and one of two advising days.

Also gone—at least next year, according to Clarke— are four days of classes. Economics majors will recognize this as another case of getting less for our money. Optomists, on the other hand, will think back to the sweltering days of August and give thanks.

Concerning the preservation of three-hour finals, however, student reaction may be less ambiguous. Despite the negative tone of the discussion about it at the faculty meeting, from our perspective there are some good things to be said for shorter exams:

—Most exams now take two hours or less, and students often feel that professors who give longer ones do so only to fill their three-hour time slot.

—Many students feel that finals are over-emphasized. If exams were shortened, the importance of the rest of the semester might increase, and perhaps the temptation among students to try to make up for a semester of relaxation by pulling one long "all-nighter" during finals week would diminish.

Aspen Institute speaker to address education Tuesday

WC News Bureau

Dr. Francis Keppel, Director of the Education Program at the Aspen Institute for Humanistic Studies at Wye Plantation, will give a talk entitled "Education for a Changing Society" on Tuesday, November 13 at 7:30 p.m. The event, sponsored by the Lecture Series of Washington College, will be held in Hynson Lounge in Hodson Hall on the college campus. The public is invited to attend.

Dr. Keppel, a graduate of Harvard and Hamline Universities, is a former United States Commissioner of Education. He served in that capacity from 1962-1965 when he became Assistant Secretary for Secondary Education of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare. From 1966 to 1974 he was chairman of the board of General Learning Corporation, New York City before joining Aspen Institute.

He served as dean of faculty in the department of education at Harvard from 1948-1962 and a member of the board of overseers of Harvard from 1967 to 1973. He is a trustee of the Carnegie Corporation and the Lincoln Center for Performing Arts.

Dr. Keppel's lecture is one in a series sponsored by Aspen Institute which will bring scholars world-reknown in science, health, education, agriculture, the environment and other fields to Eastern Shore college campuses and the Institute's Conference Center at Wye Plantation, Wheenstown, over the next several months. George W. Aldridge, manager of Aspen's Wye Plantation Center, has said the program is designed to make Aspen Institute "an important Eastern Shore resource."

All of the speakers are Aspen Fellows, Aldridge said, reflecting the Institute's "continuing effort to help shape a world in which there is individual freedom, creativity and fulfillment as well as institutions dedicated to social justice, fairness and efficiency."

Letters to the Editor

Setting the record straight

This statement has been prepared by the Inter Fraternity Council and is meant to address last weeks Elm article concerning remedies to October 26.

The group feels the article, based on proposals at the time, was a misrepresentation of fraternity sentiment. The article came out too early for total fraternity agreement on this issue. To clear up all misunderstandings, two representatives from each group met on Monday and Tuesday of this week to discuss the events of that night and subsequent actions. What began as a traditional competition between the fraternities was perceived by a non-fraternal group as an excuse to escallate the activity into a far more serious episode. Our major concern was the immediate and unjustified identification of the fraternities as the parties directly responsible for the entire incident. In fact, when the situation began to get out of hand, fraternity members themselves initiated successful efforts to disperse the crowd, thereby preventing an incident as unfortunate as the prevailing misconception.

In furtherance of this leadership demonstrated by the fraternities during Halloween night, the IFC has agreed to accept financial obligations for the incident. This in no way is an admission of guilt or sole responsibility. It is a recognition of our role as leaders on the campus. We feel this (action) best serves the interest of all parties concerned.

The IFC welcomes discussion concerning this statement by any members of the college community.

Faculty salaries: "an outrage and an embarrassment"

At its October 26th meeting the Senate of the S.G.A. passed a resolution by unanimous consent to "support the faculty in their efforts to obtain a pay increase."

by JAY YOUNG
SGA President

The issue of faculty salaries is one that is of prime importance to all of us. A college cannot hope to attract or maintain a staff of quality educators if it is not willing to pay them. The recent figures released by the Washington College Chapter of the Association of American University Professors reveal that the salary for full professors at Washington College ranks 27th out of 29 colleges reporting in the state of Maryland, 32nd out of 36 for Associate Professors and 34 out of 37 for Assistant Professors. For an institution like Washington College, this is an outrage and an embarrassment. How can a professor be expected to maintain an enthusiastic attitude about his profession when his very livelihood is insecure?

The S.G.A.,on behalf of the students of Washington College, strongly endorses and supports the faculty's efforts to obtain a pay increase, and pledges its assistance to their cause.

Roett to speak Wednesday

WC News Bureau

Dr. Riordan Roett, director of Latin American Studies at the School of Advanced International Studies at Johns Hopkins University,will speak of "The Future of Brazil" on Wednesday, November 14 at 7:30 p.m. in the William Smith Auditorium on the Washington College campus. The talk is sponsored by the Lecture Series and the public is cordially invited to attend.

Dr. Roett is the author of numerous articles and books on Latin America and has served as a consultant to both the governments of Brazil and the United States, as well as private firms. He served as president of the Latin American Studies Association in 1978.

The revised edition of his book Brazil: Politics in a Patrimonial Society has been acclaimed as the most incisive study of the performance of Brazil's incumbent military regime in recent years.

Professor Roett is expected to address the question of the growing importance of Brazil—the fifth largest nation in the world—both in its relations with other countries in Latin America, where it is frequently viewed by its neighbors as "The Colossus of the South," and in its potential rivalry with the United States for leadership within the Western Hemisphere during the next 50 years.

Elizabethan Consort here Thursday

The Elizabethan Broken Consort, an ensemble that originated with the Baltimore early-music group Pro Musica Rara, will perform for the Washington College Concert Series on Thursday, November 15 at 8:3U p.m. in Gibson Fine Arts Center. The public is invited.

The Consort performs Elizabethan and Jacobean English music on copies of period instruments and specializes in the repertoire for "broken consort" from which it takes its name. This music, the most sophisticated of its time, was the earliest to have been composed for instruments of different families.

Members of the ensemble are Mary Anne Ballard, treble viol and bass viol; Daniel Winheld, bass viol; Mindy Rosenfeld, flute; Constance Vidor, bandora tenor viol; Ronn McFarlane, cittern, lute; Roger Harmon (director), lute; and Peggy Lacey Craig, harpsichord.

New York Times Book Review editor reads

The New York Times Book Review is probably one of the most prestigious literary journals in this country. It came as a surprise then, that when editor of the Review, Harvey Shapiro, spoke here last night, he spoke as a poet.

At the reading sponsored by the Sophie Kerr committee, Shapiro read poems from three of his six books, as well as several uncollected works. While many of the poems were rather short, he also read two longer pieces, one about his trip to Jerusalem this past summer, and one about summer in general.

Shapiro went to Yale, where he edited the Yale Literary Magazine and the Yale Poetry Review before the war. After serving in the Air Force he went to Columbia University, then pursued a teaching career.

At an upperclass creative writing seminar which he sat in on yesterday afternoon, Shapiro said that if had been about seven years since he had last been in any type of studeni workshop. In a later interview he added that his teaching experience helped him learn some of the basic skills of editing. He taught at Cornell University and edited Epoch, a literary magazine, while he was there.

Shapiro first got his work published in the 1940's, and published his first book in 1953. Although his work with the Review keeps him in contact with major publishers, all of his books have been printed by small presses.

While he was teaching Shapiro had some poems published in Commentary magazine, where he was offered some free-lance editing jobs, then a desk position. From there he went to The New Yorker as fiction editor, then to The New York Times as magazine editor in 1957. He moved up the editorial ladder there until about four years ago, when he took over as editor of the BookBook Review.

Shapiro has had no formal training in editing or journalis, but he said that, "some of what I did in Freshman English courses (as a teacher) was not much different than the work at the Book Review." He also said that his work as a reviewer and editor has helped him with his own poetry. "When you first start writing you feel like the words were etched in stone and handed down from Mt. Sinai," he said, "but you learn that you can make the third paragraph the tenth paragraph and shift things around so an article reads better."

Some of the uncollected works which he read dealt with poets and writing poetry and will probably end up in book form, but Shapiro said, "I have no sense of a book. I don't have a theme in mind when I write poems. My next book is still a few years off."

... and appointed by Hughes to Education Commission

by WENDY MURPHY

Washington College President Joseph McLain has been appointed by Governor Harry Hughes to the Education Commission of the States.

The Education Commission has two representatives from each of the fifty states plus the governors of each state. If the governor feels that he may not be able to attend the meetings, he may send a representative who will carry his vote. McLain may also go when he does does, but he will not have a vote.

Hughes thought that the independent sector of colleges and higher education should have representation, according to McLain. Recommended to Hughes by one of the state representatives, McLain will serve as a member of the Governor's cabinet.

"Ike" Dean: The Enforcer

by JOHN WARTON

Tracking down incorrectly parked vehicles on the Washington college campus, Isaac "Ike" Dean tickets faculty, staff, and students cars as one of two enforcers of the school's parking regulations.

"The school wouldn't make any money if I didn't catch anyone," said Dean. "Sometimes I get ten (cars)—sometimes I get two."

Dean worked for the College's maintenence department for thirty years before he began enforcing parking regulations in 1976. He works two hours a day, driving a blue sedan in hot pursuit of cars in fire lanes, restricted parking spaces, and on the lawns.

"No one knows my hours. If they knew when I was coming I'd never catch anyone. I'm on my own to do it...as long as I make two hours a day."

Discretion is a key ingredient in Dean's work. "If they've got flashing lights on that indicates they're loading or unloading," said Dean, who also passes up cars with open trunks or hoods. He also declines to give $25 "failure to register" fines to cars with incorrectly placed stickers "as long as he can see the sticker."

Students who tell Dean that they will soon move their car have often been let off the hook. However, Dean checks back to see if the car has indeed been relocated. "Plenty of times I go around and come back and they still haven't moved."

Faculty, staff, and student cars are ticketed in accordance with the regulations set for each class of vehicle. Deans indicated that not even e President is exempt form his jurisdiction.

Dean feels that the tickets carry "a fair fine" but that repeat offenders should receive higher fines.

"The ones that do it regularly...should be fined more—that's the way it should be."

Maurer exhibit to run in Tawes until 18th

WC News Bureau

An exhibit titled "Homages: The Art of Leonard Maurer" has opened in the Fine Arts Center lobby gallery to run until November 18. It will be open Thursdays, November 8 and 15 from 4 to 6 p.m., and during several evening musical and drama performances scheduled in Tawes Theater.

Maurer, well-known Washington painter and teacher who died in 1976, left hundreds of paintings and thousands of drawings, prints, watercolors, collages, and woodblocks—most of them never seen by the public. The exhibit will show thirty-some works produced during Maurer's most intense creative period during the fifties and sixties.

The collection was assembled from works shown recently in three simultaneous exhibits in Washington, at The Phillips Collection, the Watkins Gallery at American University, and the Franz Bader Gallery. The artist's nephew, Patrick Thomas, a Washington College graduate in the class of 1963, made arrangements with the College art exhibits committee for the campus show.

Maurer produced a formidable body of work in a variety of media but it was in the black-and-white drawings, watercolors and woodcuts that he had his most sustained success. He was noted for a series of woodcut protraits of famous authors, including James Joyce, Chekhov, Proust and Faulkner.

Kickers facing Salisbury in state semi-finals tomorrow

by HARRY McENROE

After a disappointing 1-0 regular season-ending loss to Western Maryland, the Washington College soccer team faces a stern challenge on Saturday when they meet Salisbury State in the semifinals of the state division II-III playoffs.

In this crucial game the Shoremen will encounter an opponent with a very familiar style of play. Like the Shoremen, Salisbury is a solid team, well-rehearsed fundamentally, moves the ball constantly, and depends upon teamwork. The winner of this contest, to be played in Salisbury, will meet the winner of the St. Mary's-Frostburg State game for the championship.

The loss to Western Maryland, a team that Washington College has dominated in recent years, may have cost the Shoremen a chance for a NCAA Division III Championship bid. As John Lonnquest, a junior fullback said, "We took them too lightly." Although the Shoremen dominated the second half, they failed to score. As a result, Western Maryland's lone first half goal was all they needed to register a 1-0 victory.

Injuries to key players may hamper the team in the upcoming Salisbury game. Senior co-captian Pete Hamill has a sore foot while towards Mark Mullican and V.J.Fillibin are also not at their best physically. However, they will all play in this, the most important game of the season to date. Shore Notes: Two players have been named to the MAC Southern All-Conference squad. Foward V.J.Fillibin was maned to the first team and senior co-captain Dun Hudson was awarded honorable mention. The team record now stands at an impressive 10-3-1.

Volleyball: an up-and-down season for women

by MARK NASER

Although the women's volleyball team has lost quite a few games lately, they are not ones to quit. This team always seems to bounce back up after being knocked down, as evidenced by their play during the last three weeks.

The women split a tri-match with UMBC and Anne Arundel, playing an excellent match against UMBC but losing. However, the Shorewomen defeated a strong Anne Arendel contingent.

On October 26th, the women played a quad match versus Hood, Notre Dame, and Westchester. The spikers defeated Hood 15-13, 15-12, and Notre Dame 16-14, 15-13. These two teams were what Fall called "scrappy and stubborn," digging out many sure spikes. A "middle-in" defense was employed by WC to prevent garbage points. Darlene Coleman and Cheryl Loss served superbly, with Ann Most and Julie Wheeler setting the front line beautifully. Fall called Joan Burri, who played a strong game from the back line, "one of the most solid back line people we have. She's the bright spot on the team." However, against Westchester, after playing well and winning the first set 15-10, the women simply ran out of steam and lost the next two games and the match, 3-15, 9-15. This was a strong-hitting team that the "middle-back" defense just could not stop.

Fall felt that an arranged scrimmage helped the squad because it was not very often this season the women could put 12 people together to scrimmage during practice.

On October 29th, the women found themselves in a tri-match against American U. and Navy. In what Fall called the team's best played game all year, "a very cohesive unit with great team flow and movement," WC defeated American U. by a score of 15-13. However, it did not seem as if the team actually believed what they had done, losing the match 5-15, 12-15. Next came an even tougher opponent, big-time Navy, a team that Fall considered "out of our league." The women were soundly defeated 1-15, 2-15.

The next opponent, two nights later, was a hot Western Maryland team, carrying a 24-2 record, as well as a recent win in the Mansfield Tournament. This is a team that WC has never beaten. In a match that lasted over an hour,WC was defeated 10-15, 8-15 and 4-15. Fall stated, "We have never played better against them; the scores are not indicative of the way we played. We stayed strong during the rallies, but this team just picks you apart." This evened the regular season record at 14-14.

Next came the MAC tournament at Franklin and Marshall. The spikers were seeded fifth out of 8 teams. However, the women were playing under several handicaps. First, Coleman was playing with a viral infection and Burri with a slight concussion and a bruised collarbone. Second, they played on a shorter, wider court than usual.

They opened against Gettysburgh, losing 6-15, 13-15, 13-15. The women seemed to be trying too hard. Unfortunately, their next opponent was Western Maryland. The result: 0-15, 4-15. This was a totally frustrating night; the team found themselves in the consolation bracket on Saturday. On Saturday, they played their best volleyball of the weekend. They defeated Upsala 19-17, 15-9 and Moravian 16-14, 15-4. This placed the women fifth out of 8, exactly where they had been seeded. Coleman again served well. Ann Most set Mandy Scherer exceptionally well, while Cheryl Loss hustled all weekend. Burri played well in spite of her injuries. Fall said "Mandy Scherer was superb all weekend long as a player and as a captain."

Net Notes—Fall: "Right now my biggest concern is for next year. If they can play as a unit next week, I will consider this a fairly successful season. This has been a long and difficult year because of unsettled personnel, causing many ups and downs." The women close out thier season with two away tournaments this week.

Republicans hold anti-Khomeini demonstration

by GEOFF GARINTHER
Editor-in-Chief

"Some of us are concerned that this is another sign that America is losing its power." So last Friday, after Iranian students had held 60 Americans hostage in the U.S. Embassy in Tehran for six days, the Washington College Republicans turned to a tradition of the sixties—the demonstration—to express their disapproval.

"It was a spur-of-the-moment idea," said College Republican President Glen Beebe later. "We thought it up Thursday night. I said we should do something...(so) we went around that evening to get people we thought would be interested."

"Nuke the bastard"

At 12:30 p.m. the next day, a dozen supporters of the Republicans gathered in front of Hodson Hall, where they burned a mock Iranian flag and carried placards with messages ranging from "It's time to retaliate for regression against American citizens abroad" to "Nuke the bastards!" The group then marched down to Bill Smith Hall, across campus to Route 213, and back to Hodson Hall, where they passed out anit anti-Iranian literature in the cafeteria. The demonstration endcd when the group tried to go through the Snack Bar but was locked out by proprietor Ruth Dickerson.

Getting together

Republican leader Jim Larrimore said the group "mainly wanted to show a couple of things: our disagreement with what is going on in Iran; our contempt for what Iranian students are doing in the U.S.; and that students at Washington College could get together for something like this."

Larrimore, despite party differences, said he agrees with President Carter's handling of the Iranian situation.

"What he's done so far, I agree with, (but) I would have done it a lot sooner."

Beebe too agrees with Carter. "I think he's right in waiting. He's getting world opinion in his favor. If (military action) had been taken right away, we'd probably have been criticized. Now the Ayatollah is playing his cards; he's showing what he's like. This is getting people all around the world to say 'he's wrong.'"

A week to a week -and-a-half

Beebe thinks military action may become necessary "if they're not released within a week or a week-and-a-half."

Any such action would have to be an "in-out kind of thing," aid, said Beebe. "I'd say helicopters would have to be used. It's got to be as fast as possible so hostages don't get hurt," he added, allowing that "hostage safety comes first."

Resolution to ban classroom smoking highlights SGA meeting

by GEOFF GARINTHER
Editor-in-Chief

A resolution to ban smoking in classrooms, allocation to four clubs, reports of the Judicial Reform and Vandalism Report Committees, and the formation of a new committee to investigate campus energy conservation were all discussed at Monday's ninety-minute Student Government Association meeting.

Speaking to the Senate from a prepared statement Monday night, Sophomore Mike Garvey proposed "that this council adopt an all-inclusive no-smoking resolution forbidding any manner of smoking in the classroom environment."

Garvey, who is not a member of the SGA, added: "I find it inexcusable that an institution such as Washington College with a reputation for intelligence and for undiscriminating policies should allow such a blatantly unjust practice as smoking in classrooms."

proposal applauded

Garvey's comments were applauded by the Senate, and a several senators spoke in favor of a ban on classroom smoking.

"I smoke, and I would support your proposal," said Junior Dave Fitzsimmons, adding that he objected only to the harshness of the proposal's wording.

Assistant Social Chairman Mike Dixon expressed concern for the floor in Bill Smith Hall, which he said has been badly damaged by cigarette ashes despite being re-done only two years ago. "If people don't accept no smoking, at least try to preserve (the floor)," said Dixon.

New Dorms Senator Dave Panacci said no smoking rules are "prevalent in the 'real world', so why don't we just get with the 'real world'"

The resolution was endorsed by an 18-8 vote of the Senate.

Most of the $3,608 allocated to clubs went to the William James Forum. The Organizations Committee of the SGA granted the Forum's request for $2,510, but Committee Chairman Bob Hockaday said that "technically, it isn't enough." Hockaday then presented a motion to give the Forum any SGA surplus at the end of the year.

New Dorms Senator Dan Duff disagreed with the motion, saying, "I think we ought to grant them more now outright." A new motion to grant the Forum $3,000 passed by unanimous vote.

The Committee also gave $250 to the Sailing Club, $150 to the College Republicans, and $100 to both the German Club and the Christian Fellowship.

Vandalism, Judicial Reform Reports

Senior Class President Tim Connor reported that the Judicial Reform Report will soon be released by the Student Affairs Committee, and "after Thanksgiving we're going to get it operating." (see related story on the Report itself).

Fitzsimmons, Chairman of the Vandalism Report Committee, reported that "we've made a lot of progress on that in the last few weeks.

"We're going through each of the 36 recommendations that apply to 'student life'," said Fitzsimmons, who added some of the Committee findings thus far: "The idea of having an SGA student damage deposit fund would more or less compound the problem". He said the Committee is also investigating the current damage deposit system.

SGA President Jay Young appointed Senior Leah Truitt Chairman of a committee that will investigate problems in energy conservation on campus.

Restructuring of student judicial system completed

by GEOFF GARINTHER
Editor-in-Chief

The Student Affairs Committee will release this week its plan for the restructuring of the student judiciary system.

The result of a semester-long study by the Student Government Association's Judicial Reform Committee and the Student Affairs Committee, the restructuring will feature a permanent eight-member jury pool, five of whom will hear each case.

"The main thing we wanted to do was incorporate precedents into the system," said Reform Committee Chairman Tim Connor. "Hopefully, we can build a system of precedents not only from case to case, but from year to year."

The major reform concerns the structure of the jury. Previously made up of a large pool of randomly selected students, the jury will now consist of eight members elected to year-long terms along with the chairman and clerk of the court. The chairman will select five jurors for each case, and the three non-participating jurors will receive briefs for each case. Convictions will require four out of five juror votes, and penalties three out of five.

The Student Union, will elect the chairman, clerk, lawyers, and jurors during the week following Thanksgiving. Their terms will run for one year, from the beginning of second semester to the end of first semester the following year.

Some thoughts on the news behind the news concerning the SGA this week:

•The restructuring of the student judicial system that will be released this week, the product largely of the SGA's Judicial Reform Committee, should solve the judiciary's biggest problem: a lack of precedents. Different penalties for similar offenses plagued last year's Student Judiciary Board. The new standing jury should provide the consistency that was so badly lacking.

•In the midst of the SGA Senate's rubber-stamp approval of the Organization Committee's club allocation's Monday, several questions arose: Why does the SGA sponsor the sailing club, which seems more the responsibility of the athletic department? And why is it also the sole supporter of the William James Forum, one of three groups, including the Sophie Kerr Committee and the Lecture Series, that brings speakers to the College? Our needs might be better served if the three joined forces. If nothing else, such a joint effort would prevent the dilemma of choosing between three lectures on the same night.

•SGA President Jay Young on this page cites the College's "lack of facilities" as the primary cause of campus vandalism. Although the absence of the swimming pool and student center isn't the sole cause of vandalism, it does contribute to another problem—the College's increasing unattractiveness to prospective students. Less selling power must ultimately produce lower standards, and the result of that can be seen in the page three story detailing the academic woes of the current freshman class. The consequences of the College's continuing failure to improve itself are beginning to surface.

Upgrading of campus security investigated

by WENDY MURPHY

One of the major issues on campus at present concerns upgrading the College's security force.

Deans of students Maureen Kelley and Ed Mason met with the Resident Advisors and nightwatchmen on November 7th. They discussed ways to improve the security and began making recommendations to be presented to Vice-President for Finance Gene Hessey.

Hessey met with Director of Campus Security Steven Kendall and the RA's on Monday and received a list of ten recommendations. Hessey said that some of these suggestions are going to be given immediate action, while others will take more time.

The first recommendation was to relocate the security office, which is located in Ferguson Hall. This has been approved and security is in the process of moving to the ground floor of the Miller Library.

The second recommendation concerned the communication system for the night watchman. Hessey said, "One problem that should not be a problem is that our security radios are not operating properly." He added that it is not known whether the problem is in the antennas or in the mechanisms but the radios are being worked on.

It was also suggested that the watchmen be uniformed and provided with a marked security vehicle. Action has been taken on this matter. The security office has been asked to submit ideas of uniform changes. The present security uniforms consist mainly of a cap and a jacket with security emblems on them.

Hessey was also advised to increase the amount of security personnel. He has run advertisements in local newspapers and checked at the unemployment office for interested people. He describes it as a "very tough staffing problem" because out of six possible employees, only one was "really interested in the job." One reason for the lack of interest is the things with which the personnel must deal, including ridicule, students viewing security as a challenge, student retaliation, and the possibity of theft.

Still another recommendation was to deputize and arm the security, but it has been the College's policy in the past to not arm the security personnel.

Hessey feels that the main problem in campus security is a general misunderstanding on the part of the students, the security office, and the police department. The major part of this misunderstanding rests with the students. "If students are confronted with a situation where they feel the need of the campus security personnel or local law enforcement persons, they must use the 911 emergency call number or access to that assistance," said Hessey. He added, "If they do not do that, they have limited the possibility to help fellow students."

He said that one problem is that students will go out looking for security persons when they need them instead of telephoning. By the time they find the night watchman, the person who needed the help is gone.

Hessey also held a special meeting with Chestertown's town manager Tuesday to discuss the types of activities the town police would be called to.

Letter to the Editor

Dining Hall waste

In the SGA minutes of October 29, 1979 it states, "Ann Dorsey suggested that they do away with the menus because they are a waste of money." We would like to point out a few ways that students waste dining hall money.

During any meal it is common to see many trays come into the dishroom piled high with untouched butter, bread and glasses of milk. At any breakfast the dishroom throws away at least ten boxes of unopened cereal as well as fifteen bowls of uneaten cereal. In addition, dozens of pieces of untouched fruit are thrown away each day by students.

Two other areas of student waste are common in the cafeteria—theft of silverware and china, and laziness and maliciousness. People who leave their trays, throw food, paste food to windows and walls, and refuse to bring up trays for tray calls are costing you money. (When people are asked to bring up trays if they are finished eating it is because the dishroom crew cannot start to clean up until a minimum number of trays are in the dining hall. So why not bring up your tray and then sit down with a cup of coffee to talk?)

Let's consider the costs of the items mentioned above.

One pat of butter	1¢
One slice of bread	2¢
One box of corn flakes	11¢
One orange	12¢
One glass of milk	8¢
10 minutes of student crew	$3.00

On the average $15.00 a day are wasted by students. So the next time you complain that Dave Knowles is wasting money by spending 5¢ on each menu, consider that the students waste more money in one week than Mr. Knowles spends on menus for an entire academic year.

Sincerely,
Denise Belmore

SGA Commentary

Lack of facilities blamed for vandalism

In the words of former SGA President Foster Deibert, in his 1978-79 Report on Theft and Vandalism,: "I truly believe that the primary cause of our problems with vandalism results from the fact that the community as a whole, and the campus itself, fails to provide adequate activities for students to pursue in their spare time."[1]

Nothing has changed.

The major topic of conversation this year seems to be violence, vandalism, and theft.

Throughout the year, everyone from Board members to administrators to

by JAY YOUNG

faculty and students have been asking why it is so prevalent. In contemplating the question myself, I find it difficult to disagree with Foster.

Complacency speaking, Washington College is very much behind the times in terms of facilities. According to our research, we are the only college in the state of Maryland without a swimming pool. We are also the only college without a student union center to speak of. We have a tremendous asset in the Chester River and the Truslow Boathouse which we have refused to take advantage of. We have a campus security force that is inadequate, a maintenance department that is underpaid, a faculty that is even more underpaid, and a computer that is outdated. The facilities available in town to do little to help the problem.

The severe lack of facilities affects the college in two major ways: first, it greatly hinders enrollment in both quantity and quality. Lack of quantity means lack of money, and lack of quality means lowering of standards. No one could deny that we are suffering from these ailments. Second, the college is affected by this lack of facilities in the behavior of those already enrolled. Students can only study for so long before becoming restless. Again quoting Foster, "College life does not revolve entirely around academics and just as much can be learned from constructive activities outside the classroom." One need only walk around Washington College in the spring time and witness the flurry of lacrosse balls, frisbees, footballs, and baseballs flying through the air to see his point. The games, sunbathers, stereos, runners, cookouts, concerts, etc. illustrate the needs students have for recreation and activity. What happens in the winter — What is there to do— If one were to read the faculty report on violence, vandalism, and theft, one would answer that last question in one word: DRINK. However, it is important to remember that alcohol is not the problem, but merely a symptom of the problem of outdated facilities.

The SGA is taking steps to help this problem. We are exploring the possibility of creating a student center on campus. We are planning a diverse social calendar for the winter that will attempt to make students aware of some of the facilities available to us in the area. We will try to bring what activities we can to the campus and provide greater mobility and information for students to enjoy activities off-campus.

We feel that this is a small step in the right direction. The big steps must be taken by the administration.

Keppel on the decline of faculty morale

by KATHY STRECKFUS
Assistant Editor

The number of students in higher education is expected to deline nation-wide within the next few years as a result of demographic changes. When that happens, what happens to faculty morale?.

That was the question posed by Dr. Francis Keppel, Director of the Aspen Instutue Program in Education at the lecture Tuesday entitled "Education for a Changing Society." Although only 18 people attended, Keppel's half-hour lecture was followed by a lively hour-long discussion.

Keppel said it is illogical to assume that a decline in numbers is negative, because with fewer numbers, educators "can focus on quality." He predicted several obstacles, however, to that positive outlook.

"Institutions, public and private, are desperately looking for students," Keppel said. He predicts that colleges and universities may lower standards in order to save financially. The problem of a decline in quality as well as numbers, added to inflation and low faculty salaries, is likely to cause a decline in faculty morale.

Keppel based his discussion of a decline in quality partly on statistics from declining scores on standardized tests in elementary and secondary schools, as well as declining college entrance examination test scores in recent years. He said that about 30 states now require high school students to pass a proficiency exam before graduation, and predicted that such exams will soom be imposed nationwide.

When a comparable decline in quality occurs at the college level, Keppel said that it is possible that standardized proficiency exams may also be enforced at the college level by government officials. That possibility stimulated the discussion that followed.

Several members of the audience said that if standardized exams were imposed, they feared that professors would be forced to teach according to the requirements of the exam.

Dr. Nancy Tatum, English Department Chairman, said, "I'm very frightened of imposed standards in education. I'm worried about people telling me to change my vocabulary." Tatum referred to new terms imposed by government officials such as "decode" and "encode", which mean reading and writing. "My morale is lowered by government officials telling me to change my vocabulary," Tatum said. She added, "If I protest, what happens next? My students don't get certification. So what do I do?"

Senior Margaret Handle, who is a student teacher this semester at Kent County Middle School, said that there is a need for imposed standards to prevent "settling in" or "complacency in the classroom."

Keppel is a graduate of Harvard and Hamline Universities. He served as Dean of faculty in the Department of Education at Harvard from 1948-1962. He was United States Commissioner of Education from 1962-1965, he then became Assistant Secretary for Secondary Education of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare. He is now Director of the Education Program at the Aspen Institute for Humanistic Studies.

The Aspen Institute has a new center at Wye Plantation on the Eastern Shore, and will offer several lectures open to the public this year. The Institute, an independent, non-profit organization, is a "forum to tackle the critical problems facing the nation and world today from a very humanistic impulse," according to George W. Aldridge, Manager of the Institute at Wye Plantation.

The Institute's central office is in New York City. It also has centers in Aspen, Colorado, Berlin, Tokyo, and Hawaii. Aldridge said that the new center at Wye will assist in the Institute's endeavor to examine issues of governance, because of Wye's proximity to Washington, D.C. "Being close to the government, we can get more participation from government officials," he said.

Colin Williams, an Aspen Senior Fellow, will spaek on "American Myths" at Wye Plantation tonight. On December 2, Micheal Rice, Direcotr of the Institute Program on Communications and Society, will lecture at Salisbury College on "A Question of Communications for the future". Stephen Strickland, Vice President of the Institute, will speak in Easton on December 11 on "The Health of Americans: Health Research and Health Care." Director of the Institute's Program in International Affairs Harlan Cleveland will lecture on "American Foreign Policy and the 1980 Campaign" at the Wye Center on Jan. 18.

In addition, seven lectures will be held next semester, including four lectures by philosopher Mortimer Adler. Aldridge said, "There will be faculty and student participation at all of the conferences."

Parking, academics creating problems for college officals

byKATHY WURZBACHER

Increases in parking violation and in academic problems among freshmen were among the problems for college officials this week.

As of this week, "there are seven students who have been denied the privilege of having a car parked on the Washington College campus because of having five or more parking tickets" says Associate Dean of Students Ed Maxcy. "Two students have been put on disciplinary probation because they were denied the privilege to have cars on campus but brought the cars back anyway" said Maxcy. There is really "no need to get that many tickets because there are more than enough parking spaces, even though they're not always convenient" he added. "In an effort to assure that fire lanes and service roads are kept clear, the Director of Campus Security has begun to have cars towed at the owners expense of $45. One person has had a car towed. Towing will be done 24 hours a day" says Maxcy.

Academic difficulties

"In general, there are a number of freshmen who are having academic difficulties this semester" said Dean of the College, Garry Clarke. There are a number of reasons why there are "at least 60 freshmen who have poor grades as of the mid-term" says Clarke. Some of the reasons are that "some students who are here simply are having problems with language or reading, things in that area. Then there are those who simply don't do any work and cut many classes" added Clarke. He stressed the fact that while the mid-term grades are to be used as a guide for the students and are not sent home, "last year, there were freshmen dismissed because of academic difficulties." Clarke also added that "while this happens every year, and the first semester of the freshman year is the hardest, it is necessary to give 100%"

Thirteen students read poetry

by SUE JAMES

A group of talented students met to reak thier work of poetry and short prose to an audience of approximately thirty students and teachers last Wednesday evening in the Coffee House.

The reading was organized and introduced by Hugh Seidman, poet and Creative Writing instructor for this semester. All of the students who read came from Seidman's freshman and upperclass Creative Writing sections.

Many of the freshman in the group displayed great potential. The audience seemed to react strongly to "Groups of Late," a poem about the questionable future, and "Brewski and Churchski," a lyrical poem about beer drinking, by Bennie Kohl. A highly emotional poem by Patricia Travieso entitled "Letter to an Aborted Child" successfuly used abstract imagery to stir the audience.

Some of the best works by the upperclassmen included "Ill Camp's "Highly Selective Journals of Ossie Green," an excerpt from a gruesome short story about a young boy who kills cats, and the highlight of the evening, "The Blue Story," by Claire Mowbray, a suspenseful story about an imaginary being.

For those in the audience who wanted to relate their thoughts to the campus life, Nick Napp's poem "Mancake" and Peter Turchi's excerpt from Sandcastles were well-suited. Nappo got a particulary large response with this poem, read in an affected Southern twang as a tribute to James Dickey, the author of "The Sheep Child," which Nappo's poem is based on. Turchi's work hit the audience nostagiltally as he told the tale of a college freshman at a small college quite like this one.

The Student Reading was a real success as the inspited writers of the campus related their thoughts and feelings to the audience. Those students interested in displaying their own talents or enjoying those of others should watch for announcements for the next reading.

Roett: "A changing perception of Brazil"

by GINGER KURAPKA

"Tremendous problems deserve a tremendous country", was the statement of Delfim Nette, Minister of Planning of Brazil, as quoted by Dr. Reordan Roett Wednesday night.

Dr. Roett, director of Latin American School Studies of the of Advanced International Studies of the Hopkins University, spoke to a group of about 50 students and professors on the future of Brazil. Brazil's military government is faced with greater economic and social problems as well as expanding technological and industrial advancement. The direction the government takes will determine future international relations with that country.

Brazil is the sixth most populated countryin the world, but 2/3 of the population is undernourished. The people are concentrated in the southeast and southcentral areas of the country, the most industrialized areas. Forty-two percent of the population lives in Il. of the area of the country, and that portion brings in 65. of the national income.

The gross national product of Brazil is larger that that of Africa, excluding South Africa. Yet, "the national debt is the largest of all Third World countries", a cause for much concern among those foreign banks which hold that debt.

Internally, Brazil's dictatiorial government has recently been increasingly willing to liberalize. "Habeus Corpus has been restored, as has freedom of the press and of TV and radio, and political parties have been established," says Roett. Labor unions this year have gone on strike, although strikes are still illegal, to demand higher wages, and have received them.

"Brazil will need to deal with her own position, image and reputation", in the world. "They (the government) will try to achieve political legitimacy, which will permit them to deal with their internal problems." Dr. Roett concluded by saying, "There is a changing perception of Brazil in the outside world, for the better".

Shoremen clinch bid to state finals

by JOHN LONNQUEST

The Shoremen continued their quest for the state championship last Friday when they beat Salisbury St. 2-1 in the semifinals of the Maryland Small College Soccer Tournament. Coach Ed Athey called the win at Salisbury "one of the most exciting games ever played by a Washington College soccer team.

Salisbury came into the game with a 9-7 record. During the season they beat highly-rated Lynchburg and UMBC at Salisbury. Salisbury was scouted as a solid team and Athey predicted a tough contest between two evenly-matched teams.

The game was originally scheduled for Saturday the 10th, but Salisbury asked that the game be moved to Friday the 9th because of a crowded homecoming schedule. Posters in the Salisbury athletic center advertised the contest as the "Game of the decade."

Salisbury fielded a fast, physical team that was determined to give the Shoremen all they could handle. The game itself was rough as Salisbury tried to compensate for the Shoremen's superior ball skills with their physical play. During the game tempers grew short on several occasions and two Washington players received yellow cards during the game.

The Shoremen scored first when Don Hastings hit with 18:24 left in the first half on an assist from V.J. Filliben. Filliben crossed the ball to Hastings, who was standing on the right corner of the penalty area. Hastings turned the ball on one hop and lofted it into the net from sixteen yards out. On the strength of Hasting's goal the first half ended 1-0.

Salisbury came out in the second half determined to equalize, bombarding the Washington goal for a stretch of 15 minutes. At 20:53 Salisbury got its golden opportunity when the Shoremen defense was unable to clear the ball from the goal line and Salisbury's Dean Wampler knocked in the loose ball to even the score at 1-1.

Regulation time ended with the game tied. In the first overtime the Shoremen began to move the ball on the ground, something which they had failed to do in much of the second half. As the overtime progressed it became clear that the momentum was going toward the Shoremen.

The two overtimes failed to produce a winner and the game then went into 4 five-minute sudden death periods. Washington dominated the first period and was clearly controlling play. Bill Bounds narrowly missed ending the game in the beginning of the second period when his shotfrom thirty yards out bounded off the top of the crossbar. With a minute and thirty seconds left in the period the Shoremen were awarded a corner keck. Bounds crossed the ball to Filliben, who headed the ball toward thegoal. The ball struck a Salisbury defender on the thigh and bounced in the goal to win the game 2-1.

With the victory against Salisbury, the Shoremen advanced to the state finals, where they will meet Frostberg College at Mount St. Mary's tomorrow. Frostberg qualified for the finals by beating St. Marys 4-2. Frostburg has a fairly fast squad and plays a ball-control game. They scored against St. Mary's in the first minute of each half, and the Shoremen will have to watch against an early goal. The final should be a close game between two evenly-matched teams.

Cagers blow out Chesapeake in pre-season opener, 123-84

by RICH SCHATZMAN
Sports Editor

Last Friday night the Washington College basketball team opened its 1979-80 pre-season basketball schedule with a 123-84 win over Chesapeake Community College. Although this may sound very encouraging, there is still a lot of room for improvement. "We were pretty good on offense at times, but we need some improvement on our defense and rebounding," commented sophomore forward Joe Moye after scoring 28 points.

A good sign, however, is that the first team blew Chesapeake's starting five against Welsey College of Dover, Delaware will tell. Head Coach Tom Finnegan a little more about who can perform and who can not.

Finnegan has recruited several players who can put the ball in the hole. However, the key to this team's success is how well they play defense and rebound. Also, they must limit mistakes to a minimum. But the most important quality is that each player must give 100% at all times. Hustle and desire are key factors in defense and rebounding. As soon as everyone gets rid of the butterflies and starts playing like madmen, this will be a good basketball team.

CAGE NOTES: David Blackwell missed last week's scrimmage with a broken finger on his left hand, but is expected to return for tonight's scrimmage. Captain Joe Moye is playing with a broken thumb on his right hand. WC opens its regular season on Tuesday, Nov. 27 at St. Mary's and its first homegame will be on Sat. Dec. 1st against a powerful Widener team.

right out of the gym. On the other hand, this doesn't say much for the depth that was commented on a couple of weeks ago. Bench strength is very important in this league and it is very important for the people coming off the bench to perform almost as well as the person they replace. Since this was the first college game for most of the players on the team, maybe we can pan it off as nervousness.# Tonight's scrimmage

Schmoldt resigns; temporary replacement sought

Bailey "in shock" over resignation, the second this semester

by PETE TURCHI
News Editor

Assistant Professor of Mathematics William Schmoldt handed in his resignation last Wednesday, November 21.

Schmoldt, best known as Director of the Computing Center, is the second faculty member to resign this semester. The resignations of both Schmoldt and Drama Professor William Segal will take affect upon the completion of their first semester duties. Although Schmoldt did not wish to disclose his reasons for leaving at this time, he said he has not accepted another teaching job.

Temporary replacement sought

Mathematics and Computer Science Department Chairman Richard Brown said that he is not looking for a permanent replacement now because, "to plan for the future takes more time than is currently available. For now we need good teachers who can teach the material." The new person or persons the Department acquires will teach all the computer science courses currently scheduled for next semester, and an additional upper level course may be added.

Brown went on to say that Schmoldt "has done an excellent job, and I am very sorry to see him go, but I feel he made the only decision an intelligent person could make." In regards to the fact that he has less than two months to find a replacement Brown said, "I am in no way criticizing (Schmoldt) for leaving at this time. It's our problem, one I think we can cope with."

Dean of the College Garry Clarke agreed that "the time we have to find a replacement) hasn't worked out as well as it might," but he said he told Schmoldt "not to worry about it." Clarke went on to say that "Bill has helped people all over campus. He always seemed to be a good teacher, and he's helped not only people in social sciences but also the administration. I knew he was always busy, but he'd always do what I needed done."

One of the Social Science Departments Schmoldt works closely with is Economics. Chairman Michael Bailey, who is also President of the Washington College Chapter of the American Association of University Professors, said that Schmoldt's major contribution to his department was, "helping the seniors with their projects." Bailey continued, "I still haven't gotten over the shock of his resignation. I think it's a sad thing for the college. I thought of him as an extra man in the Economics Department."

In an interview both Bailey and Associate Professor of Economics Michael Malone told of situations in which Schmoldt had put in a lot of personal time to do jobs for their department. Malone said, "Schmoldt's greatest attribute was that he was willing to give much of his time to people in other departments, and he runs the Computing Center in a way so that it is very accessible." He also said, "I don't think I've ever seen him get mad at anybody."

Bailey said, "Bill is always willing to help faculty members. He will take time to show them how to do things."

Malone summed up the feelings of both him and his colleague: "I don't think we'll find anyone willing to put that much into it. The chances of getting somebody with (Schmoldt's) qualifications for the money he was getting is zilch."

Student comments "taken out of context" in WC story

by GINGER KURUPKA

Several students quoted in a November 28th Maryland State News article about Washington College feel their comments were taken out of context.

"It's such a frustrating thing," said Peter Jenkins, "because there's nothing to be done about it now." Jenkins stated in the article that, "...the town needs us. Granted we do damage—shoplifting goes up in September and down in May, beer mugs are stolen more in September and down in May, but they like having us around." But he says, "I didn't make those comments about the town as they were quoted."

Amy Pozerycki also feels she was quoted out of context. "We were saying nice things about the school. The article makes us look like idiots." In the article Pozerycki said that, "I could have gone to business school if I wanted," and that, "I really came here because my mother wanted me to. I wanted to stay home (in New Jersey) and be with my boyfriend and be a waitress." Pozerycki feels that both comments were taken out of context of her conversation with the reporter in the cafeteria. "My whole point was that I'm really glad I came here and didn't stay home and be a waitress. She (the reporter) seemed to have a preconceived notion (of the college) and took the quotes to fit her idea."

"I could see how it could happen," said Jenkins, "I don't think she's out to down us but it doesn't look good for the school." Chuck Cordovano, however who was interviewed along with several other West Hall residents feel that, "From what I read of the article I didn't feel we were misrepresented." Pozerycki admitted, "I guess if I didn't want her to print it I never should have said it," although she added, "I had never had experience with reporters. We were just having a conversation with our peers."

Jenkins added, "I like the idea of a liberal arts education and I love a small school and I was just giving the lady my opinion." He concluded, "Granted (the article) was an effort, but it was pretty weak."

Education curriculum evaluation completed

by FREEMAN DODSWORTH

The Maryland State Board of Education completed its evaluation of the teacher education curriculum here last week as part of a state-wide program looking into all such programs at Maryland colleges.

The program is repeated every five years, and is executed under guidelines set down by the National Association of State Directors of Teacher Education and Certification (NASDTEC). A team of administrators and professors from all over Maryland performed the evaluation, which took from Wednesday to Friday of last week. The object of the eValuation, according to Dean Gary Clarke, is to determine whether the various course plans in the Education Department meet the many standards set by NASDTEC in a 109-page volume which served as the criterion for the inquiry.

After conducting interviews with faculty and administration members, as well as students involved in the program, and talking to officials at the schools at which the students teach as part of the program, the team examined course guides and other key documents that explain the curriculum. On the basis of these considerations thay will decide whether or not to approve the program for a certain department. If a department's education block is not approved, then the only alternative for a student wanting to be certified to teach that subject is to go

by RITA McWILLIAMS

An informal discussion was held by the Library Committee Monday concerning the theft of books from Miller Library. The overall sentiment of the meeting was favorable to the purchase of a magnetic surveillance system to enforce the checking out of books.

Betty Wasson, College Librarian, presented statistics on the number of missing books from a sampling taken in 1978. Approximately $7,000 worth of books have been missing for each year from 1975 to 1978. The formula was devised by Dr. Brown to be a reliable indication of loss, not to produce a definite figure.

The monetary loss is not viewed as the most important problem. Miss Wasson says that although she is "alarmed at the implication of these figures," as a librarian, she is responsible to have books available when needed. Assistant Professor of English Dr. Richard Gillin, Chairman of the Committee, voiced the general consensus when he said "it is exasperating when books I need are missing."

Most books are removed from the library by students without being checked out because students fail to bring their id. cards, necessary to check out books, with them. The id. cards are used because the library staff found that class they were unable to read students' signatures and that identification was necessary.

Library aide Bernie Kelley said that Schmoldt's resignation

Two months ago, after the faculty requested a fivepercent emergency supplement and a subsequent twenty-percent salary increase, we wrote that good teachers were becoming increasingly difficult to keep.

Bill Schmoldt's resignation last week, the fourth such decision by a faculty member in the past six months, confirms that feeling and reveals a trend that has been painfully obvious to many professors here for some time: the advantages of teaching at Washington College no longeroutweigh the many hardships.

With the loss of Schmoldt, the problem of the faculty's salary and its consequences for faculty morale becomes one the College can no longer ignore. Schmoldt may literally be irreplaceable. Even if somcone clse is willing to teach his larger-than-normal course load for lower-than-normal pay, no one could do all the things he has done for other departments and the administration.

Although the problem the College faces is not simply a matter of increasing faculty salaries (three of the four professors who have left in the last six months have not gone to other schools but into industry, suggesting that low salaries are epidemic in higher education today), it does concern money. Schmoldt is too much of a gentleman to say so, but his reason for leaving was probably the College's failure to respond to three needs in his department:

- A replacement for the Computing Center's outdated IBM 1130.
- Another faculty member.
- A sizeable increase in the near poverty-level salary of his assistant.

Those grievanccs, in addition to offers from private industry, must have combined to make it impossible for Schmoldt to stay any longer. It may not be long before no faculty will stay at Washington voluntarily.

The Board of Visitors and Governors ought to authorize the emergency five-percent supplement. That action should be followed by the twenty percent increase next year. Low faculty morale has already undermined the educational quality of the College. The loss of Schmoldt, and rumors that his resignation will not be the last this semestcr, make it clear that steps must be taken soon for the good of not only the faculty but the College as a whole.

be believed "there is no malicious intent involved. People just take the books for a day and think they will return them, but then the books get misplaced." Gillin said, "the thefts may be sins of omission ... It is intellectually dishonest, cheating others of books.

Vice President for Finance Gene Hessey said that a magnetic-coded surveillance system would initially cost $12,000 with an annual maintenance of $2,000 above cost. Assistant Librarian Mariam an Miriam Hoffecker supported the purchase of such a system: "in the long run it would be less than the cost of the loss of books. The disappearance of books is increasing every year."

Two alternatives to the surveillance system were discussed at the meeting — closed stacks and keeping id cards on file at the main desk. Those that attended the m-eting felt that closed stacks would be a great inconvenience to staff and students. Having id cards filed at the front desk, it was felt, wouldn't solve the problem because because students could still walk out without taking time to stop by the desk.

Because of the high initial cost of the system, a source of funds must be found. This is currently the biggest problem to overcome before the new security system can be adopted.

Assistant Professor of Frence Colin Dickson voiced his approval: "most campuses have this system. Why should we remain an exception." The surveillance system was approved as a whole by the Library Committee to be recommended to the faculty for a final decision.

Student representation to Board requested

For the past several weeks, this column has been devoted to the discussion of various problems at Washington College. It has also suggested steps which the administration, the faculty and students may take to help alleviate these problems. At the November 26th SGA meeting, a committee was formulated to investigate and prepare a catalogue of resources available to students in the surrounding area and to look into the possibilities of a student center. The committee to reform the Student Judiciary is in the final stages of it's work, as is the committee reporting on violence, vandalism and theft. We have by these and other actions shown that we are very much concerned and very willing to help solve the current problems faced Washington College.

We would like the opportunity to do more.

In the Education Amendments of 1972, United States Senate Bill 659 stated in part: "One elected student should be a fully enfranchised member of the governing board of every institution of higher education in America." In Maryland, Coppin State, Goucher, Hood, St. John's, the Universities of Maryland, Baltimore and Hopkins all have either full voting membership or at least formal comittees of open communication with the governing board of the school. Washington College has no such arrangement. The current policy of the Board allows student observation but not free participation. Perhaps the members of the Board of Visitors and Governors at Washington College could enlist in the spirit of cooperation that we are attempting to foster to help WC and allow full student representation to the Board.

Briefly...

Reid to read

Mr. Alastair Reid, poet, translator, and journalist with The New Yorker magazine, will discuss the art of translation on Wednesday, December 5, at 8 pm in the Sophie Kerr Room. Entitled "Lost in Translation," his talk will focus on his own experience in translating the work of Latin American writers, especially Neruda and Borges. This lecture is sponsored by the Lecture Series Committee and will be followed by a reception to which all are invited.

ID cards requested

Associate Dean of Students Edward Maxcy reported this week that Chestertown police and College security guards ask all students to carry their ID cards when out at night. The police and security guards reported having trouble keeping non-students off campus at night.

Library TV on

The new television set in Miller Library is now available to those of the college community interested in viewing programs of a general cultural nature.

Professors and students may reserve the set for particular programs by signing up in advance at the Circulation desk. A loose leaf notebook is provided for this purpose which will keep a record of the types of programs being watched.

Gym open on weekends

The gym will be open on Saturdays and Sundays between the hours of 10 and 5 for use by Washington College students, faculty and staff upon presentation of their WC ID. to the security officer on duty.

The ID will be returned when the individuals leaves the building. (Guests must be signed in by the member of the college community who will be responsible for the guest's conduct.

through the state, and have them do a "credit count." This involves sending in records of all courses taken while here, and then letting the state decide whether or not you should be certified. According to Clarke, even this is not a guarantee that a student will be certified, and is very inconvenient.

The preliminary results of the team's study were presented in an oral report on Friday and included critiques of each department. This is only the first step, however. The committee will send a draft of their findings, including criticisms, to the school in late December. The school will then reply to any of the criticisms that it feels is necessary, because, said Education Department Chairman Sean O'Connor), "they may not get a full understanding of the situation in the short time that they are here." The State Department of Education will then consider the bulk of information, including the school's replies, and send a final report early next year.

One of the departments here which was critisized was English. One of the complaints was that there are no courses in nonWestern literature taught here. Assistant English Professor Richard Gillin feels that this is not a valid cirticism because "We are limited in the things that we can teach, due to our size and the fact that we have no one who specializes in non-western literature." O'Connor also feels some concern over the size of the College. He feels that in some cases the people evaluating our programs might come from large schools, such as the University of Maryland, and may be judging Washington on a level with schools of that size.

Most Washington officials involved seemed to feel that the meeting was successful and a profitable experience, although O'Connor said "We do plan to apply to a few things."

Said Clarke: "The positive aspects of the meeting certainly outweigh the inconveniences that it caused." O'Connor said "If we can do what they are asking, and meet their standards, then the schools that our people work in will be proud." He added that the Department of Education is already planning the next evaluation, in 1984.

DiMaggio discusses Fall recruiting

by BILL MORTIMER

With the end of the Fall Semester close at hand, Director of Admissions Mickey DiMaggio and his staff are completing their fall recruiting efforts.

DiMaggio and his staff of three have been visiting high schools, college fairs, and community colleges as part of their effort. DiMaggio said that this year's effort was given to Maryland and schools within a 150-mile radius from the College. The recruiting effort decreased in out-of-state areas such as New York and the New England area.

This, however, should not result in a decline in out-of-state applications since the staff also attended a national convention in St. Louis. From October 8-11, the staff participated in this convention for high school guidance counselors from all over the country. There they introduced Washington College to counselors from such states as New Mexico and Florida and attended various seminars. DiMaggio said there may be some definite changes in the recruiting stagedy as a result of the seminars.

With applications beginning to come in over the Christmas break, the task of choosing the Class of 1984 will soon be starting. The first step made after an inquiry is received is the mailing of various brochures and letters. "Phone Power," telephone calls made by present students to prospective ones begins at the end of March. In addition, Pre-Freshman Day is being planned for the spring, along with several other on-campus programs.

Currently, a retention study program for all present students at Washington College is being worked on. DiMaggio said, "One program I would like to see initiated is a Post Freshman Day to find what the feelings of the freshmen are after one semester at Washington College." He said he hopes that this program will be in effect by next semester.

From the inquiries about the College which have been coming in, DiMaggio and his staff are in the process of preparing their first report. Although DiMaggio does not know the exact statistics yet, there seems to be more inquiries this year than last. The staff is also tra-king where the inquiries are coming from and determining their best course of recruiting strategy for next year.

The current freshman class, DiMaggio said, has a different attitude than the Class of 1982 did as freshmen. DiMaggio said "based on the statistics we have, there doesn't seem to be any difference from this year's freshman class and last year's. However, I have been told by several professors that this year's class appears to be more motivated and serious about their academic classes." The standards DiMaggio will apply to the applications for next year's class will be no different than in the past, DiMaggio said.

DiMaggio says quite a few transfers will enroll in January 1980. The Admissions Staff also intends to begin an intensive recruiting program for transfers in the state of Maryland in January.

Seidman to give reading this week

by PETER TURCHI
News Editor

Assistant Professor of English Hugh Seidman will give a reading of his own poetry on Wednesday, December 12.

Seidman, who is filling in for best-selling novelist and basketball star Robert Day, has published two books of poetry: Blood Lords and Collecting Evidence. "The Bracelet," a poem form the former collection, was issued as a Broadside earlier this semester.

Seidman recently concluded a four-lecture series entitled Contemporary Directions in American Poetry. The subjects of the lectures were Adrienne Rich, Clayton Eshleman, John Ashbery and George Oppen, four poets who, according to Seidman, represent four very different aspects of American poetry. In general the lectures gave a brief overview of each poet's life, a sampling of their work, and an explanation of what each of these poets is trying to accomplish.

The series was particularly interesting not just because, as English Department Chairman Nancy Talum said in her introductions to the Lectures "Most of us probably aren't familiar with these writers," but because Seidman has a special insight as a poet in addition to knowing one or two of the writers personally. The lecture on Rich was perhaps the most clear and descriptive, while coincidentally being the longest of the four. Seidman madeclear connections between Rich's attitudes toward feminism and isolated incidents in her life and her poetry.

In contrast, the lecture on Ashbery, a particularly enigmatic poet, was an attempt to convey to the audience some explanation of what Ashbery is trying to do. Seidman said that this poet does little rewriting and is interested in the sound of his poems; he attempts to write "songs" of a sort. At a discussion after the lecture Seidman said that he found Ashbery "unreadable," but that he wanted to give the lecture to demonstrate another aspect of contemporary poetry. Ashbery is the winner of the Pulitzer Prize, the National Book Award, and the National Book Critics Circle Award for Self-Portrait in a Convex Mirror in 1976.

While filling in for Day this semester Seidman has taught three classes of creative writing. His reading next week will be the only reading of his own work that he will give during his stay.

Zavatsky: "Reading public for poetry growing steadily"

by PETER TURCHI
News Editor

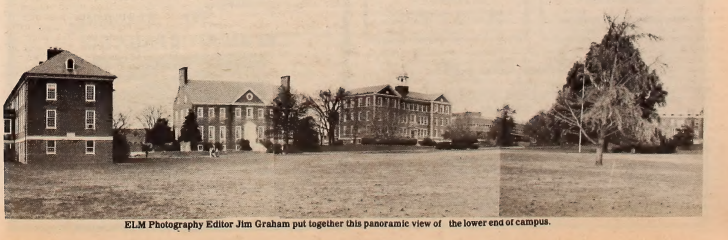
Doubleday doesn't even have a poetry editor. Harper and Row publishes three books of poetry each year. That, says William Zavatsky, is why he became a small press publisher.

Zavatsky, who spoke here this past Wednesday, said that although the major commercial publishers do not print much poetry, "the reading public for poetry is growing steadily." He went on to say that he began his career as a magazine publisher, then printed a book for a friend at The Print Shop, a government-funded publisher in Brooklyn. After the succuss of that effort Zavatsky set up his own business in his apartment in New York.

"There's a great renegade tradition of publishing your own book of poems," he said, using Walt Whitman's Leaves of Grass as an example. He also said that he thinks there is "a lot of good poetry out there that isn't being published. I publish books because I want to read them. I figured if I wanted to read them, maybe someone else would."

Zatavsky's company, Sun Press, has published 16 books in its four-and-a-half years of existence, and will issue seven more volumes by the end of this coming January. Most of his publishing has been made possible by grants from the Literary Program of the National Endowment of the Arts. Zavatsky said that although he has won awards two years in a row for "Best Book of Poetry Published by a Small Press," he hasn't received a grant for the upcoming year, so he'll be forced to suspend operation until late summer or fall. Beginning in 1981 he hopes to publish two issues of his magazine, Sun, and eight books every year. "I'm not interested in staying in business, though," he says, "I'm interested in publishing books I like."

Zabatsky is also a poet, and he gave a reading in the Sophie Kerr room Wednesday night. Most of his selections, such as "Lunch Counter Encounter," "Ugilly," and "Morphology of Fetus" were intended to be humorous. At one point a member of the audience, Isaac Van Ducke, spontaneously joined the poet on harmonica for a rendition of "Vampire Blues."



160 students give up turkeys for Thanksgiving

WC News Bureau

Chestertown, MD—This year, more than 160 Washington College students gave up their turkey when the college served its annual Thanksgiving dinner on Wednesday, November 14. As they have for the past four years, the students asked that the 20 extra turkeys be turned over to the Kent County Department of Social Services to be distributed to local families who would not other wise have a traditional turkey dinner on Thanksgiving Day.

According to Dave Knowles, Director of Food Services at Washington College, the students should be proud of the extra effort they put out this year in getting many more students to give up their turkey. The Student Government Association was responsible for encouraging so many students to join the effort. "They are the ones who initiated the idea and carried it through," said Knowles. "I just cook the turkeys, as usual."

The birds were cooked and split and will be distributed to local households on Wednesday. This Thanksgiving, 30-40 families were able to share in the generosity of the Washington College students.

Cagers roll over St. Mary's, 83-76, in season opener

by RICH SCHATZMAN
Sports Editor

Tuesday night the Washington College basketball team officially opened its 1979-80 season with an 83-76 victory over St. Mary's College. The Shoreman Shoremen built what seemed to be an insurmountable 71-54 lead with 6:38 left in the game, only to see it dwindle away with some shabby passing and poor foul shooting late in the game.

Other than these problems, however, WC played a fine game. St. Mary's was a formidable opponent, but there wasn't much doubt as to who had the better team. Joe Moye led the scoring with 18, fourteen of which came in the first half. Jim Corey added 17 and Rich Dwyer had 16. Karl Fornoff had 10 points and played some outstanding, hustling defense. David Blackwell had 8 points and 8 rebounds, in addition to playing a fine floor game. The rest of the scoring had Rich Schatzman with 9, Craig Langwost with 4, and Bill Graham with 1.

Although it was very nice to get the first win under our belts, we have no time to dwell upon it. The biggest game of the year is Saturday night at 7:30 as Widener comes to WC looking for revenge. Last we embarrassed the Chester, Pa. school by handing them their first MAC loss in two years. Add the crowd abuse at the game on top of that, and we come to one conclusion: they're out going to be out to get us, 222.

Commentary

CAGE NOTES: Freshman Cecil Sapp, injured in a car accident two weeks ago, didn't play much on Tuesday, but is expected to see action on Saturday. Rich Dwyer had 10 rebounds to go along with his 16 points Tuesday. Captain Joe Moye scored our first basket of the season.

Two new committees formed at SGA meeting

by KATHY WURZBACHER

The establishment of two new committees was the highlight of Monday's brief Student Government Association meeting.

After discussion about the commitment of the SGA to try to improve the quality of the College and its social aspects, the Senate voted on two new committees.

The first was formed "to compile a catalogue of facilities available to college students in and around the Chestertown area," said SGA President Jay Young. "We hope, this semester, to publish semester make use of those facilities. For example, it will make students aware of the Chesapeake College swimming pool and possibly have buses in it next semester." The Committee is headed by George Dennis, President of the Junior Class.

The second Committee was formed "to look into the possibility of a student center and possibly an extension of the coffee house" said Young. Dave Panasci will head the Committee.

In addition, the Residence Committee talked about the possibility of landscaping the Kent Quadrangle. "This is the action we've been talking so much about," said Young.

Smoking ban, lecture series discussed at SAB meeting

by RITA McWILLIAMS

A ban on smoking in classrooms and the proposed SGAsponsored lecture series were the topics discussed at the November 19th meeting of the Student Academic Board. Sophomore Mike Garvey's proposal to submit to the faculty a ban on smoking in classrooms was unanimously accepted by the Board. The proposal could urge professors to support a no smoking policy during classes.

An SGA sponsored lecture series was again discussed by the Board. The series would allow students and faculty another medium in which to participate in discussion outside of the classroom Tentatively, the lectures would begin directly after dinner and become a regular, weekly event involving a large portion of the student population. The SGA lectures would be in competition with the William James Forum and the Lecture Series, perhaps even coordinating the two groups in an effort to provide better scheduling of lectures on campus. Says President Paul Drink, "A large amount of SGA money goes to the William James Forum, yet it does not draw a large attendance." He plans to initiate incentives for participating in the proposed series, as is done at Harvard, in hopes of attracting guest speakers and increasing the popularity of the various lecture series on campus.

College obtains funding for new computer

McLain to seek faculty salary increase

Twelve percent increase in sight, but faculty not satisfied

by GEOFF GARINTHER
Editor-in-Chief

College President Joseph McLain will recommend a more than twelve percent increase in faculty and staff salaries at tomorrow's Board of Visitors and Governors' meeting.

McLain announced his intention to the faculty Monday night, saying that he will suggest a $250,000 salary increase pool—double last year's $125,000 pool, which represented a six percent increase in salaries at the time.

"The final amount of the pool will depend on how well we do this year," said McLain at the meeting, adding that that amount would be determined by the Board's Budget and Finance Committee in February. "(But) unless I miss my prediction, that amount of money will be set aside."

Later in the week, McLain said that the $250,000 pool "is what I'm going to propose, support, and fight for."

Not yet satisfied

The faculty, which in October asked for a five percent emergency supplement in January and a twenty percent increase next year, was not entirely satisfied with the President's announcement.

"While I'm very appreciative of that pay increase," said Associate Professor of Economics Mike Malone, "it just barely keeps up with the inflation rate," which he said is expected to reach thirteen percent by the end of the year.

"This faculty has not kept up with inflation since 1973. Malone said to McLain. "I would implore you to ask for a pay increase of something in the area of twenty percent."

Fails to relieve difficulties

Malone said after the meeting that the proposed increase "will fail to relieve the financial difficulties of the faculty.

"The pay increase we got this September has already been offset by inflation...By the time we get a twelve percent increase next September, we'll have lost nine percent (to inflation)."

Economics Department Chairman Mike Bailey agreed that the faculty was not satisfied.

"The indication seems to be that as satisfying as the increase in the size of the pool is to faculty, that simply is not enough.

"I think what the faculty would like to have from the administration," Bailey added, "is some assurance that inflation isn't going to completely overtake us."

$125,000 Hodson grant will buy replacement for IBM 1130

by GEOFF GARINTHER
Editor-in-Chief

The College has obtained $125,000 from the Hodson Trust for the purchase of a new computer, President Joseph McLain announced at Monday's faculty meeting.

Although funding for the long sought-after computer will become available later this month, the installation date has not been set yet, said McLain. The type of computer to be purchased, however,—a PDP-11—has been proposed by Computing Center Director Bill Schmoldt, who last week resigned effective at the end of the semester.

"It's an ideal system," said Schmoldt of the PDP-11. "You'll be able to offer a great deal more than with the IBM 1130."

Math Department Chairman Richard Brown said, "What it means essentially is that one has a greater variety of languages to work with" in the PDP-11.

Schmoldt said he would like to see boht PASCAL and BASIC taught with the new computer. The only computer language currently taught at the College is FORTRAN.

"The best idea would be to have two levels taught—one for students whose interests do not lie in computing, and one for those whose interests do," said Schmoldt.

Economics Department Chairman Mike Bailey, one of the most frequent users of the computer, warned that, "The computer isn't the whole show. You need people there to run it, and to make its use easier. You need someone with enthusiasm and dedication and all the things Bill Schmoldt had."

The College has not yet announced its plan to fill Schmoldt's position as Computing Center Director and Assistant Professor of Mathematics.

Visiting Poet Hugh Seidman will give a reading of his new work this Tuesday, December 11th, not Wednesday, December 12th, as was reported in last week's elm.

Grievance spelled out in resolution

Faculty disputes Board's response to "financial exigency" issue

by GEOFF GARINTHER
Editor-in-Chief

The faculty Monday night endorsed unanimously a resolution stating its disapproval of the Board of Visitors and Governors' response to faculty concern over the controversial "exigency clause."

"Mainly, it's a statement of our position vis a vis the letter we received from (Board Chairman) Dean (Robert) Roy on October 10th," said Dr. Michael Bailey, chapter president of the Association of American University Professors.

Missing the point

The resolution, which as submitted by Bailey received the unanimous support of the faculty, cited three reasons for the disapproval: "It is our conviction that Dean Roy's views conflict with the charter of Washington College, represent a selective reading on the legal opinion expressed in the Goucher College case, and seem to miss the point of the faculty's original request dated October 2, 1979."

Roy's letter, in response to the faculty's request for a joint administration-faculty committee to study procedures should "financial exigency" arise, stated that "the faculty has been alarmed, we think unnecessarily, because no change in policy is intended."

Roy's letter went on to say that the Board could not delegate its responsibility—a statement the faculty disagreed with in its resolution.

"This statement appears to conflict with Article VI of the Charter of Washington College..., which states: ...the president 2 and professors...shall be capable of exercising such powers and authorities as the Visitors and Governors...think necessary to delegate to them... ...Clearly, then, the Charter does not prevent the Board from sharing or delegating whatever authority it may find appropriate for ensuring the welfare and proper governance of the College."

The faculty also addressed Roy's assertion at the October Board meeting that "good will will prevail to the maximum degree" in situations of financial exigency.

"While we do not question the sincerity or good faith of the Board or the Administration," states the resolution, "we do believe that if it is desirable that their implicit powers of termination be made explicit in the college by-laws, then it is equally desirable that the implicit procedural rights of tenured members of the faculty be made similarly explicit."

The resolution ends with a request for reconsideration by the Board. "The plea remains a call for reasonable rules in place of indefinite authority."

Bailey, who asked only that the resolution be included in the minutes of the December faculty meeting and not sent directly to the Board, said "I hope they'll reconsider, but I wouldn't bet on it."

editorial

Looking ahead to the Eighties

Turbulent. That word best describes the atmosphere here as we leave the seventies and head into the Eighties. Every issue from student representation on the Board to the very existence of the small, liberal arts college seems to be reaching a crisis just as the College nears its Bicentennial. Here are some of the problems facing Washington College in the 1980s.

•Many believe the decline of faculty morale signals the beginning of the end for the College. But when President McLain announced at last Monday's faculty meeting that he would recommend to the Board of Visitors and Governors that the pool for salary increases be doubled to a quarter of a million dollars, faculty spirits seemed to rise, at least for the moment. Economics Professor Mike Malone was quick to point out, however, that doubling last year's average six percent raise to about twelve percent still leaves the faculty behind the current thirteen percent inflation rate. The Administration counters that no one is keeping up with inflation these days. The question that remains is why Washington College faculty salaries continue to lag behind those of virtually every other school in the state.

•The acquisition of funding for the new computer is perhaps the most significant financial achievement in recent years, and President McLain is to be commended for his quick action (two weeks from submission of the written request to funding). But problems may arise after the computer is turned on and someone is needed to run it. Will the College hire two people to fill Bill Schmoldt's dual role 222 as Computing Center Director and Assistant Math Professor? Or will it discover someone else willing to be paid one salary for two jobs? The College will have to solve this dilemma as early as next semester.

•The faculty is not the only group having trouble communicating with the Board of Visitors and Governors. SGA President Jay Young has called for some form of dialogue between students and the Board. Among other issues, Young wants to discuss the lack of facilities here and its relation to campus vandalism. Swimming pools and student centers may seem like luxuries in light of the faculty's need to maintain a decent standard of living, but at least the interest shows a renewal of student concern for the welfare of the College. The Board would do well to listen to some of the SGA's ideas.

•The immediate problem resulting from the Elm's forced budget cutback has been the disappointment of seeing only half as much newspaper each week. The long term—and perhaps larger—problem concerns the paper's future. Reduction in size has resulted in a corresponding reduction in student support and enthusiasm, endangering the paper's existence as early as next year. In order to insure the paper's continuity, we need a large pool of reporters who will be eager eventually to take on the responsibilities of editors. In order to maintain the interest of reporters, we need space for them to fill. For this, we need an eight-page format. During the Bicentennial celebration, only a year-and-a-half away, a healthy student newspaper will be essential.

•The Admissions Office has taken most of theblame for the College's decreasing academic standards. But the lowering of once-high standards appears now to be the price of keeping the College above water financially. This is the most perplexing problem of all, one for which there may not be an immediate solution. But it is nonetheless a problem, and it won't go away by refusing to admit that we have in fact lowered our standards in the past few years.

General Chairman of the Third Century Campaign Phillip J. Wingate said at the October Board meeting that this College's problem is, and always has been, a lack of money. The fundraising campaign, with its ambitious goals for dramatically increasing the College's endowment, hopes to alleviate the problem at the start of the College's third century. The 1980s may turn out to be the most crucial decade in the long history of Washington College.

Letter to the Editor

Communication between Board and students requested

The following is an open letter to the College's Board of Visitors and Governors from Student Government Association President Jay Young.

The primary purpose of this letter is to communicate some of the feelings the students of Washington College have on the current state of the College. My first concern in writing this letter is to insure that it is received in the manner in which it is intended. The SGA, as a representative body of the students of the College, has perceived a strong concern for the mounting problems the College is experiencing. We have expressed some of these feelings in The Elm's last three issues and now hope to restate and explain these feelings and communicate them to you directly.

The intention of this letter is threefold: we intend to explain what we perceive the current problems facing the College to be; we would like to express our sincere concern about the College in general and most specifically these problems; and finally speaking we would like to offer our assistance and suggest possible solutions.

Comparatively speaking, Washington College is very much behind the times in terms of facilities. According to our research, Washington is the only college in the state of Maryland without a swimming pool. We are also the only college without a student center to speak of. We have a tremendous asset in the Chester River and the Truslow Boathouse which we have refused to take advantage of. Despite repeated requests by students, Resident Assistants, and Deans of Students, our campus security "force" remains totally inadequate. The Hill Dormitories, given the last rites two years ago, remain untouched. The facilities provided by the town do little to alleviate the problem, and the gas crisis hinders the efforts to find cnterlainment elsewhere.

This severe lack of facilities affects the College in two major ways: first, it greatly hinders enrollment in both quality and quanity. Lack of quanity means less money and lack of quality means lowering standards. No one can deny that we are suffereing from these ailments. In 1976, 49.6 percent of the students that enrolled in Washington College were in the top fifth of their class. In 1979, that figure has dropped to 29.7 percent. Average SAT scores have dropped 73 points in the same period. After midterm examinations, 48 per. cent of the freshmen males found themselves with grades of two Ds, or below.

The second way we are affected by this lack of facilities is in the behavior of those already enrolled. It seems the major topic of conversation this year is violence, vandalism, and theft. While we realize that this lack of facilities should in no way be an excuse for such problems, it is most definitely a primary cause. One need only walk around the campus in the springtime and see the flurry of lacrosse balls, frisbees, footballs, and baseballs flying through the air, the skeeros, games, sunbathers, runners, cookouts, and concerts to see this. What happens in the winter? What is there to do? The only facility available is the gym, and due to intercollegiate sports practices, and intramural games, the gym is virtually booked from 4:00 a.m. till 11:00 4:00 a.m. till 11:00 p.m. If one were to read the faculty report on violence, vandalism, and theft, one would answer what it is we do with one word: drink. It is important to remember, however, that alcohol is not the problem — it is merely a symptom of the problem of outdated facilities.

Another major problem at the College is faculty salaries How does the College expect to attract quality educators to fill the position of the four professors who have resigned in the last six months if they are unwilling to pay them? More importantly, what about the morale of the current staff? How can a professor be expected to maintain an enthusiastic attitude about his profession when his very livelihood is insecure. How would a student feel walking into an all-night grocery store and seeing his college professor behind the counter or busing tables at a local restaurant?

We realize that Washington College is feeling the same devastating effects that the state of the economy is imposing on everyone. We also rcalize that Washington College is facing the same special difficult times that face all small liberal arts collcges. But, if unlike a lot of them, we are going to survive definite steps must be taken to address these problems.

The SGA has been making great efforts to identify and resolve as many of these problems as are within our grasp. We would like to do more. We would like to establish a method of more formal communication with the Board. In the Education Amendments of 1972, United States Senate Bill 659 stated in part "one elected student should be a fully enfranchised member of the governing board of every institution of highcr learning in America." In Maryland, Coppin State, Goucher, Hood, St. John's, the University of Maryland, Baltimore, and Towson have all either full voting membership or at least formal committees of open communication with the governing boards of the schools.

We care about Washington College. We are trying to foster a spirit of cooperation to help solve the problems of Washington College. We ask that you consider seriously the contents of this letter and take steps to establish some formal line of communication with the students.

Most sincerely and respectfully submitted
Jay Young

Attrition: students give different reasons for leaving

by KATHY STRECKFUS
Assistant Editor

Half of this year's Freshman class probably won't graduate from Washington College in 1983.

Only fifty percent of the Freshman class of 1975 made it to graduation this past June. The average attrition rate for colleges and universities nationwide is also about fifty percent.

Why do students leave Washington College? Some of those who plan to withdraw after this semester gave the reasons for their decision.

Freshman Jesse Wittich said "I was dissappointed in the academics here because so little is offered." Wittich plans to transfer to a university to major in Environmental Studies.

Wittich also said she is dissappointed in the limited women's sports offered at the College. She was involved in Field Hockey and Lacrosse in high school.

"One thing that's making it hard for my decision is I've met so many nice people. It's hard for me to leave because I like it, but I'm thinking more about my future, I guess," Wittich said.

Freshman Susan Fowler, from Delaware, said the major factor in her decision is cost. "Academically, Washington College is a great school, and I've made a lot of friends here, but I think I can be just as happy at University of Delaware, and for a lot less money, and that's a pretty unbeatable combination." She added, "The smallness of the school is a little problem; it's kind of limiting. I'm looking 2 forward to a large university."

Two freshmen said that they plan to transfer because they decided to major in subjects that the College does not offer. Mary Kearney, who will leave after Spring semester, wants to major in Nutrition. "If they had Nutrition here, stay here," she said. Linda Morton plans to transfer to Gallaudet College to major in Special Education. "It has nothing to do with the College itself or the people," she said.

Several students wished to remain anonymous. A male freshman said, "I was going to major in Math, but I'm more interested now in Computer Science." But the main reason, he said, is that the school is too small. "It's just like high school. You see the same people all the time doing the same thing."

A male sophomore complained that the course selection is too limited. "I can find courses in my major, but other than that, it is pretty hard to find what I like. I think there are better opportunities at other schools," he said.

Another male said he is leaving because he will lose his financial aid since his grades are too low, and he cannot afford to continue without it. "I have a girlfriend at home, and I try to get home as much as I can. It gets expensive," he said.

Pegasus: better organization, more coverage

by PETE TURCHI
News Editor

Better organization and more complete coverage. These are Bonnie Nelle Duncan's major goals for the 1980 Pegasus. Duncan, the editor-in-chief for next year's yearbook, said that one of the major complaints about the 1979 book was that it was unorganized. Her plans to combat the problem include dividing the book into three sections: Academia, Activities, and Athletics.

The first of these sections will include senior and faculty portraits organized by the academic department. "This idea was tried here several years ago," Duncan said, "but this year we plan to upgrade the presentation of the academic side of Washington College by devoting some coverage to what actually goes on in the classroom, what a liberal arts and sciences education means to people here, and what academic programs are unique to Washington College." Duncan plans to present several "profiles" of interesting students and faculty members in the form of short "human interest" stories in this section as well as to cover seniors and academics with more candid photos.

Activities is the name that Duncan has given to the traditional student-life section of the yearbook. "Coverage in this section will actually center on social activities and events that contribute to the student life of the campus. Our coverage of clubs is going to be more activity-oriented than ever before," Duncan said. "Last year, the Greek organizations were each covered with just one group shot. This year, we are going to give each fraternity and sorority two pages so we can cover the activities they host that are open to the whole campus — like the Sigs' Halloween Party or Alpha Chi Omega's Casino Night — since we believe their events really do contribute to the social atmosphere here.

"There are a lot of clubs here no one hears much about," Duncan continued, "but if they have any activities that they let us know about, they are going to get in the book." Duncan also said that she is going to attempt to present the other aspects of student life, including such traditional events as Freshman Orientation, Homecoming, and the Washington Birthday Convocation and Ball, in a more organized way than last year by handling them with a chronological approach.

The athletics coverage will remain virtually the same as last year, with equal coverage being given to each sport. Duncan said that she wants to correct a mistake made in several past yearbooks by accurately and completely identifying every person in each team and group photograph.

A running motif will unify the book. "We feel that Washington College is a school with a past," Duncan said, "and we hope one with a future as well. Since the College's bicentennial is approaching, we are going to feature in the book various photographs from the 'old days' on division pages. Everyone likes to look at old pictures. And this will give us a way to present our theme graphically."

Pegasus 1980 will be 160 pages long, 16 pages longer than the book produced last year. Duncan chose to forego color and special effects in order to increase coverage in the book. The yearbook will be available in early September. "What I'm trying to do with the Pegasus," said Duncan, "is to tackle the production of a yearbook from a journalistic approach and to deliver the best yearbook we can get for our money."

The yearbook staff has not yet chosen a cover design, so anyone who has any ideas can contact the yearbook staff prior to the end of the semester. In addition to Duncan, the staff consists of Randy Watson, Assistant Editor; Mary Van Tuyl, Editorial Assistant; and photographers Rick Adelberg; Freeman Dodsworth; Sallie Hunt; Jim Graham; Joyce Grinvalsky; Joe Holt; and Bob Leonard.

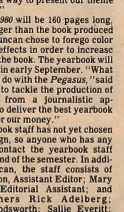
Publications Board to recommend activities fee increase

The Board of Publications will recommend to the Board of Visitors and Governors an increase of as much as $3 per student in the portion of the activities fee allocated to the Elm next year.

That decision came after the Publications Board approved the proposed 1980-81 Elm budget of $11,407. In order to meet that figure, the Elm's portion of the activities fee per student next year would have to be between $16.29 and $16.90, based on enrollment estimates ranging from 675 to 700 students. The Elm's current allocation per student $13.75.



The proposed 1980-81 budget is based on 25 eight-page issues and represents an almost $1,200 increase over 1978-79 expenditures, also based on 25 eight-page issues. Next year's budget also includes $600 debt toward retirement of the $1,600 incurred by last year's Elm.

The Board also approved a final budget of $7,812 for this year's Elm, including $300 for debt retirement.

Ayatullah Khomeini:

by TAI SUNG AN

Since the triumphant return of Ayatullah Khomeini to Iran in February 1979, the country has been virtually ruled by a powerful, 15-member committee composed of six Islamic mullahs and seven secular figures (there are two vacancies at present) and officially called the Islamic Revolutionary Council. (Prime Minister Mehdi Bazargan's government, which collapsed in early November, was simply a puppet of the Council.) Ayatullah Khomeini, Iran's supreme ruler, gave the Islamic Revolutionary Council a mandate to rule the country until the voters would approve a new theocratic constitution conferring virtually autocratic powers on him and elect a National Assembly and a President. It is certain that all, or most, of the members in the Council will play a dominant role in the new power structure of Iran.

The Council members have kept their identity secret. The most visable members of the secretive Council to the outside world, especially since the takeover of the U.S. Embassy in Tehran on November 4, have been Abol Hassan Bani-Sadr, ex-Foreign Minister and currently Minister of Economic and Financial Affairs, and Sadeh Ghotzedah, ex-Director of National Iranian Radio and Television and the new Foreign Minister. Their visable public exposure does not signify, however, that they are the most influential members of the Council. In fact, they have acted very much as the Council's useful public-relations men, and Bani-Sadr's star is in sharp decline at the moment.

Enjoying his special status as revolutionary, priest, and politician, Ayatullah Khomeini is clearly in charge in the Council. But he often listens to other voices, as all members of the Council are his faithful clerical and lay followers.

One trait all Council members seem to share is that they have had very little practical govrnmental experience. A careful observation of the Council's decision-making in the past year clearly indicates that the Council is always internally divided. The men at the top in Iran have differed among themselves, and some seriously and bitterly,on important ideological, policy, and other issues in the past. As a result, the Council has been effected by factional strife, which is further exacerbated by personal rivalries and antipathies.

The phrase "factional" in the context of Iranian politics under Ayatullah Khomeini is never meant to imply that there have always been fixed or close-knit factions within the Council, constantly enmeshing themselves in power struggle. What it does mean is that the Council members have been entering into changing coalitions with some of their colleagues in order to maximize their own individual influence, and often, to influence the Council's decision in ideological directions congenial to their own point to view. In other words, different Council members probably ally themselves temporarily with other members on specific issues and policy-making is significantly influenced by debates and conflict among them. But policy decisons are obviously subject to review, and the Council has occasionally made the major shifts in policy as a result of shifting coalitions and balance of power in the highest of decision-making councils, suggesting that the Council members adjust their view to changing circumstances. Some members may constantly or consistently remain on one or another side of any question, but other members apparently shift their ground as they deem necessary.

The Islamic Revolutionary Council at the moment can be described as an uneasy two-way alliance and neither moderate nor militant factions have gained total ascendancy in the consequent tug-of-war. Ayatullah Khomeini has remained in the center of these factions to keep them working together by intervening whenever a debate between them runs aground, but has also manipulated them to serve his own political purposes.

Obviously, Iran's Islamic revolution still has a long course to run. So the present conflict between the moderate and militant groups inside Iran's Islamic inner power sanctum will be likely to continue until Ayatullah Khomeini decides to throw his weight and influence openly and decisively behind one or the other faction at some critical juncture of the continuing revolution. Since he was catapulted into control of a nation of 36 million people, Ayatullah Khomeini has never been shackled by scrupies in disavowing his faithful followers when circumstances rendered them political liabilities.

As of this writing, Ayatullah Khomeini's militant clerical followers (Ali Akbar Rafsanjani, Mohammed Javad Bahonar, Asghar Moussavi-Khoeni, and Ayatullah Mohhamed Beheshti) are in the ascendency. They see their mission as establishing a new Islamic QUESTION: What do you think should be done about the situation in Iran?

Ted Mathias, Georgetown, Freshman
"I think the Shah should not be returned. There should be a formal investigation by the U.N. about his finances and crimes.

Doug Hallam , Lutherville, Junior
"I want to get the hostages out. The U.S. has its hands tied; we should try economic and diplomatic pressures in an attempt to force the Iranians to free the hostages."

Darlene Coleman, Sudlersville, Senior
"I think that we should peacefully negotiate with the Ayatollah and I think our major object should be to get the hostages back before the end of the year."

Joel Roberts, Cambridge, Senior
"I think we should give an ultimatum : a choice between the oil fields or the hostages. If he wishes to keep the economy, he has to release the hostages. It is necessary to show force."

state and society and purging Iran of foreign (i.e. Western) influence. They enjoyed a domina" dominant voice in authoring the country's new Islamic constitution, which was overwhelmingly approved by the national referendum on December 2 and 3, after having rid-tive students, including the mob of self-acclaimed students who overran the U.S. embassy. They have so far opposed negotiations over the American hostages or extradition of the Shah.

Clearly, Ayatullah Khomeini is a man in a hurry. Having waited through 16 and victory. The Americans working in the U.S. embassy in Tehran may have fallen victim, most of all, to Khomeini's efforts aimed at marshaling support for his Islamic revolution, which has been floundering in its own disorder. He has deliberately kept the current emoden more or less roughshod over the handful of liberals still fighting a rear-guard defense of Western ideals. The Council's militant clerical majority has been very much suspicious of many of the members of the liberal opposition to the Shah and the Iranians who have returned from political exile in the West (including, needless to say, such secular members of the Council as Abol Hassan Bani-Sadr, Sadeh Ghotbzadeh, and Ali Akbar Moinfar.) No matter how good their anti-Shah credentials, the more western-oriented pragmatists are constantly under suspicion of hankering after false gods like democracy and freedom of the press, heresies that presuppose that all government, even Islamic theocracies, can go wrong and might require public criticism or correction.

The Council's militant Islamics have the closest ties to Iran's politically ac-years of exile, he is now, at 79, obsessed with pushing through his vision for Iran, as a Platonic Republic with a grand ayatullah as a philosopher-king, before his death. But Khomeini is hardly immortal, infallible, and omnipotent, and he is finding Iranian reality no more tractable than did the Shah. As he has faced many difficult, and even some insurmountable, problems in the midst of his struggle to build a consensus out of chaos and to impose his ideas for a radically different political, economic, and social system, he expresses his frustrations in dark mutterings about unholy conspiracies allegedly concocted and coached by the "Great Satan" (the United States) behind Iran's back.

Ayatullah Khomeini is a type of man who thrives in a crisis. He has always believed that "holy war" is a prerequisite to revolutionary commitment tionally powerful anti-American campaign going as a unifying force to build support and votes for the new Islamic Constitution, while at the samc time wanting to prevent it from getting out of control. He has been willing even to allow a degree of melodrama and rhetoric as long as the current anti-American campaign is under control.

Seen in this context, the fate of the 50 American hostages in Tehran may hinge more upon a domestic event in Iran early in December — the national referendum on Ayatullah Khomeini's new constitution which may serve as a potential watershed in the anti-American campaign — than upon anything the Carter Administration can conjure. Now that the referendum has proved overwhelmingly in Khomeini's favor as a result of months of carefully constructed manipulation of public support and emotion, Iran's supreme leader might become more accommodating in attempting to work out a solution to the hostage situation. Moreover, he must realize that to conduct his continuing Islamic revolution on the single emotional issue of anti-Americam rhetoric will not be a proper way to deal with daily affairs of the country beset by many pressing economic and social problems.

How to prepare for final exams

by SUE JAMES

As the end of the semester approaches, many students are beginning to think about how they should study for final examinations.

Although many students fear final exams and cram for them at the last minute, most professors say that finals encompass comprehensive study throughout the semester.

Members of the faculty were questioned on "how students should prepare for finals," and generally, they agreed that "students should review their texts very carefully."

Here is some advice from faculty members on how to prepare for finals:

•Dr. Colin Dickson, Assistant Professor of French: "Students should come to class everyday, go over their class notes every evening after class, review very carefully any mistakes made in their tests, review all reading selections, and finally, review all the grammar explanations found in the text."

•Dr. Robert Janson-LaPalme, Assistant Professor of Art: "My finals require both objective information and thoughtful analysis. To have a ready, insightful knowledge of works of art really requires regular study habits throughout the semester. But I advise students to go as far as outlining answers so that they will at least have some practice at orgainizing their thoughts when the time comes."

PACE: "something for everybody"

by GINGER KARUPKA

"The only negative comment we got was (that we need) more publicity," said Ann Hoon, director of the Program for Adult Continuing Education.

Students and professors seem to have been generally satisfied with the program. "Everyone who took a course would like to take another" said Hoon, and "basically all (the professors) liked it, and two of the five will teach courses again in the Spring."

Dean of the College Garry Clarke is one of those two. His course this semester was operas, and he will be teaching Symphonic Music in the Spring. "They were incredibe people, very enthusiastic. I sensed from the people that they were glad to be in the class."

Hoon said, "There was only one dropout, because it was not the kind of course he had thought it would be." Plans for publicity include pamphlets, posters and radio spots. Courses next semester will begin in March and will continue for either four, six or eight weeks.

Courses to be taught include Colonial American History, a literature course, creative writing, furniture making and nutrition. "Not all courses will be taught by professors here," said Hoon. The literature course will be taught by Diane Cousineau, wife of English professor Dr. Thomas Cousineau. May Wood, an alumna of the school and a published writer, will teach the creative writing course. "I'm eager to have women teaching some of the courses," added Hoon. A cabinetmaker will teach the furniture making class. Scheduling will be flexible, as will fees. A four week course will be $25, a six week course $35 and an eight week course $45. Courses will be taught at different times during the day and evening. Hoon concluded, "I think it's a very exciting program. There's something for everybody."

Modern Language Poetry Reading draws well

by GINGER KURAPKA

The annual Modern Language Poetry Reading held in the Coffee House Thursday, November 29, involved students, professors, and six foreign languages.

The reading, including poems in such diverse languages as Hebrew, Portugese, and Italian drew an audience of about thirty people. Not all of the professors who read came from the language departments; Political Science Professor Daniel Premo read works by a Peruvian poet and Stuart Knee read poems of the Jewish revival.

Both language assistants, Gerti Braschel and Angeles Grandas, read in their respective languages. Braschel read several German nonsense poems which conveyed any meaning they might have had through the sounds of the words. Grandas read a poem of protest against Franco's regime.

Dr. George Shivers read three poems in Portugese, two sonnets by a Portugese woman and one poem by a Brazilian. As he read, he tried to differentiate between the two accents and most people, even though they couldn't understand the poems, could hear the difference in his tone.

Sophomore Paolo Galli read a passage from Dante's Inferno in its original Italian. The sound of the passage's final words was meant to convey the sound of a body falling and Galli was able to produce this effect.

The opera Mahagony by Bertoldt Brecht was recently presented on public television, and Erika Salloch read portions from the libretto. She also read some of Brecht's poems about America, including one on the majesty of Charles Laughton's belly.

Other readers included Franz Birgel, Thomas Pabon, Lisa Hartsock, and Andre Yon. Thanks to short introductions and brief translations, it was possible for most of the audience to understand most of the poems. It was encouraging not only that as many people attended as did, but also that so many widely spoken but rarely heard languages were represented.

McLain featured on In Person

by WENDY MURPHY

Dr. Joseph H. McLain, President of Washington College was the featured guest on "In Person" broadcast by the Maryland Center for Public Broadcasting on Friday, November 16 and Sunday, November 18.

Interviewed at his home, the historic Hynson-Ringgold House, McLain talked freely about himself and about the college.

In addition to being 22nd President of Washington College, McLain is also an internationally acclaimed chemist and award-winning chemistry teacher. His particular interests are solid state chemistry and pyrotechnics, which he describes as "the art of fire" and hope will become a science itself someday.

McLain first became interested in chemistry at the age of ten when his parents gave him a chemistry set and he began experimenting with various "inks and stinks". A good chemistry teacher at Baltimore's Polytechnic Institute and another one at Washington College inspired him further. It was not until he was a graduate student in chemistry at Johns Hopkins University that he became interested in teaching. He returned to Washington College with his Ph.D. from Hopkins in 1946 and has been here ever since.

"The liberal arts college has withstood the test of time," according to McLain, because a traditional education is needed for any career. Too traditional— "I would consider that a compliment," says McLain. Overspecialization should be criticized, not tradition. Unlike the dinosaur, Washington College will not become extinct, primarily because McLain is unwilling to sacrifice any of the specialness 2 of the college by enlarging or specializing. What specialness—"The desire to teach undergraduates all that we know, so that perhaps they can tach later on" is what makes us special, according to the President.

McLain sees the federal government as the toughest opponent of the liberal arts college. "They give us almost no aid whatsoever, and more importantly, they threaten our academic freedom," he feels. "We need our independence, need to cherish it; independence is at the heurt of the liberal arts tradition." Of the aid given to colleges in the state of Maryland, the private college get about 17½% now, but it is expected to increase to 2% next year. So far, the state has imposed no controls on the college it aids.

An audio tape was made of the program and may be listened to in the campus library. An audio-visual tape has been ordered and should arrive within the next two weeks.

Shoremen coming off tough loss to Widener heading into Wild Goose Tournament

Cagers dealt tough 70-69 loss

by MARK NASER

Widener brought its usually strong contingent to Russel Gymnasium last Saturday and dealt the Shore Cagers a tough 70-69 loss, later deemed a "dissappointing" defeat by coach Tom Finnegan.

The first ten minutes of the game were indicative of the battle between these two teams. Exchanging baskets, Rich Dwyer kept the score close, muscling several offensive rebounds and taking some "thread the needle" passes form Joe Moye. Carl Fornoff, Moye, and Jim Corey also added baskets. The Shoremen found themselves four points down after their first time out.

The time out seemed wasted, however. Widener took advantage of some pin-point shooting by its guards and strong offensive rebounding by its big men. The game seemed to slow down, neutralizing the strong transition game of the Shoremen. The half ended 39-32, in favor of Widener.

The Shoremen stayed six points behind Widener for about 13 minutes of the second half. Dwyer continued his fine all-around play underneath the boards, laying the ball softly off the glass. Rich Schatzman appeared to find his touch again and let a couple of shots go from the top of the key, both swishing the nets.

It suddenly seemed as if the Shoremen had caught fire. The five of Schatzman, Craig Langwost, Moye, Corey, and Dwyer seemed to click. A smooth, twisting lay-up by Langwost cut the deficit to 4. Some fine outside shooting by Corey and Moye evened the scores. However, the Shoremen were not finished. Moye and Langwost took over and carried them to a four-point lead.

Then disaster struck with the Shoremen holding a 3-point lead and only a couple of minutes remaining. Dwyer lost the ball and Widener scored. Schatzman missed the front end of a one and one; Widener got the rebound and scored. The result was a time out with the Shoremen down one. The ball was stolen from Moye and turned into a Widener basket. Corey lost a rebound and Langwost committed a costly foul, and the Shoremen went on to lose 70-69.

Tournament set for this weekend

WC News Bureau

Four evenly matched teams will meet in Chestertown this weekend for the opening of the Third Annual Wild Goose Classic Basketball Tournament to be held on Friday and Saturday, December 7 and 8 in Washington College's Cain Athletic Center.

Opening round action of Friday night will see Allentown College (Pa.) face Hunter College(N.Y.) at 6:15 p.m. Washington College will take on New Jersey Institute of Technology in the 8:15 p.m. nightcap. The losing squads from Friday night's action will meet in the Consolation Finals on Saturday at 1:30 p.m., while Friday's winners will square off for the Championship Game at 3:30 p.m. Awards will be presented to teams and individuals at 5:15 p.m.

The Shoremen, under the coaching guidance of head coach Tom Finnegan and assistants Steve Siegrist and Father Owen Mullen, have a youthful look this season. Departed via graduation are last year's Stalwarts, Doug Byrne, Steve Dickerson and Joe Wilson. Still, Finnegan has five returning lettermen and a crop of enthusiastic newcomers.

Veterans returning this year include junior guard Graig Langwost who directed the offense last year and average 8.2 points per game. He led the team in assists and steals and shot 87. from the foul line. Junior center Rich Dwyer, who stands 6'6", will be back this season, as will sophomore guard Harry McEnroe and junior guard Rich Schatzman. Sophomore forward Joe Moye who had a fine year last year, averaging 9.9 points per game, will start on the forecourt.

Putting together his veteran talent and promising newcomers, 2 Finnegan expects Moye to be joined in the forecourt by sophomore Jim Corey (6'5") and freshman Carl Fornoff, a 6'2" standout from Archbishop Curley High School. Dwyer will compete for the center spot with freshmen Bill Graham (6'4") and Paul Hynson (6'4") Langwost and Schatzman returning to the guard position assure strength in the backcourt. Behind the veterans are three talented freshmen—Cecil Sapp (6'2"), Chris Glavaris (6') and David Blackwell (5'11").

The Shoremen were victorious in both of the previous Wild Goose Classic Tournament. Coach Finnegan is confident again this season. The Chestertown Optimist Club is again sponsoring the tournment in an effort to raise money for scholarship programs of Washington College and the Optimist Club and to help fund Optimist youth activities.

All trophies for teams and individuals in the tournament were designed and carbed by Bill Coleman of Chestertown and will be on display in the lobby through the weekend. Entertainment between games will be provided by the Kent County High School Band.

Tickets for the two-day event will be available at the door, or they may be purchased from any member of the Chestertown Optimist Club.

Commentary:

We almost pulled it off

by RICH SCHATZMAN
Sports Editor

Upsets are what make sports exciting, and last Saturday night we almost pulled it off. Widener has been the perennial champion of our division for as long as anybody can remember, and they will probably come out on top again this year. However, last weekend we had those guys beaten. We fought back from a ten-point deficit and took a 64-60 lead with about a minute-and-a-half left to play. Everything seemed to be in our favor. Coach Tom Finnegan had all his experienced players in the game at this point and the situation looked good. But then the roof caved in and we fell apart. Turnovers, missed foul shots, bad shots, and above all, falling down for no apparent reason cost us the game.

Enough about the bad things; let's talk about the good things. In what is supposed to be a rebuilding year, we scared the hell out of the best team in our league. We played super ball for about 38 minutes of the game. We just picked the wrong two minutes to fall apart. However, I think we showed everyone of the fans that attended the game that we are an exciting, fun, and talented team. As coach Finnegan pointed out before the game, "This is not a rebuilding year, it's an improving year—and we're going to improve each game that we play together." If this turns out to be true, the Washington College Shoremen are going to be tough to beat as the season progresses.

Tonight marks the beginning of the third annual Wild Goose Classic. It will be some very fine basketball, and I think I'll go out on a limb and say that I think we're going to win it for the third year in a row. We open with the New Jersey Institute of Technology and then we'll play the winner of St. Francis College of Allentown, Pa. and Hunter College of New York. The fan support against Widener was outstanding and we all hope for more of the same this weekend.

CAGE QUOTES: Doug Byrne, one of last year's stars, said following the game, "I was really surprised, you guys were really tough." Mo Greenfield, Widener forward, also following the game cried, "Playing you guys down here is like playing God in Heaven."

Probations, Dismissals similar to last year's

by GEOFF GARINTHER
Editor-in-Chief

The number of students receiving academic probation, academic warning, or dismissal from the College last semester is virtually identical to figures from Fall, 1978, according to Dean of the College Garry Clarke.

The number of students making Dean's List was down slightly, from 108 in Fall, 1978 to 93 last semester.

The most encouraging statistic, according to Clarke, is that 23 students were removed from probation last semester, compared to only 10 in the previous year. "A number of students who were placed on probation last Spring seemed to put things together and do much better this Fall."

There was also an increase, however, in the students continued on probation—from six in 1978 to fourteen last semester.

Eleven sophomores dismissed

Eighteen students, two more than last year, were dismissed form the College. Eleven were sophomores and six were freshmen.

The same number of students—62—were placed on probation in both years. Thirty-seven students, two fewer than last year, received academic warnings.

Clarke said the Committee on Admissions and Academic Standings considers each case individually, so there are no written standards for academic probation and warnings.

Dean's List Shorter

Students making Dean's List decreased by almost 14 percent, with slight drop-offs from last year in each class. Last semester's List included 39 seniors, 21 juniors, 19 sophomores, and 14 freshmen.

Brown, Cadwell replace Schmoldt; Segal courses eliminated

by PETE TURCHI
News Editor

Both the Department of Mathematics and Computer Science and the Drama Department have made changes either in their course offerings or in their assignments of courses to department members to adjust for their loss of professors.

Former Computer Center Director William Schmoldt's resignation has led to some small confusion in the Department of Mathematics and Computer Science, but all of Schmoldt's courses will be taught this semester either by Department Chairman Richard Brown or by Assistant Professor of Physics Louis Cadwell. Both men will also be available to help students in the Computing Center on various afternoons. Brown said that although the schedule for student assistants is not completely worked out yet, that is normal at the beginning of a semester.

Nancy Wilson, who has recently returned from the MITRE Corporation where she was serving as a math intern, will be in the Computer Center to help students from 9-12 a.m. and in the midafternoon. Student assistants will work in the Center at night as they have in the past.

Brown said that members of the math and physics departments will become more involved with the Computing Center, and when a replacement for Schmoldt is found that person will not necessarily be concerned only with computing. Brown expects to have a fulltime replacement next September.

The Computer Center will also undergo a major change as a result of the College's successful bid for a grant to finance a new computer. The new machine, a PDP-11, will replace the IBM 1130, and Brown says he expects it to be here the week after commencement. Schmoldt, who proposed the new system last semester, said of the PDP-11, "It's an ideal system."

Drama Department Chairman Timothy Maloney said that he has compensated for the loss of Assistant Professor William Segal by eliminating the Tech II and Design II courses and by teaching the second semester of History of the Theatre himself. He expects to have a replacement for Segal next fall.

The Department will also do one or possibly two shows this semester, according to Maloney. Segal acted as set designer for the Department's productions when he was here, and Maloney will take over those responsibilities for the coming shows.

College finishes sixth consecutive year in black

WC News Bureau

Washington College finished the 1978-79 fiscal year with a balanced budget for the sixth consecutive year, according to College President Joseph McLain. Despite the 11.75% rise in operational costs, the College was once again able to battle inflation to the draw due to a 17.4% increase in revenues from tuition and fees, investments, gifts, grants and bequests, sales and conferences.

According to Gene Hessey, Vice President for Finance, the budget item which increased the most was the cost of fuel, utilities and other plant maintenance costs, which jumped $125,000 or 28% in one year. Other expenditure increases were experienced in athletics, student financial aid, student services, general administration and instructional costs. Five percent increases in general institutional expenditures for such items as printing, telephone, insurance and service contracts were offset by a 5% drop in the cost of fund raising, alumni affairs and public relations.

"It is a tremendous accomplishment when any private college can submit a balanced budget, let alone for six years running," said McLain, who took over the reigns in 1974. "Everyone on the faculty and staff deserves credit for living within the budget, especially Gene Hessey, who has managed our financial affairs since 1972."

Looking at the current year, 1979-80 is at the halfway mark and some financial optimism prevails in the face of the continuing downturn in the general economy. A large bequest exceeding $360,000 from the estate of Benjamin T. Dryden of Pocomoke City, a recent Hodson Trust Grant of $640,000, and a National Endowment for the Humanities award of $100,000 insures that total fund raising will top the million dollar mark for the third straight year. However, as these major gifts are primarily restricted to endowment, balancing the budget will again depend heavily on unrestricted contributions from alumni, parents, friends, corporations and foundations toward general operations.

WC News Bureau

Washington College has received an unrestricted grant of $640,000 from the Hodson Trust, according to college president Dr. Joseph McLain. The grant, largest ever given by The Hodson Trust to Washington College, provides funds for repairs to the campus heating system and endowment of a merit scholarship program and programs in the humanities division.

The Hodson Trust, established in Baltimore in 1928 by Thomas Hodson, is funded almost entirely by income from shares of Beneficial Corporation and has been the major benefactor of Washington College for many years. Thomas Hodson's son, Colonel Clarence Hodson, founded Beneficial Corporation, a diversified finance corporation, which is the largest consumer finance group in the world with significant subsidiaries in insurance, savings and loans, leasing and merchandising. Finn M. W. Caspersen, chairman and chief executive officer of Beneficial corporation, is chairman of The Hodson Trust. Members of The Hodson Trust family have served the college as Visitors and governors since 1920.

"The Hodson Trust has our highest praise for its generous contribution. The grant will enable us to make immediate repairs to our physical plant, but more importantly, it permanently endows a vital scholarship program and classroom teaching," said McLain.

Working Overtime

If the recent Christmas break and the current semester both seem a little longer than usual, we all have Sergiu Commissiona to thank.

What does Commissiona have to do with extending our Christmas break by five days and our semester by two class days? The conductor of the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra will receive an honorary degree from the College at Commencement May 25. No problem there, right? Except that Commencement should have been scheduled for May 18. Commissiona, however, was only available the 25th, so Commencement is the 25th—which happens to be Memorial Day weekend.

Realizing later that the semester had been extended by a week the administration pushed the return to classes up by three class days to the 21st of January. (The calendar in this year's College Catalogue schedules students' return to classes for Wednesday, January 16), leaving just two extra class days.

Now, all this may be an advantage or a disadvantage, depending on whether you like your vacations in the snow or the sun. But we've still got those two extra class days, plus the unavoidable Memorial Day traffic to fight on the 25th, all because Sergiu Commissiona couldn't squeeze us into his schedule a week earlier.

Route 213 safety reviewed

by PETE TURCHI
News Editor

As a result of a pedestrian accident on Route 213 involving a Washington student on the last day of finals last semester, the Town Manager of Chestertown, William B. Nicholson, Jr., has asked the State Highway administration to "review the safety situation in the College Area of Washington Avenue."

Freshman Andrea Collatti was struck by a vehicle while crossing the road on December 20. Although she has returned to school, the potential danger of the crosswalk remains. Approximately 200-250 students live in Minta Martin, Reid, Caroline and Queen Anne dormitories, all of whom must cross the State Highway several times a day. Despite this fact, Dean of Students Mareen Kelley said that Collotti's accident was the only such case of a student being struck by a car on 213 in the ten years she has been here.

Although Nicholson proposed no definite action to be taken, he did add in his letter to the College that the Mayor and Town Council "respectfully requested the administration to impress upon the students the hazard involved in carelessly crossing this highway."

Violin recital scheduled Wednesday

Isidor Saslav, violinist, will perform a recital here for the Concert Series on Wednesday, January 30 at 8:30 p.m. in Gibson Fine Arts Center.

Saslav is concertmaster of the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra and a member of the graduate faculty at The Peabody Institute. He also has served as concertmaster of the Buffalo Philharmonic and the Minneapolis Symphony.

Accompanying him on piano and harpsichord will be his wife, Ann Heiligman Saslav.

History Honor Society opens membership

The Washington College Chapter of the National History Honor Society, Phi Alpha Theta, announces that it is beginning its formal activities for the 1979-80 academic year by opening its membership rolls to qualified students. History majors who meet the academic requirements are automatically informed of their eligibility. Membership in this organization, which recognizes interest and high achievement in the discipline of history, is, however, not limited to history majors. Students who wish to be considered should contact Chapter Adviser Nate Smith (in person or through the campus mail) as soon as possible.

Spectators admonished

Late last semester I attended the annual meeting of our national lacrosse association. During the meeting it was brought to the attention of all the schools participating in intercollegiate lacrosse that during the past two years there have been an increasing number of incidences involving poor deportment on the part of the spectators attending the games. Referees have been both physically and verbally abused to the point where official organizations are seriously considering not assigning officials to schools where this harassment takes place.

We have been asked by the United States Intercollegiate Lacrosse Association to request of our student bodies that they treat all officials and opponents with the utmost courtesy and restrain from attacking anyone visiting our campus with unkind words, let alone doing something that might cause bodily harm.

I would hope that we would not have to ask the local police or further to expend funds to hire guards in order to control any Washington College spectator at any of our home athletic contests.

Another problem that I would like to bring to your attention is that of certain individuals shouting what is considered to be "obscene" or "off-color" language in the presence of our own spectators which include young children. It has been called to our attention that this type of behavior has presented an embarrassing situation. We would like to encourage everyone to return to watch our home contests but many people have expressed a great deal of concern about the conditions that prevail in the spectator area while games are being played.

There are many, many acceptable ways of showing your enthusiasm for the home team which will help them to perform.

Before any drastic action must be taken, we are asking for the cooperation of our own student body in accomplishing this objective. Do your friend a favor the next time he decides to go off the deep end and involves himself in an act that would embarrass both him and the college by helping to restrain this type of behavior.

No officials for games, hard feelings between schools or an eventual lawsuit is not worth the risk, notwithstanding the payment of college funds should we have to hire outside help to control the crowds, to accomplish the objective. I urgently request the student's cooperation in helping the college administration control this situation.

Dixon resigns SGA post; Farrell appointed

by GEOFF GARINTHER
Editor-in-Chief

Junior Diana Farrell has been appointed Assistant Social Chairman of the Student Government Association after the SGA's Executive Board and junior Mike Dixon reached a "mutual decision on Mike's resignation," said President Jay Young after a special meeting Monday.

Farrell's appointment to the position, which pays $75 per semester, is pending the approval of the Senate this Monday night.

Young attributed the mid-year change to a "combination of Diana's dedication, willingness, and aggressive attitude in accompanying her SGA responsibilities and Mike's inefficiency and increased responsibilities on his time. We thought it was best for everyone involved and the SGA."

Dixon, elected to the position last April, works in Annapolis two days a week in the State Assembly Intern Program. "With that, and (social chairman) Bill (Baldwin's) full scheduling of SGA events, I don't know if I'd have time."

"They want to make the advertising more vigarous, added Dixon. "Usually we just had posters, but they want to do new things that I wouldn't have time for."

New SJB is primary concern this semester

The first semester was a good one for the SGA. We were able to enjoy successes in the traditional areas of our jurisdiction and at the same time broaden our scope and address matters of concern to the institution in general.

From a social calender that yielded a surplus in excess of $5,000 to approval for such possibilities as the establishment of a student center, the expansion of the coffee house and the purchase of a bus; and from reforming the Student Judiciary and answering the report on Violence, Vandalism and Theft to expressing concern about the faculty salary increase, the SGA has taken great steps toward accomplishing its goal for the year. There is still, however, a lot to be done.

We will begin the semester presenting an even more aggressive social calender, total reformulation of the SGA constitution, and further attempts to gain student representation to the board.

The primary object of concern is the establishment of the new Student Judiciary Board. An SGA committee working in conjunction with the Faculty Committee on Student Affairs has made substantial revisions on the SJB. The new Judiciary will be composed of 3 jurors, 5 lawyers and a chairman to be chosen by the Executive Board and Senate. Applications for these positions and copies of the new judiciary are available in the student affairs office. If you are interested in any of these positions or if you wish to familiarize yourself with the new judiciary, please pick up a copy.

Admissions Office seeking answers to attrition

by GEOFF GARINTHER
Editor-in-Chief

On orders from the Board of Visitors and Governors, the Admissions Office has set out to find why students leave Washington College.

Director of Admissions Mickey Di Maggio has formed a Committee on Retention that includes Dean of the College Garry Clarke, Deans of Students Maureen Kelley and Ed Maxcy; Vice-President for Finance Gene Hessey, Registrar Ermon Foster, and Associate Director of Admission Jody Dudderar. The Committee first met on January 16 and decided that several members would attend a seminar in Washington, D.C.on February 14 on "Reducing the Drop-Out Rate."

The Admissions Office itself has planned a Post-Freshman Day for February 10 "to get reactions from freshmen about their first semester here," says DiMaggio. Current freshmen will receive detailed questionnaires and invitations to meet with Admission Personnel from 6-8 p.m. on the 10th in Minta Martin Lounge. There, DiMaggio says freshmen will be asked such questions "whether Admissions people told them anything about Washington College that wasn't true, whether they are aware of some of the administrative services here, and what they don't like about the College."

The increased attention paid to students who leave the College is a response to Board inquiries about an attrition rate that nears fifty percent over a four-year period. Initial indications on attrition for last semester, however, are that it may have been smaller than usual.

"The actual number looked to me to be really small," said DiMaggio. "But to me, even if one student leaves that's too many."

Ten PACE courses to be offered this semester

by BILL MORTIMER

The Program for Adult Continuing Education (PACE) will again be a part of Washington College during the Spring semester.

Presently, Mrs. Anne Hoon, Director of Continuing Education, is accepting applications for the ten courses being offered. In general, the courses will meet one evening a week beginning on March 17 and continuing until May 5. Each section is, however, run independently, and thus courses may vary in running length from four to eight weeks.

The courses in PACE are non-credit, opened to men and women who are simply interested in broadening their knowledge.

This semester, PACE offers a wide range of course topics. Dr. Robert Mallaw will conduct a course about Colonial American History and the American Revolution, Mary Wood instructs The Need to Write, Dean Garry E. Clarke will be teaching Symphonic Music and Hatha Yoga will be led by Karen L. Smith. Other courses of a wide interest and appeal will be held, taught be professors of the college and other qualified instructors.

Kabat introduces "Advanced Film Study" to curriculum

by JEFF HUFFINES

Dr. Martin Kabat, Lecturer in Modern Languages, is teaching a new film course with the Washington College Film Series called "Advanced Film Study." "The objective of the course," said Kabat, "is to learn how to analyze a film as if you are making a serious study instead of just a review."

The course is a seminar beyond the introductory level delving into the "ins and outs" of film critique, analysis, and scenic construction. By learning the grammar of film, the students will be more qualified to judge between a good and bad film, said Kabat.

Each student in the course is expected to study independently the films presented in the Film Series and present an oral analysis of one. In addition, they will be required to work on their own film script. The scripts will not be so much an exercise in creative writing as an exploration into the technical and mechanical aspects of film making, Kabat said. The students will construct their own film scenes, choosing different camera angles and set-ups to most effectively create the scene they desire to portray.

Anyone interested in joining the course should contact Kabat before class placements are filled.

Kabat said that the selection of films for the Washington College Film Series this semester makes it "the most exceptional series in its history." Each film received exceptional reviews and many were international hits. This spring's selections included Cousin Cousine, The Seduction of MiMi, The Gospel According to St. Matthew, The Gates of Hell, Bergman's film Through a Glass Darkly, The Dove, The Marquise of O, The Searchers, with John Wayne, Cria and others. Subscription tickets may be purchased by mailing a check to the Washington College Film Series c/o the Washington College Bookstore, Washington College, Chestertown, Md. 21620, or subscriptions may be purchased at the door. A complete brochure will be provided to every subscription holder.

German staff contending with personnel problems

by FREEMAN DODSWORTH

The Washington College Foreign Languages Department is currently contending with personnel problems in the German staff: Dr. Erika Salloch has been hospitalized and Assistant Professor Franz Birgel's contract has not been renewed for next year.

Salloch, who has been recovering from an illness since Christmas vacation, may return in a few weeks according to Foreign Languages Department Chairman Thomas Pabon. Until then her lower level German courses will be taught by Language Assistant Gertrude Braschel. Her upper level courses, largely attended by seniors, will become independant study, with guidance by Salloch from her home.

Other difficulties are being caused by the upcoming release of Birgel, whose contract is not being renewed for next year. Pabon would not comment on Birgel's release.

"Watch on the Rhine" survives despite political message

by PETE TURCHI
News Editor

All but the very best plays of any period eventually fall prey to changing times, but message plays suffer first and most. A play with a definite political message is often unwatchable the moment the questions it raises leave the public eye. It is remarkable, then, that Lilkian Hellman's Watch On The Rhine, currently at Center Stage in Baltimore, continues to interest audiences over three decades after its initial showing.

The curtain opens on the Washinton D.C. home of Fanny Farrelly, an energetic and witty widow who lives with her son David. The Count Teck de Brancovis and his wife Varthe are guests at the house with $87 in their names, and they join Fanny and David and the servants in preparing for the return of Sara, Fanny's daughter, who has not been home since her marriage to Kurt Muller.

When Sara and Kurt arrive with their three promiscuous children, unpleasantries set in almost immediately. The Count knows that Muller is an active anti-Fascist and attempts to blackmail him. As their European guests debate, Fanny and Davids' political naivete becomes more and more obvious. At the end of the play they involve themselves with Muller's cause, realizing that their lives will never be as simple as they were before.

This play is noticeably different than others of its genre in that it begins almost as a drawing room comedy, and in the second act is transformed into a message play. Although the play could easily begin at a later point and be a message play alone, as Hellman wrote it, it is much better prepared to withstand the test of time. While audiences in the early 1940's could obviously involve themselves with the third act debate between Muller and the Count, a modern audience enters the play with the knowledge that Muller is not only right but that he will win in the end.

Hellman's play is also prepared to endure because it is general enough so that it may be applied to different situations: while on one hand the play deals with the politics of World War II, it also deals on a larger scale with the political naivete of Americans.

Richard Kavanaugh's performance as Muller must lead the play, and it does. Kavanaugh is unmelodramatic and subtle in a part which strains to be painfully overdone. Carmen Mathews as Fanny does not fare quite as well with her stereotyped character but her performance in the first act, when she is most noticeable, is her best. Castulo Guerra is very smooth and convincing as the Count, and Terry O'Quinn and Gordana Rashovich do well in their roles of David and Varthe.

In the smaller roles Vivienne Shub and Everett Ensley are entertaining as the servants of the house, with Ensley giving a particularly amusing performance as the old black family housemen. Zachary Knower, Keith Rubin, and Sarah Hart perform acceptable as the children.

Terry O'Quinn (David), Tana Hicken (Sara), and Carmen Matthews (Fanny) will be presenting Lillian Hellman's Watch on the Rhine at Baltimore's Center Stage through February 17th.

Center Stage, located at 700 N. Calvert Street in Baltimore, will continue its performance of Watch On The Rhine through February 17th. Student rush tickets are available for $3 on weekdays, $4 on weekends one-half hour before curtain.

The Exclusive "Man Behind the Beard" Interview

by PETE TURCHI
News Editor

Associate Professor of English and novelist Robert Day has once again escaped the Wicked Witch of the West to return to Washington College from black-and-white Kansas. Day said that being on leave was "heaven" and he agreed to answer the following questions for a small fee. There is no word from Toto.

Elm: What's this about a new book?

Day: I wrote a novel a few years ago but it was so bad I wouldn't even turn it in as a term paper to a state college. My new book is set in Wolf, Kansas, and will be at the publisher's this summer—just in time for the war and the depression. It's about my Jewish mother.

Elm: Is it true that while you claim to have spent last semester writing you actually began growing a beard in the early part of the summer, at which time you left this country for Iran where you instigated the student takeover of the American Embassy? Is it not still further true that a United States Deputy Marshal has orders for your arrest?

Day: One of the pleasant things about being in Kansas is that they don't let in world news. I don't know about Iran, but I understand it is in Northern Nebraska and ever since the Nebraska legislature declared the Kansas sunflower a noxious weed we Kansans have not been allowed to cross the border. So no, I've not been to Iran. I did grow a beard but I grew it after I came back, Sunday. I am now under house arrest in the English Department.

Elm: Remember The Last Cattle Drive? Whatever happened to that movie? (Was it recently released in slightly revised form as The Electric Horseman?)

Day: Wasn't Redford's wife in that picture a wonderful actress? What was her name? The horse, too, was good. Those last shots with the belly breaths as voice-over was some of the best work I've seen in a slick-bad-film. No, that was not The Last Cattle Drive. MGM/FILMWAYS has until August 15 to make the movie and if they don't Mr. Kabat and I are going to pick up the option and drive those damn steers from here to Centerville, Polaroid Panavision cameras blazing away.

Elm: What do you think were the best books of fiction in the 1970's?

Day: One Hundred Years of Solitude which I think was written in the late sixties but which only came to our attention here in the United States during the seventies. The White House Transcripts was pretty good.

Elm: Every year rumor has it that you are not returning to Washington College, and that you were never in fact here. Is it true that you will continue writing and teaching until you find a real job?

Day: Yes.

Elm: If you could have three wishes, what would they be?

Day: I know a wonderful, filthy, unprintable, nasty story about a guy who had three wishes.

Elm: If you were going to be left on a desert island and allowed to take with you three books and a companion, what would the books be? More importantly, who would the companion be?

Day: The Oxford English Dictionary. A book of blank paper. And The Complete Poems of Rod McKuen. One has to know both good and evil. I want to be joined by the woman who wrote on the ladies room wall in Kelly's Tavern in Kansas City the following: "It is better to have loved and lost than to live with the bastards the rest of your life."

Fallaw returns from research at Cambridge

by KATHY STRECKFUS
Assistant Editor

Dr. Robert Fallaw, Professor of History and Director of American Studies, has returned to Washington College after a semester of independent research at Cambridge University in England.

While he was on leave, Fallaw's research dealt with Anglo-American relationships, particularly "the influence of British political thought during the Colonial and post-Revolutionary periods," he said. According to Fallaw, historians generally think that after the American Revolution, there was a lapse in British influence on American thought. "Political independence does not necessarily mean cultural independence.

"Of course it works the other way also," Fallaw said. The American influence on British thought is most apparent in popular culture, such as in television and films. "You come to the realization of an Atlantic culture. America is really a daughter of Europe," he added.

Fallaw said he hopes the experience of a semester abroad will be beneficial to the courses he teaches. "It brings a different and fresh perspective to old material, quickens the teacher's interest. Ideally, it will have some effect on what I bring to my courses," he said.

Fallaw and his family lived in a small village called Radwinter in Essex County. "We became quite close friends with a lot of people in the village," he said. According to Fallaw, the center of village life is the pub, the church, and the school.

Fallaw's children attended the village school. He said that the educational system seemed to be disciplined and demanding, with emphasis on writing and composition.

Fallaw and his family travelled around England on weekends. "We went to country houses, political centers, castles, the usual tourist stuff," he said. In addition, Fallaw went to several sessions at the House of Commons and Parliament. He saw Othello performed by the Royal Shakespeare Company at Stratford upon Avon. Fallaw also visited Paris briefly.

Fallaw said that he thinks the English attitude toward America is positive for the most part. "Although they pride themselves on not being like America in some ways, they are attracted to America in many ways." They still think of America as a land of opportunity, but they think Americans are restless and violent. I got the idea they were worried about American leadership, worried about America becoming isolationist."

Bailey elected to Chestertown Town Council

by GINGER KURAPKA

Dr. Michael Bailey, chairman of the Economics department, became only the second Washington College faculty member elected to the Chestertown Town Council in a local December election.

Bailey began his campaign November 19 in preparation for the election December 10. He lives in the second ward, which is comprised of the downtown business district and part of the older residential area. He won in the first contested election of the ward against Edith Sipala, a long-time town resident. Voter turnout was good, 33.6%, "the largest in living memory," according to Bailey.

The town is governed by a mayor and a town council of four, one councilperson from each ward. "The duty of the council and mayor is to manage the town, to decide the budget and taxes, maintain the water supply, streets and safety, and oversee the police department," said Bailey. The council meets twice monthly.

Bailey decided to run because as a close observer of town affairs he "became concerned that some of the decisions being made about the allocation of the resources in town were not what they should be. Being an economist, I had experience with budgets and taxes and felt my knowledge and experience could contribute." At first he was told that no one from the college would be elected because of townspeople's doubts about college people, but "as I talked to more people I found more support." The only other college faculty member elected to the council was a dean in the 1930's, although a former business manager was elected in '67.

"I think it's a rare opportunity for the town and college to work together and encourage mutual cooperation and rapport. Sometimes local people are suspicious of outsiders, and of professors and students especially," he said. An example of town/college cooperation could be the resolution of the traffic problem on Rt. 213 at the college, recently brought to point by the accident involving a Washington student struck by a car while she was crossing the highway. "The town highway administration would like to cooperate with the College in finding a solution, and I welcome students' ideas," he added.

"It's kind of exciting to be participating in all these decisions. I'm looking forward to studying these problems and coming up with solutions. I welcome suggestions and all the help I can get from students and faculty," he concluded.

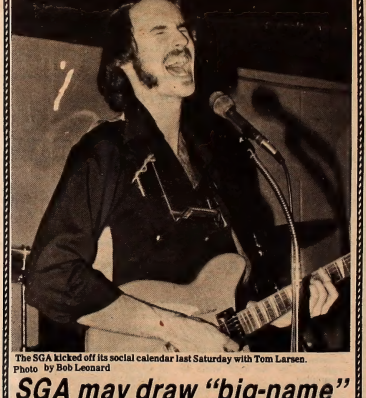
Hill Dorms' renovation loan "looks favorable"

by KATHY WURZBACHER

After trying to obtain sufficient funds for the renovation of the Hill Dorms for two years, Vice President of Finance Gene Hessey says Washington may receive the money soon.



There is currently a bill in the Maryland legislature for a loan to the College for the renovations and while Hessey can not be sure of a positive outcome, he said that "indications are very favorable that the bill will pass the legislature." He added "the legislation may take a while and it may be mid-April before final approval, and then the governor must sign it."

In 1978 the College asked for and received a state grant to go towards the renovations. The Hodson Trust matched that, but more money was needed. The college also applied to the Housing and Urban Development Agency for a loan that year but was turned down. The College applied for the loan again in 1979 and once again filed to receive it. Hessey said that was because the Agency had too many applications from larger institutions and did not have enough money to divide between all the applicants. After two attempts at the plan, the College decided not to apply to HUD a third time.

Hessey is optimistic that the College will receive the loan in the bill currently before the legislature. "It looks so favorable," he said "that the College has asked the architect to start work on the documents to put out for bids, and should receive bids by mid May. The only problem would be if the bids exceeded the money available, but that doesn't look likely."

The renovations will be more than a summertime project, which means the fraternities housed in the three Hill Dorms would have to be relocated next fall. "The Dean has worked out a plan for the relocation," said Hessey. "My best guess would be that the Hill Dorms would be Vacant at least one semester, but most likely the whole year."

Most of the renovations will not be major. There will be modifications to the entrance ways for energy conservation. The entrances will also have interior enclosures to keep the wind from blowing through the halls. There will be a few designs for the sleeping rooms, but Hessey said they will not be major. Some of the positions will be changed due to the new entrance enclosures. New fire escape designs will put the escapes inside the buildings.

SGA may draw "big-name" band with surplus

by KEVIN MAHONEY

Because of a $5,000 surplus in the Student Activities Budget from last semester, there is a possibility that either the Marshall Tucher Band, Muddy Waters Blues Band, Nighthawks, or George Thorogood may give a concert here sometime in April.

The possibility of a Chesapeake Bay tour on the Port Welcome is also being investigated, according to Bill Baldwin, Student Government Association Social Chairman.

"The $5,000 surplus will allow us to do more. Last semester, we did well with the band schedule, breaking, even on almost all of the events," Baldwin said.

The social activities calendar this semester also includes a bus trip to Washington, D.C. on Feb. 9, and a Spring Festival on May 1. The Spring Festival will be an outdoor event, with several activities sponsored by the fraternities.

Several bands will perform in Hodson Alll this semester: Off the Wall tomorrow night; Anybody Welcome on Feb. 29; The Jim Sellers Band on March 22; and Freewater on March 29.

On Pre-Freshman day, April 12, a band will play in the Kent House Quad.

A Luau will be held for Parents' Weekend on April 26, followed by a Student-Faculty-Parent Dance with the Steel Band.

Kent House loses hot water for two days

by WENDY MURPHY

There was no hot water in Kent House for two days last week due to the clogging of the main coil in the boiling system, according to Maintenance Director Ray Crooks.

The clog was discovered last Thursday, when the students in Kent began complaining that there was not hot water. Crooks said that all of the coils had to be cleaned and the hot water was turned on at about 2:30 Saturday afternoon. He reported that the water reached its highest temperature on Sunday morning and has steadily remained at that temperature.

The Resident Assistants of the building told the students they had three alternatives. They could either shower in another dorm, take cold showers, or simply not shower at all. Most of them went to Somerset and Caroline to take showers, but a few girls found that their showers in Reid Hall; Queen Anne, and Minta Martin were also being used by the males.

Council approves continuing ed units

by GEOFF GARINTHER
Editor-in-Chief

The Academic Council Monday approved a proposal that would grant continuing education units of credit for courses given here during the summer by the Maryland Institute of Alcoholism and Drug Abuse Studies.

The proposal must now by approved by the faculty, the Budget and Finance Committee of the Board of Visitors and Governors, and the Board itself.

Although the courses have been offered here for the past seven summers, the College has not offered credit in the past. The continuing education units of credit would not qualify as credits in either the undergraduate or graduate programs.

Vice-President for Finance Gene Hessey told the Council that the program earns the College $80,000 to $90,000 each summer.

Hughes to speak at Convocation

by WENDY MURPHY

Governor Harry Hughes has accepted an invitation to speak at the Convocation on February 23 in Gibson Fine Arts Center.

The fifty-seventh governor of Maryland will speak at the Convocation, which is a part of the Founder's Day celebration held in honor of George Washington's Birthday. This event, to be held at 2:00 p.m., will begin the celebration and will be followed by the traditional Birthday Ball scheduled for that evening.

Hughes' talk will concern George Washington, but whether he will approach the subject from a historical or a political point of view is unknown.

Governor Hughes has had twenty-two years of experience in the state government, sixteen of which were spent in the legislature. Having been in both the State Senate and the House of Delegates, he has chaired several committees, including the Committee on Taxation and Fiscal Matters, the Senate Committee on Finance, the Special Legislative Commission on State and Local Taxation and Financial Relations, and a Commission to study the State's Role in Financing Public Education. He also is a past majority floor leader of the Senate.

Hughes was appointed the first Secretary of the Department of Reinstating the Draft ...er, registration

Although President Carter's decision to reinstate registration for the draft is just that—a decision to bring back registration, not the draft itself—students can't help speculating about the possibility of going to war. It's a possibility that ought to be thought about now, no matter how remote it may seem. A few points to consider:

•No doubt much to the dismay of one student in our Roving Reporter this week, there almost surely will be no student deferments this time—regardless of how high or low one's grade point average may be.

•It seems almost as sure that women won't be deferred either. Not only does Carter's previous stand on equal rights indicate this, but his closest advisor, Rosalynn, is also said to favor registration for women as well as men.

•Despite a handful of demonstrations on campuses around the country recently, there seems to be little of the defiantly anti-war feeling that existed in the late Sixties and early Seventies. But neither is there the fervor that preceded both World Wars. The prevalent student ooinion seems to be, "That's the last thing I'd want to do, but I'll go if we have to."

•A small liberal arts college of 685 students probably would not survive a draft. With enrollment at its operational minimum now, the College would not be able to withstand financially the loss of even ten percent of its student body.

WC students may have to face the possibility not only of being drafted out of college, but of having no college to come back to later.

Student input involved in tenure decisions

by BILL MORTIMER

Although many students may not know it, they play a fairly important role in the Committee on Appointments and Tenure.

Students are not actually members of the Committee, which is composed of four faculty members, the President of the College, and the Dean. Still, according to Dean Garry Clarke, the members of the Student Academic Board act as a major part of the Committee's decision-making process.

The SAB consists of one student representative from each academic area. When a professor is bieng considered for tenure, reveual, or promotion, the student representative goes to the students of the particular professor and takes a poll. In the past, the poll has been a standard form. In recent years, How however, students have been making written statements.

In addition, Student Reaction questionnaires given to students in every class at the end of each semester. These forms represent a general reaction to every professor in every department.

If the Committee thinks something is in question, they will call the SAB representative to answer their question in more detail. Clarke said that Paul Drinks, the president of the SAB, is in constant contact with the Committee.

Student opinion on the Committee of Appointment and Tenure is not a new idea. It has in fact, been going on for the past six years. Clarke said that "the students who have taken part on the Committee provide us with information which we would not otherwise be able to get. They have provided us with information that is easily verified and first hand." He said, however, he is not sure how much impact the students' opinion have on the Committee's decisions.

Clarke feels that what the students have to say is important. The success of student interaction with the Committee depends, he said, on how worthily the SAB runs. To date, he said he thinks that the SAB has been very effective.

Sorority Rush is here

Spring Rush for the three sororities on campus began last night with the annual PanHellenic Party held in Minta Martin Lounge. In order to be eligible for further rush functions, freshmen and transfer women, and upper classwomen who have not gone through rush before, were to have signed the rush list in Student Affairs by 3 p.m. Friday afternoon.

The purpose of Rush is to provide women at Washington College with an opportunity to get to know each other a little better and a chance to join one of the three national sororities here: Zeta Tau Alpha, Alpha Omicron Pi, and Alpha Chi Omega.

These sororities are primarily social in nature, but each group is involved in supporting a philanthropy. Zeta Tau Alpha helps the National Association of Retarded Children, Alpha Omicron Pi contributes to the Arthritis Foundation, and Alpha Chi Omega supports a colony for Creative artists and Easter Seals.

All women who signed the Rush List in Student Affairs will receive an invitation to the informal party of each sorority. The time and place of each party will be listed on the individual invitations. The formal parties for each sorority will be held the week of Feb. 10th. Invitations will be issued for these parties for which a response is required. You may accept only two of these invitations.

Rush will end with Bid Night on Friday, Feb. 15. Earlier that day, the bid list will be posted outside Student Affairs. Each girl whose name appears on the list must sign the preference sheet inside the office by 3:00 p.m. That evening rushees will come to Minta Martin to receive their bids. A party for the sororities will follow and will be open to the campus.

If you didn't sign the Rush List for this semester you are still eligible to go through rush next year. Signing the Rush List, attending the parties or receiving bids do not obligate you to join a sorority. Rush is fun, a time to get to know our three groups a little better. Enjoy:

Rush Schedule
1/31 - PanHellenic Party—Minta Martin Lounge—8 p.m.
2/1 - Sign Rush List in Student Affairs until 3:00

Anti-War group registering conscientious objectors

The following press release, from the Central Committee for Conscientious Objectors, was issued just prior to President Carter's announcement that registration for the draft would be reinstituted.

The Central Committee for Conscientious Objectors has announced that they are registering individuals who are opposed to participation in the military.

Larry Spears, director of CCCO's Youth and Conscientious Objection Campaign, says, "The need for young people to go on record as conscientious objectors to war has never been greater than it is today."

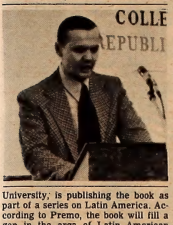
According to Spears, "There is a very real possibility that Congress will pass a bill, after the 1980 elections, requiring the mandatory registration of young people with Selective Service. Young Americans should start thinking about whether they could participate in the military."

Spears says that CCCO has already registered several thousand young people through its conscientious objection card. "These cards are available from CCCO, P.O. Box 15796, Philadelphia, PA 19103. They simply state 'Because of my beliefs about war, I am opposed to participation in the military.'"

According to Betty Alexander, a National Selective Service spokesperson in Washington, the cards could carry a lot of weight in convincing a draft board of an objector's sincerity. "It sounds like a rational approach," she said. "It shows the applicant is not experiencing a late crystallization of beliefs.

"They (CCCO) are a very organized group. They know a statement made at this time would carry a lot of weight. If draft is reinstituted and a young man can prove he went on record in a time when he was not in danger of going to war, then it might have some influence on his board."

"The usefulness of this card," says Spears, "is that it provides a record of an individual's opposition to war and the military. Under current Selective Service regulations, an individual who is called up for active duty will have only 10 days to put together his or her CO claim. This CO card will help demonstrate to the military the thousands of young people who will not serve in the military even if the nation returns to the draft."



CCCO was founded in 1948 as the Central Committee for Conscientious Objectors and is a national agency counseling young Americans facing the prospect of military service.

Premo to publish book on Colombian political system

by FREEMAN DODSWORTH

Dr. Daniel Premo, Associate Professor of Political Science, has been contracted by the Homer Institute on War, Revolution, and Peace to write a book dealing with the social and political systems in Colombia, South America.

The Institute, affiliated with Stanford

University, is publishing the book as part of a series on Latin America. According to Premo, the book will fill a gap in the area of Latin American History. He said, "I was personally pleased that the Institute is undertaking the publishing of the series because it will fill a void existing for many years."

Premo's involvement in the project comes after more than 20 years of research dealing with Latin America and, particularly, Colombia. His special interest in Colombia began in 1957 when he was stationed there while working for the United States Information Agency. Later that year he received a fellowship that allowed him to do more research in Colombia, where he had done most of the research on his doctoral dissertation. In 1978, on sabbatical, he did extensive research at the libraries of the University of Texas.

Premo, has been publishing annual articles on Guatemala and Peru, as well as Colombia, since 1972, for the Yearbook on International Communist Affairs, another publication of Homer Institute. Premo was introduced to the Institute by Political Science Department Chairman Tai Sung An, who also contributes to the Yearbook.

Premo's book is due for publication in Spring of 1981. It will deal mainly with the political system of Colombia, but will also look at historical background, political tradition, and social divisions. Premo said he is pleased and confident about the book. "It represents a challenge to my twenty years of interest in Colombia."

Bands in, food out at Coffee House

by GINGER KURAPKA

The Coffee House will feature increased cooperation between the Student Government Association and Coffee House management, two new managers, and a discontinuation of hot food this semester, according to General Manager Jake Parr.

Court Treuth and Kathy Hansen, the new managers, will join the present staff of Mandy Scherer, Andrew Bucklee, and Parr. "We're still one manager short; last semester we worked with two short," Parr said.

Pizza and hot sandwiches have been discontinued because of lack of demand and high overhead. Parr estimated that it cost $12 a day to make them, and profits did not cover the cost. Parr added, "We will have more specials, some regular, and others spontaneous."

In working with the SGA, more bands gave been playing in the Coffee House, "because it's an atmosphere people seem to like more than upstairs," said Parr. Plans are also being discussed for a more extensive student center in the area around the mail boxes. "We want to get a TV in there, some nice chairs, and we hope to paint next weekend," said Parr.

The Coffee House works on a non-profit basis. In the past few years thefts, and vandalism have been a major problem. "These are major setbacks to our budget, which is very tight," Parr said. Last weekend the bowling machine was vandalised and about $100 damage was done. "We'd appreciate anybody who saw anything to tell us, strictly confidentially of course.

Transportation. According to a biography distributed by the Maryland Executive Department, during his six years as a cabinet member "he attained national recognition for his role in establishing and operating a department which combined all modes of transportation— a department which served as a model to many other states which were organizing or reorganizing departments of transportation."

At the Convocation, Hughes was to be presented with an honorary degree of Washington College but he declined. Instead he will receive the Washington College Award for Excellence.

He will be the fourth recipient of this award, which has not been presented since the 1978 Commencement. In receiving this award he will be in good company. Past recipients include Andrew Wyeth, Dr. Helen Taussig, and James Michener.

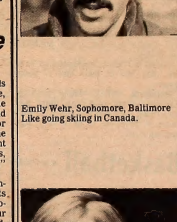
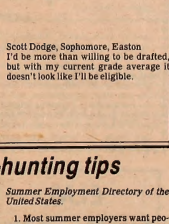
Reinstating the Draft?



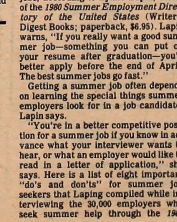
by ROB UNGER
Photography by BOB LEONARD

Question: How do you feel about the possible reinstatement of the draft?



Dr. John Taylor, Assistant Professor of Political Science

I was one who unsuccessfully battled the army...but after serving two years I didn't regret being drafted. Carter speaks in terms of a symbolic message. A volunteer army will not suffice,... in order to have a strong military posture you need a draft. Whether or not you want a strong military posture is another question.



Pat Edeline, Freshman, Baltimore

I wouldn't have to fight because I have dual citizenship...but I'd probably go. I'm an American now and I'll fight for freedom.

Emily Wehr, Sophomore, Baltimore

Like going skiing in Canada.

Scott Dodge, Sophomore, Easton

I'd be more than willing to be drafted, but with my current grade average it doesn't look like I'll be eligible.

Summer-job-hunting tips

Looking for a summer job? More people than ever are looking for summer jobs, according to Lynne Lapin, editor of the 1980 Summer Employment Directory of the United States (Writer's Digest Books; paperback, $6.95). Lapin warns, "If you really want a good summer job—something you can put on your resume after graduation—you'd better apply before the end of April. The best summer jobs go fast."

Getting a summer job often depends on learning the special things summer employers look for in a job candidate, Lapin says.

"You're in a better competitive position for a summer job if you know in advance what your interviewer wants to hear, or what an employer would like to read in a letter of application," she says. Here is a list of eight important "do's and don'ts" for summer job seekers that Laping compiled while interviewing the 30,000 employers who seek summer help through the 1980 Summer Employment Directory of the United States.

1. Most summer employers want people with leadership personalities. Be attentive in a personal interview, show energy and enthusiasm. Asking questions shows you're interested. In a written application,- mention experiences that show your leadership qualities—offices held in clubs or organizations, for example.

2. Employers hire people who look and act healthy. Be careful about your appearance in a personal interview. Stand up straight, sit up straight and don't slouch.

3. When you apply for a summer job by mail, watch your presentation, not only appearance (of course, you should type neatly) but also content. Don't say, "I want to spend the summer in Maine." The employer will think you care more about the scenery than about his summer theatre.

Shoremen end long dry spell with Haverford win

by RICH SCHATZMAN
Sports Editor

The Washington College basketball team returned to WC seventeen days prior to the remainder of the student body. During this time period, up to and including Saturday night 84-64 triumph over Haverford College, the cagers have played eight games. Six of these eight games were played on the road, and not coincidentally, the Shoremen have lost six games. The team's second half road record is 0-6 and their home record is 2-0. The first two games returning should be forgotten. The University of Maryland Eastern Shore defeated the Shoremen 107-75 and Western Maryland did a 95-64 number on them two days later. However, then two games were just passes off as "play yourself back into shape" games. Following these two "blow-outs", WC took a long bus ride to Drew University and laid their third consecutive egg. The Shoremen didn't seem to even get loosened up, and along with an intimely technical foul and some horrendous officiating, they lost to a very weak Drew team.

Head Coach Tom Finnegan

Following these disasters, the cagers were ready to come home-sweet-home. Johns Hopkins University invaded Cain Athletic center and committed a mortal sin. The Blue Jays had the audacity to attempt to play a man-to-man defense. The result was an 87-71 Shormen triumph. However, it was time to hit the road for three more weeks in the loss column. A one-point heartbreaking loss to Mary Washington was followed by 18 and 16 point deficits to Ursinus and Swarthmore, respectively. There was one basic similarity in these games. All three opponents played a zone defense. Only W. Maryland and Hopkins played a man-to-man defense against the Shoremen.

This brings us to last Saturday's Haverford game. After the Shoremen struggled against a zone defense, the Fords proceeded to come down here and play a man-to-man defense. Consequently, WC rolled to a twenty point victory. Craig Langwost let the scoring with 23 points as the Shoremen shot well over 60% from the floor. David Blackwall played an outstanding game as well and is turning into one of the finest guards ever to play at Washington College.

WC's next four games are at home and they hope to be able to muster enough momentum to put them in a position to challenge for a play-off spot. The chances are slim, at best, but it is a possibility.

CAGE NOTES: The Shoremen have lost only two of their last 17 home games.

Delaware Valley comes to Cain Athletic Center tomorrow night and they bring their run and gun style with them. It promises to be a very high scoring affair.

Intramural Basketball opens season

by CECE GRADY

Men's Intramural Basketball returned to Washington College Wednesday as the BOF CHI attempts to maintain its championship in round robin competition.

Thirteen teams, composed of fraternities and other organizations, will involve themselves in a grueling schedule of twelve games each. There will be a play-off at the end of the top four teams.

Jay Young, the former point guard for Washington College who left the team to lead the KA's in intramural action commented on the traditional rivalry between fraternities. "The influence of the rivalry will no doubt be an important part of the games," said Young, "and, of course, all teams will be in hot pursuit of the faculty."

The second set of six games will be held Sunday, at 7:00 p.m.

39 transfers this semester

Attrition rate up slightly over last year

by KATHY STRECKFUS
Assistant Editor

The rate of attrition at Washington College this year is slightly higher than last year, according to Registrar Ermon Foster.

Out of 697 full-time students last semester, 74 have not returned this semester. This is a 10.6 percent loss, about 2 percent higher than the 8.5 percent loss last year after Fall semester.

This number included 17 students who completed course requirements for graduation last semester, though their senior obligations have not necessarily been completed, Foster said.

Eighteen students were dismissed for academic deficiency last semester, 2 more than last year. Eleven were sophomores and six were freshmen.

The rest of the students withdrew for various other reasons, such as transfer to another college, loss of financial aid, or personal reasons, Foster said.

The loss this semester consisted of 26 freshmen out of a class of 220, 21 sophomores out of 203, 11 juniors out of 129, and 17 seniors out of 145.

"We're graduating slightly over 50 percent, of each original class," Foster said.

New Students offset loss

"You lose some, but you get some in," Foster said. There are 39 new full-time students this semester. The group of transfers and returning students consist of 14 freshmen, 12 sophomore 9 juniors, and 4 seniors.

Although 74 students left the college for various reasons, the net loss is only 35 because of incoming students, Foster said.

The full-time enrollment this semester is 656. The total full-time equivalent, including part-time students, continuing education enrollment and more able High School students, is 672. The full-time equivalent last semester was 716.

Reasons for withdrawal

Retention Committee looking for answers to attrition

by KATHY STRECKFUS
Assistant Editor

"We want to find out if the students have any reservations about Washington College, and if we can do something about it, we want to do it now," says Jody Dudderar, Associate Director of Admissions.

On Post-Freshman Day, students will discuss what they expected from the College before they arrived as freshmen, and whether or not those expectations have been met, said Dudderar.

The Admissions Department has two major objectives for Post-Freshman Day. Director of Admissions Mickey DiMaggio said, "It's for recruiting purposes. We want to see if we're telling people what Washington College really offers."

A second objective is "to study retention, to study why students stay here," he said. "We want to follow up, to find out what students that we recruited and enrolled have to say."

The discussions will be beneficial to the students as well as to the Admissions Office, according to DiMaggio. "We want to find out how the College can improve," he said.

Detailed questionnaires designed to obtain student reaction to various areas of the College were sent to freshmen through student mail along with invitations. Questionnaires, however, do not substitute for talking to the students directly, said Dudderar.

In Minta Martin Lounge Sunday from 6-8 p.m., the Admissions Staff will divide the freshmen into four smaller goups. Each member of the staff will lead one of the four discussion groups.

To follow up the discussions, the Admissions Staff will meet in their office in Bunting Hall to "write it down when everything is still fresh in our minds," Dudderar said.

Later, they will present the results of the questionnaires and discussions to the new Committee on Retention, "and see what they can do about it," Dudderar said.

The Committee on Retention was formed as a response to inquiries from the Board of Visitors and Governors about an attrition rate that nears 50 percent over a four-year period.

The Committee consists of DiMaggio, Dudderar, Dean of the College, Garry Clarke, Deans of Students Maureen Kelley and Ed Maxcy, Vice-President for Finance Gene Hessey, and Registrar Ermon Foster.

The Committee also plans to attend a seminar in Washington, D.C. on Feb 14 on "Reducing the Drop-Out Rate."

An says hostage release imminent

Bush and Carter are frontrunners, but Reagen and Kennedy are still in the race, says faculty

by GEOFF GARINTHER
Editor-in-Chief

Although they all agree that unseating an incumbent president is difficult and that George Bush has momentum and the media behing him, no one in the Political Science Department is counting either Ted Kennedy or Ronald Reagen out of the race for the presidency in 1980.

In fact, all four members of the department say the only thing we can be sure of is that it is still too early to tell what will happen before the nominating conventions this summer.

"I think you have to wait until after the Southern primaries," said Associate Professor Dan Premo.

Assistant Professor John Taylor agreed that any predictions would be premature. "The presidential race is a process of elimination, and I think you'll know sooner who's not going to be in it than who will be."

"Too early to count Kennedy out"

One candidate no one is counting out of the race—yet—is Kennedy.

"I was very disappointed in Kennedy's initial showing," said Taylor. "I thought he offered virtually nothing.

"(But) I think it's too early to count Kennedy out of it. ... I think he's going to give Carter a run for his money."

Dr. Tai Sung An, Chairman of the Department said, "I'd never underestimate Kennedy, but he's in big trouble," agreeing that Carter is the clear front runner for now.

And Assistant Professor Howard-sSilver said "It takes something of major proportion—something cataclysmic or catastrophic—to defeat an incumbent. (But) to predict that Carter's got it locked up and that Kennedy's finished will depend on events."

Release of hostages imminent, says An

One such event, according to An, would be the release of the 50 Americans being held hostage in Tehran.

"I think they may be released in the near future," he says. That, he adds, would trigger a barrage of criticism directed at Carter's foreign policy from other candidates.

"His present popularity stands on a very shaky foundation," said An. "I'm disenchanted with Carter. His domestic economic policy is a disaster and his foreign policy has many holes."

Taylor is more sympathetic to Carter. "Certainly he's not a magnetic politician, but I think he's been trying to tackle the right issues."

Taylor agrees with An, however, concerning Carter's shaky footing in Iran and Afghanistan. "I like the comment George Will made, that Carter may have difficulty in sustaining for nine months the feeling that Iran and Afghanistan are foreign policy victories for the U.S."

"On-the-job training" for Carter

Silver, too, attributes Carter's current popularity to his handling of the foreign crisis, but says he may remain popular on his own merits. "I had the feeling when Iran started that Carter

Facing realities

Big things are happening in the Academic Council, things that may significantly affect students as early as the year after next. Nothing is more important—or likely to be more controversial—than the Council's proposal requiring students to demonstrate competence in mathematics in order to graduate.

Under the current proposal, this competence could be demonstrated in one of three ways:

(1) By receiving a high score on the Mathematics Placement Examination administered to all freshmen (a "high" score would be defined by the Math Department).

(2) By receiving an A in either Computer Science 101 or Mathematics 103 or 109, or a B in Mathematics 111 or 112.

(3) By passing a Competence Examination in Mathematics administered by the College; students would have three chances to pass, with remedial help available after each unsuccessful attempt.

The proposal still must go before the faculty, where it may face tough opposition. But the costs of this requirement—extra work for everyone from students to the Registrar—are justified by the guarantee that graduates will have at least minimal competence in mathematics.

Still to come from the Council is a proposal for improving competence in English. The College is finally facing what many academicians have for some time seen as a reality—the need to get back to basics.

was going to get re-elected. But I also think in some ways Carter has learned a lot in four years. He's had on-the-job training.

"He also may have overcome the leadership question that was so prevalent last summer. The polls seem to suggest that he has caught Kennedy in terms of his leadership capabilities."

Silver says Carter may have one more advantage over Kennedy.

"I don't think Kennedy's as bright as Carter. Carter's one of the more intelligent presidents we've had."

Republican's "inscrutable"

The other race appears even less clearcut than the Democrat's. The Grand Old Party, says An, "is inscrutable."

"Bush has momentum," said Silver, "buy I'm not so sure it's over and that he's the nominee and that Reagen won't bounce back.

"The thing that Bush has going for him," added Silver, "is, his 'electability'" That is his ability to defeat the Democratic nominee in the general election—giving Bush the advantage over a hard-line conservative like Reagen.

Silver says both Bush and Howard Baker, despite their moderate reputations, "can only be considered moderate in the narrowest sense of the political spectrum.

"I think all of the Republicans are very conservative, with the exception of John Anderson, and unfortunately he'll win the nomination."

Carter not "a real Democrat"

As for predictions, Taylor and Premo both say it is far too early, An says he would sooner not vote than cast a ballot for Carter or Reagen, and Silver, a Democrat, is "distressed" by the whole process.

"I buy Arthur Schlesinger's argument," he said, "that Carter is not a realDemocrat domestically. And I have real problems with Kennedy's character."

that the largest single reason is transfer to schools that offer business-oriented programs that Washington does not offer.

"But some leave for reasons that have nothing to do with the academic program." Some of these reasons are the small size of the College, its rural location and the social reasons.

Kelly said that some students, especially women, leave because they dislike the social atmosphere. "If you're not comfortable at large parties and dances, there aren't too many alternatives. The social life here depends on a party format," Kalley said.

Post-Freshmen Day

In an effort to investigate why students leave the College, Director of Admissions Mickey DiMaggio has formed a Committee on Retention.

The admissions staff will offer "Post-Freshman Day" this Sunday from 6-8 p.m. to discuss freshmen reactions to their first semester here. All freshmen are invited.

Applications down, acceptances up

Although the Admissions Office has received fewer applications in comparison to this time last year, the number of acceptances is slightly higher, according to Director of Admissions Mickey DiMaggio.

This year, 357 applications have been received and 153 have been accepted. Last year, 143 applications had been accepted out of 404 received.

The number of female acceptances is higher this year. Eighty-four women have been accepted in comparison to 65 last year. DiMaggio said he is "delighted" about that increase.

Eleven of the accepted applicants have paid their deposits compared to 17 last year.

DiMaggio said that the number of paid deposits is the most important factor after the May 1 deadline.

The drop in the number of applications, DiMaggio said, may be because "last year was an unusually big year in applications.

Notes on Off The Wall

"Chocolate Milk and Batteries (TO GO)"?

By SUE JAMES

An unusual album title? Not for Baltimore-based rock band, Off the Wall, which jammed the night away in Hodson Hall last Saturday with an energetic crowd of approximately one hundred people, many "feeling no pain" from the 25¢ drafts that were available.

Off the Wall is not an unheard-of band. In a recent issue of the Unicorn Times a Baltimore-Washington newspaper for local bands, Off the Wall placed in seven categories in the listing for Best Local Bands. Their awards included second best Original 45, second best Vocalist, Best Drummer, Best Bass, and Best Guitar.

Steve, a member of the band, who performs vocals, percussion, and the harmonica for Off the Wall said, "We've been together for four years, with the exception of Dayton (the drummer)." Before Dayton joined the band, finding the right drummer was a major problem. Dayton was apparently the right choice as Steve pointed out that no less that fifteen drumming auditions were held.

There is a variety of instrumentation in Off the Wall. "There are really no leads in anything," Steve remarked. They are considered a variety rock band, playing from hard to mellow rock with some jazz; the instruments range from Yamaha acoustic grand piano to saxophone.

Rock will survive"

Rock in the long run will survive," Steve said. "Punk and New Wave are 'fad' rock, but they are the cause of disco going down hill. Now the popularity of disco will continue, and I don't mean to put down punk and New Wave. Actually, what I feel about New Wave and Punk is an irrelevant question. Rock will survive them all."

Off the Wall played a lot of original material during their sets. The quality of this originality may make their name known in the rock industry. "Chocolate Milk and Batteries(To Go)", is scheduled for release this summer. A brass section, included in the studio arrangements, will produce a jazz, rock, and blues combination. At the very least, the popularity of Off the Wall should bring them back to Chestertown sometime soon.

Hard work spells S-U-C-C-E-S-S for cheerleaders

by PETE TURCHI
News Editor

It is six on a Tuesday in Cain Memorial Gym, but it could just as easily be any other day of the week between late October and early February. Two young men in shorts shoot baskets at the far end of the gym as two hunters stand against the side walls, talking to them. They are not alone, however; ten girls in pink T-shirts and red shorts are seated in the middle of the floor, doing various stretching exercises. They are the Washington College cheerleaders.

An older girl in sweat pants and a gray sweatshirt sits a little bit outside of the circle, against the bleachers. She is calm and relaxed, as are all the girls. The general atmosphere is that of a group of friends at Miss D's, or possibly sorority sisters before a meeting. The girls are laughing and lounging on the floor. A blond talks softly to herself, barely moving her arms and legs, trying to recall one of the cheers.

Jani Gabriel, the captain of the squad, stands up to officially begin the practice. Like all of the practices, this one will last between one and two hours and will consist mostly of trying new cheers and adjusting positions for one less or one more girl.

The older girl with dirty-blond hair and soft eyes is Cindi Patchen, a '78 graduate who was an active athlete at Washington and currently coaches for the volleyball and softball teams. Six girls cheered full-time last year, five of whom returned for a second season. The full turnout for tryouts this year, however, was eighteen girls.

Cindi stands up and the girls gather around her. Today they want to try to build a ten-man pyramid, but some of them are hesitant. After some joking around four of the girls get on the floor to form the base. The second three girls climb on. "Ow," someone says, "that's my back."

"Hey, watch your knee."

"Hurry!" Julie Scott, the smallest of the girls, climbs on top of the pyramid.

"Oh my God," one of the girls on the bottom says. Julie slips off and the others quickly leave their positions. It does not look like the pyramid is going to be very popular.

The 79-80 cheerleading squad: Gini White, Beth Glascock, Julie Scott, Sue Watts, Peggy Opaenkowski, Jani Gabriel, Lisa Laird, Andrea Colantti, An nie Kelly, Laura Ann Giacomo, Sarah Smith, and Debbie Wilhelm.

"My back, I think you broke it," the blond complains. The scoreboard on the far wall of the gym lists the team rosters for Washington and Swarthmore. Below those the board says, "NEXT HOME GAME FEB. 9 UR-SINUS SAT. 7:00"—the basketball team's last home game and also, unless the team makes it into the playoffs, the last time the girls will be able to cheer in front of a crowd.

The basketball players and hunters have left, leaving one freshman who has gotten bored with his basketball and comes over to talk to the girls. He is enlisted to get on the bottom of the pyramid as they try again. This time they are not as successful; Julie only manages to stay on top for a second.

"Let's try a 3-2-1," someone suggests. "The knees on the floor are the killer," someone else says.

Jani Gabriel is captain this year because, in her own words, "we needed someone to start the cheers and to organize things on the floor. Last year I saw one of the signs Cindi put up and I thought it was a shame that there weren't any cheerleaders, so I called Julie and we went out." When asked about the cheers Jani says that the crowds' favorite is something called "The Victory Dunk." "We stand in a line going toward the basket," she says. "The line gets higher and higher, and at the end is a girl sitting on another girl's shoulders. We pass the ball down and the last girl is supposed to dunk it, but we almost always miss. But the crowd yells for it." She is tired and finds it hard to explain the cheers without actually doing them. "We have two 'success' cheers," she says, "and some from high school, but a lot of them we made up ourselves."

The girls have decided to try one girl in front, followed by a three-man pyramid, behind which is a six-man pyramid. They count and realize that this combination uses exactly ten girls, and some of them call out, laughing, while others complain about this new variation. Cindi sees a basketball nearby and heaves it toward the backboard.

"I'm not sure what you'd call me," she says. "I feel like I don't do anything. I cheered my freshman year, but after they didn't have them in my senior year I wanted to get them back together. I think cheerleaders are fun to have. Sometimes the guys hear 'em on the court, and it adds someting to the sport." Cindi is most insistent, though, when she says, "The girls are really dedicated. They practice five days a week, and they're a lot of fun. Sometimes I don't think they get enough credit. It would be nice for someone to say, 'Hey, good job.'"

The cheerleaders, all freshmen and sophomores, have been practicing for over an hour and they have to move out of the main gym. As the practice continues the girls decide that the new cheer will have to wait until next year. One of them protests. "Next year? We did all that for nothing?"

Duncan's journey into the "real world"

By NICK NAPPO
Fine Arts Editor

Every Tuesday and Thursday morning before the batter hits the griddle, senior Bonnie Nelle Duncan is up and out, heading—in "a 1977 white Monte Carlo with maroon interiors"—for the Annapolis headquarters of Maryland Magazine.

Talking about her journalism internship at Maryland, Duncan will plunge right into offbeat descriptions of her car, her stint as Elm editor-in-chief, or of the College in general. After all, she's a writer, or would like to be.

"My goal is to write the great American novel," she states flatly. "I consider myself a creative writer—awful phrase—rather than a journalist." But other writers whose footsteps she wouldn't mind following have started in newsprint, and two years with this paper (and her present position as Pegasus editor) lead Bonnie to call herself "the closest thing we have to a journalism major." So when the magazine asked a number of Maryland colleges last October for internship applicants, she was Washington's natural candidate. After the initial contact, she was selected over the other applicants.

"We're pleased she was picked. It will be good for Bonnie, good for the College," says English Department Chairman Nancy Tatum; "but most of all it will be good for the Department. We want students to know that reading and writing are viable skills in the world out there."

"The Maryland program is my sojourn into the real world," echoes Bonnie. "Running the Elm was a little unreal. I felt like I was going for a Masters in Abnormal Psychology." Maryland's other journalism intern, she notes, is a 43-year -old wife and mother, as well as a practicing psychiatrist.

"Seriously, the Elm editorship gave me good background in most phases of production except working with color and direct marketing—which I'm learning now."

The two interns join a full-time staff of seven, all of them women. Maryland Magazine, a quarterly, is the publication of the Maryland Department of Economics and Community Development. In print eleven years, it has about 30,000 paying subscribers and recently won an Award for Excellence from the Atlantic Press Association. Bonnie thinks it is one of the best regional publications she's seen. The copies in Miller Library are glossy, full-colored and handsomely crafted.

When Bonnie arrived at the magazine she was given the title of Projects Coordinator, and the projects to go with it. She must design a demographic survey of readership for an upcoming subscription campaign ("fortunately Dr. Brown's statistics course is fresh in my mind"); she has to run a photography contest; she will supervise production of the magazine's 1981 calendar.

Hard work, but not without its excitement. Bonnie reports meeting "lots of political types," she lunched with the chairman of the Maryland-Delaware Press Association, and she will attend a debate on the magazine's financial status at State House. Various writers, artists, and photographers come over to discuss work. "James Michener dropped by the office on Tuesday...."

What all this has already taught her is that the business of running a magazine is business. "So much depends on packaging and promoting a saleable product. My editor calls the actual literary and editorial duties 'the icing on the cake'."

Since Bonnie is the first Washington College student the program has taken on, she won't be getting stipend or salary. The English Department is meeting expenses for the trips there and back.

When that big old 1977 white Monte Carlo returns in the evening, as dinner is ending, Bonnie is always struck, she says, by the contrast between the College and the place she's just left. "The contrast should not be quite so evident, considering that the expressed purpose of this kind of education is to prepare you to cope with life outside. Sometimes I think this place is a four-year playground for the overprivileged." She pauses, and mentions that she's applied for the Masters program of print journalism at American University. "Of course," she adds, "there is a handful of people here who have a sense of who they are, and where they are going."

Shoremen take 3 of 4 during homestand

by RICH SCHATZMAN
Sports Editor

"I can't understand it," said Captain Joe Moye after the Shoremen's Monday night trouncing of Swathmore College. "We are really tough at home, but we can't do bleep on the road." WC holds a 2-6 record in other gyms while they are 6-3 in Cain Athletic Center. During their four game home stand that concluded Monday night, they were 3-1, losing only to Western Maryland.

The final score of the Western Maryland game was 74-65—a large improvement over the 95-64 game played earlier in the year at the Green Terrors gym. In the second defeat, last Thursday night, the Shoremen played fine defense, but shot only 43 percent from the field. Moye led WC with 15 points and David Blackwell added 14.

Last Saturday night the Shoremen hosted Delaware Valley College of Pennsylvania, and the result was a 91-75 WC victory. This was caused by a combination of some fine offensive punch by the Shoremen and a shabby man-to-man defense from Delaware Valley. Six Shoremen scored in double figures led by Blackwell's 16 points. However, the highlight of this game was Paul Hynson's surprise 12 point performance off the bench. Hynson had seen very little action until then.

Monday night was the Craig Langwost Show as he turned in his finest performance of the season. Craig shot extremely well from the field, played a fine floor game, and led the Shoremen with 29 points in their 86-62 blowout of Swarthmore. Blackwell and Jim Corey added 14 apiece and Joe Moye had 12 to pace the attack. For all those calling Hynson's performance against Delaware Valley a fluke, you'll have to wait for another game. He came off the bench to get 9 this game and also grabbed his share of rebounds. The 26 point victory was a far cry from the 16 point defeat WC suffered at Swarthmore.

CAGE NOTES: In the Western Maryland contest, Rich Dwyer caused a little excitement by squaring off with Lester Wallace (WM) with one second left. This caused both benches to empty, but the fight was controlled quickly. The highlight of the fight was when Carl Fornoff fell down and took the WM Coach with him.

All the teams in the MAC suffer from the dreaded road disease. Having played on the Washington College basketball team for the last three years, I think I can explain the problem. First of all, a long bus ride not only drains a player physically, but also emotionally. It is extremely difficult to get loosened up in the twenty minutes allotted and even tougher to get the adrenaline flowing. Therefore, a slow startis inevitable. Combine this with the extremely low caliber of almost every official in the league and it causes a problem. Four of the six teams in our division come from Pennsylvania, the other two from Maryland (Hopkins and WC). When a Pa. referree sees WC get off to a slow start they automatically feel that the Pa. team is better than us. Therefore, the rest of the game is called in exactly that fashion. Widener, Haverford, Ursinus, and Swarthmore get away with things they could never attempt to do down here. Of course, Maryland officials are no better. It is my opinion that something must be done very soon to correct this outrageous situation.

With four games left, the Shoremen have a good chance at reaching the playoffs, for the second year in a row. Four wins will guarantee a spot while three will put them in fairly good shape. However, three of the games are on the road. By the time this article is read, the Shoremen will have played Haverford away. Tomorrow night they play Ursinus at home and next week they travel to Widener and Hopkins.

PREDICTIONS:
- A HAVERFORD—Pa officiating gives Fords a 74-66 H win over WC
- H URSINUS—We're at home—WC 84-U-76
- A WIDENER—We never play well there—W81-WC-68
- A HOPKINS—We're better than the Blue Jays anywhere—WC78-H-70

Admissions gets positive reactions from freshmen

by KATHY STRECKFUS
Assistant Editor

Freshman discussed everything from alcohol to the academic curriculum last Sunday at Post-Freshman Day.

About 50 freshmen, half men and half women, attended the meeting.

"The turnout shows they are not apathetic. They do care," said Jody Dudderar, Associate Director of Admissions.

The students were divided into four groups to discuss their reactions to their first semester at the College. Each discussion group was led by a member of the Admissions staff.

According to Dudderar, most of the reactions were positive. She said that most of the students chose the College because of its small size, and are satisfied with the friendly atmosphere and the personal attention they receive from professors.

One topic of discussion was whether or not there are enough social activities on campus. Dudderar said that some students were satisfied with the activities, but some said there should be a wider variety.

Several students said that they would like the Student Government Association to sponsor trips to museums and theatres in Baltimore or Washington, D.C.

"cop-out"

"Many students felt that alcohol is a problem on campus, because there is not enough to do. But that's a cop-out," Dudderar said.

Some of the freshmen women expressed disappointment in the women's sports program here, according to Dudderar. The men said they would like to see more winter sports, such as wrestling.

Freshmen want curriculum changes

Dudderar said that several freshmen agreed that the College should offer lower levels of Mathematics and Science courses. They complained that there are no courses in those areas designed for students who do not want to major in Math or Science.

The freshmen would also like more business courses to be included in the curriculum, Dudderar said.

"They felt they could handle the work here, but felt that they didn't have a good background in writing." Most freshmen said that the College should offer classes or workshops in composition, though not necessarily for credit.

The discussions were "proof of gut feelings that the Rentention Committee had," Dudderar said. "We're extremely pleased with the positive attitude. The complaints were valid."

After the discussions, the Admissions staff met in their office in Bunting Hall to record the students' opinions.

They will present the results of the discussions to the Committee on Rentention next week, and see what they can do about it," Dudderar said.

The results of questionnaires distributed among the freshmen will also be presented to the Committee on Retention. The questionnaires, designed to obtain student reaction to various areas of the College, were sent to the students through campus mail. The results have not yet been tallied.

PLO addresses Forum tonight

by KEVIN MAHONEY

Hasan Rahmann, information director of the New York office of the Palestinian Liberation Organization, will speak in the semester's first William James Forum lecture tonight at 7:30 in Hynson Lounge.

Forum advisor Peter Tapke said representatives of the Israeli government have refused to participate, despite his repeated attempt.

"Hours have been spent on the phone to have someone with knowledge of Israel to speak at our forum, yet no one would participate with the PLO," Tapke said. "However, there is a possibility in the future of getting someone here with a background in Israeli government.

"Perfectly outrageous," says Tapke

Faculty passes amended smoking resolution

by GEOFF GARINTHER
Editor-in-Chief

After amending the original student resolution, the faculty Monday night passed a motion banning classroom smoking.

Before passing by a 31-13 vote, however, the resolution ran into stiff opposition from several faculty members.

Philosophy Department Chairman Peter Tapke, after asking whether "this means that a professor in an advanced seminar may not light his pipe," said he thought the ban was "perfectly outrageous."

But Mathematics Department Chairman Richard Brown replied, "I think smoking does not belong in any classroom on this campus," adding that if a professor wished to smoke in class, "he should do it in his home."

It was Brown, however, who suggested the second clause of the resolution be deleted after several faculty members objected to its "ambiguity."

The resolution as submitted by the Student Government Association and Student Academic Board read:

That all forms of smoking be prohibited in the classroom situation, and that consideration be given to the right of smokers and non-smokers alike in other situations, such as lectures and films. This consideration has already been given in such places as the library, the cafeteria, and the practice rooms in the Fine Arts Building.)

The resolution was amended to read: "That all forms of smoking he prohibited in the classroom."

Jurors, lawyers, chairman chosen for new SJB

by WENDY MURPHY

The Student Government Association Monday night completed its reformation of the student Judiciary Board, selecting eight jurors, five lawyers, and a chairman.

The jurors chosen are Daniel Bierne, Sue Chase, Walter Foraker, Elizabeth Gowen, Peter Jenkins, Duane Marshall, Chris Perry, and Mark Simpson. The are lawyers are Chuck Bell, Tim Dix, Winston Elliot, Howard Hecht, and Arlene Lee. The new chirman is Dave Aitvater.

"We got a good group of people," said SGA President Jay Young.

The selection process, which normally will be at the end of first semester, involved two meetings of the Senate. Jurors and the chairman were required to have previous experience in the SJB.

Under the new system, five jurors will hear each case, and all eight will receive a brief from the Chairman. "He'll rotate the jurors to give each an equal number of cases to judge," Young said.

Young stressed that the chairman officiates only the procedural aspects of each case; the jury makes any decisions. "This has been a common misunderstanding in the past," he said.

The new system authorizes the SJB to decide cases of minor or major nature, and to issue penalties ranging from fines to dismissal from the College.

In another major change, hearings in the new SJB will be closed to the public.

The judicial Reform Committee, headed by senior class officers Tim Connor and Ann Dorsey, met seven times last semester to revise the old system.

"That Committee, especially Tim, put in an awful lot of time and has done an excellent job," said Young.

Copies of the revised system are available in the Student Affairs Office.

White House: Wait 'til next year

by GEOFF GARINTHER
Editor-in-Chief

Despite his lead in latest polls, Jimmy Carter isn't making any commitments for the next four years yet. The White House has delayed until the Fall of 1981 consideration of President Joseph McLain's request for the President to attend Commencement or Convocation in 1982, the College's Bicentennial year.

"Although he is deepiy grateful to all of you of Washington College for your thoughtfulness in asking him to share this very special celebration with you in 1982," said the letter from Carter's Deputy Appointments Secretary, Fran Voorde. "the President has asked me to explain he does not project his schedule so far into the future. He will be delighted, however, to have you renew your gracious invitation, if you wish to do so, nearer the date—I suggest in the late fall of 1981—when he would be in a better position to give you a definite answer."

Once again...English Composition

"English proficiency. The faculty is authorized and expected to refuse credit or give a reduced grade to written work which does not demonstrate an accurate, effective use of the English language. Any instructor who finds a student's written work seriously defective in English is expected to report the case, with examples, to the Dean of the College, who has authority to require additional work in English composition without credit.

Despite the existence of this passage on page 18 of the College Catalog, not once in Garry Clarke's tenure as Dean of the College has an instructor reported a case of seriously defective written work. And if any had, there would have been no "additional work in English composition" available—with or without credit.

That deficiency may in fact be why professors have yet to complain officially. Their unofficial complaints, on the other hand, have been long and loud.

Now students themselves can be added to the ranks of those who perceive a need for the College to do more to improve student writing. In our page-one story on Post-Freshman Day, freshmen say that the College should offer classes or workshops in composition because they feel they lack basic writing skills.

It seems the consensus of the entire College that the school needs a composition program. The students want one, the faculty wants one, and, as we reported last week, the committee that is supposed to devise one—the Academic Council—wants one too. It may not be long before that English proficiency clause in the Catalog has some real meaning to it.

Drama Department to present The Bald Soprano

by NICK NAPPO
Fine Arts Editor

In 1948 the French dramatist Eugene Ionesco wanted to learn English, and went out and bought a grammar book. In the book's incredibly inane dialogues between Mr. and Mrs. Smith and their friends the Maftins, Ionesco found inspiration for The Bald Soprano,a biting one-act play that Drama Department Chairman Timothy Maloney calls "poignantly funny."

The Department will perform the hour-long play February 28 through March 2. in the basement of Tawes Theatre. No play has been staged down there since 1973. Maloney says he wants to make much more use out of the basement: "It gives a different atmosphere than the main stage, a sense of experimenting."

That should suit the unconventional Bald Soprano, which has been labeled an 'anti-play'. "Ionesco was fascinated by the unintelligibility of the seemingly intelligible, the difference between language and appearances," Maloney says. "He didn't see the ambiguity of speech as a threat. He saw it as absurd, and ridiculously funny."

Sophomore Sally McKenzie and freshman John Williams will play the Smiths and senior Beth Church will play Mrs. Martin. The three Washington stage veterans will be joined by three transfers, junior Steve Gaul as Mr. Martin, junior Virginia White as Mary, and graduate Steve Mumford as the Fire Chief.

The Bald Soprano is free for students and one dollar for others. Tickets may be reserved by calling the Drama Department (ext. 269) the week of the performances. Curtain time is eight o'clock.

Those damn typos

A typographical error in our story last week on the presidential race caused a misquotation of Dr. Howard Silver. Silver should have been quoted as saying, "I think all of the Republicans are very conservative, with the exception of John Anderson, and unfortunately he'll never win the nomination."

Letters to the Editor

"Insulting the entire college community"

This letter is in reference to Nick Nappo's article about Bonnie Nelle Duncan in last week's Elm. We feel that she has insulted the entire college community. Bonnie's reference to Washington College students as "overprivileged" is an unfair and totally unexceptable (sic) stereotype. Many students receive financial aid and hold down jobs to try to make ends meet. We question the validity of her statement "there is a handful of people here who have a sense of who they are, and where they are going." One look at the Washington College Reporter proves that Washington College Alumni have been quite successful in " the Real world." To quote the Student's Guide to the Academic Program at Washington College, "a goal of education in the liberal arts college, briefly, is the development of prospective (sic) on yourself and the world;" Washington College enables its students to reach this goal.

Concerning her comparison of Washington College to a "four year playground", we wonder how anyone with such a negative view of this school can convey a positive attitude through the yearbook and any other publications in which she has been involved.

Hostage support and vandalism

It seems less and less surprising, though still curious, how even the best of intentions are often spoiled by the meaningless actions of others.

This past Monday, students were urged to wear yellow to show their support of our people held hostage for the 100th day in Iran. (This idea had been suggested by the wife of one of the hostages.) The student responsible for putting up the posters and placing yellow ribbons around campus (this was done all across the country) can be commended for his concern. At least two yellow bedspreads could be seen hanging out windows on campus, but not for long. Some jerk stole one before the afternoon because it could be reached from the Somerset fire escape. Other words beside "jerk" come to mind, but they wouldn't be printed.

To the college community, I remind you that we aren't going to see a decrease in vandalism simply by trying to understand where the vandal's head "is at." A tsk-tsk-tsk attitude is doing nobody any good, either. This place will fall apart is these trends continue without the students having the will to take matters into their own hands.

Dining Hall goes out of its way, says SGA

In light of our various criticisms in this column last semester, perhaps it is time to consider something in a more favorable light for a change.

Why not start with the one thing on this campus that is criticized most often—the Dining Hall. Admittedly, the Dining Hall does have its problems and we are justified in some of our complaints, but let's not forget to give credit where it is due. The Dinning Hall goes out of its way to provide special services to us that it is in no way obligated to do. The French Dinner last week is a perfect example of this. The Dinning Hall, in cooperation with the French Club, went through an awful lot of extra work just to make things a little more enjoyable for us. The same holds for the German Dinner, the Luau, cookouts, and Christmas, Thanksgiving and Birthday Ball Buffets.

by JAY YOUNG
SGA President

One must also admit that they have been very responsive to student needs. Last week when we were fortunate enought to get Free water at literally the last hour, the Dining Hall quickly accomodated us by providing the necessary work crew and supervision. This same staff also worked the following evening for "Off the Wall" until about 4 in the morning. Other examples of this responsiveness to student needs include the suggestion box, the Contact Steak Dinners and, for the first time, the service of dinner on the day before the semester began.

The Dining Hall goes out of its way to make things better for us and they are responsive to our needs and suggestions. The next time you have a criticism, instead of complaining to someone that can't help, put it in the suggestion box or talk to the manager. And the next time they do something good for us...thank them.

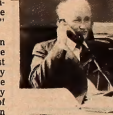
McLain and Conkling on pyrotechnics and other things that go boom in the night

by PETE TURCHI
News Editor

Sandy, the fireworks are hailin' oveLittle Eden tonight...Bruce Springsteen (4th of July, Asbury Park)

Weeping Willow. Peonie. Naval Battle. Battle in the Clouds. Titles of paintings? Nope.

How about sparklers, cherry bombs, Roman candles?



They are all fireworks. That is, for us. For Washington College President Joe McLain and Associate Professor of Chemistry John Conkling they are commercial pyrotechnics (as opposed to military pyrotechnics such as bombs, flares, and other things that go boom in the night.)

McLain says in his just-finished book, Pyrotechnics (and solid state chemistry) that, "From the age of twelve, at which time I received a chemistry set and proceeded to make assorted inks and stinks, red fire and green fire, at the suffering of my parents and to the detriment to household furnishings and the purity of the air, I have been in some way connected with pyrotechnic reactions."

McLain, who also admits to preparing flare mixes for certain fraternity rituals, studied chemistry at the College, then went to the Pyrotechnics Division of Edgewood Arsenal during World War II. After leaving the army he became involved in the fireworks business in Chestertown until 1954. He returned to his alma mater to teach chemistry, and in 1969 one of his students, John Conkling, returned to teach in the same department, while at the same time developing a devout interest in pyrotechnics.

McLain explains that his particular interest in fireworks is that they are an art form of sorts—there are very few companies in the country that produce fireworks, and those companies are almost without exception old family businesses. According to McLain, "the formulas have been handed down from generation to generation, like secret recipes." Although either the Chinese or Indians invented black powder, the integral base of pyrotechnics, the Italians have "used their imagination and artistry to do the designs and colors, and invent the ancestors to today's fireworks."

As pitiful as fireworks may seem today, the industry remains a rather small one. Because of this, along with the fact that many companies have been maintained by a single family for a long time, several manufacturers have distinctive trademarks: the British white shells look like no other white shells, and a true enthusiast can easily tell a red Wilbur Lizza shell from anyone else's red shell. The true enthusiast also knows that American shells are cylindrical, while European shells are spherical, which affects the way in which the brightly-lit particles fall from them.

"his nose would have burned out"

One of the only three sparkler manufacturers in the country is in Elkton, and McLain's ties with local companies like that one and other fireworks' makers has made it possible for four separate Independence Day celebrations to be held on the college grounds. About 15,000 people have witnessed each of the four shows which, according to McLain, include all the usual shells along with a few "set pieces," or displays that are lit but do not leave the ground; they are like large, sparkling billboards. McLain briefly described the way the quick-burning fuse for the George Washington set piece is made, concluding that, "using that, the whole thing burns at once for a few minutes. Otherwise, if you lit each one separately by the time you got his hair lit his nose would habe burned out."

McLain was contacted about nine years ago to develop a set ofregulations for the safe production of fireworks for the American fireworks industry. He and Conkling ran some tests in their spare time at the College, and when they handed in their results they were pleased to find that their suggestions were adopted by eight or nine states, including Maryland, as well as by the Consumer Product Safety Division of the federal government in 1976.

Conkling currently acts as a technical advisor for the American Fireworks Association, and he is also a member of the National Council of Fireworks Safety. He is often consulted about pyrotechnics, and recently worked with the Federal Aviation Administration to develop a method of detecting pyrotechnic devices, much like the way metal objects are currently screened at major airports. Conkling says that dogs can be trained to sniff out black powder, as well as other substances in bombs. One of Conkling's ex-students, Murray Suskin, has developed a scheme for rapid analysis of suspected pyrotechnical compositions which is now used as a standard procedure by many authorities. As final evidence that Conkling and McLain are consulted from people around the country for their knowledge of pyrotechnics, while McLain was being interviewed for this article he received a phone call from a postal inspector in San Francisco who asked him to help prosecute a case in which a bomb was sent through the mail and nearly killed its rather displeased recipient.

Few books on subject—'til now

The recent move to make fireworks safer then they have been in the past is a direct result of the fact that chemists were never really involved in the making of fireworks—few, if any, books on the subject have been written in the English language. McLain's book, to be published by The Franklin Institute Press in Philadelphia, devotes an entire chapter to commercial fireworks. He says that while people pressing for anti-firework legislation claim that even sparklers are dangerous, a study he conducted showed that sparklers are 99.99997 percent safe. Conkling added that while 10,000 firework-related injuries wer reported in 1976, before the new safety regulations went into effect; only 4,000 were reported last year, and the number has been steadily declining. This past Fourth of July Conkling appeared on the Today show to speak about firework safety in a segment that was filmed in front of Miller Library, where Conkling and McLain ignited a few samples.

Although Conkling and McLain together would seem to have solved the problems of the fireworks industry single-handedly, a busy pyrotechnic expert's day is never done. Conkling may travel to China this summer to help instruct the Chinese in how to make the fireworks that they export comply to the United States' national safety regulations.

McLain, on the other hand, continues to stand up for fireworks here at home.

Conkling

"People say to me, 'What good are fireworks?' he says. "I say, "What good is the Mona Lisa?'' I know no other entertainment that can delight so many people so cheaply. Over one and a half million people will attend the fireworks display in Battery Park in New York this year, and the cost of the display will be less than five cents per person. People say fireworks are dangerous, that they should beoutlawed. More people get hurt in bathtubs than get hurt by fireworks. Are they going to outlaw bathtubs?''

Faculty showcases talent

by GINGER KURAPKA

The faculty of the Music Department, along with special guest Bennett Lamond, showcased their talents Tuesday night with a salon concert honoring a recent gift to the College—a square piano.

The evening was planned as if it were a typical mid-nineteenth century night of entertainment. The Chickering Square piano, made by Steinway and Sons, was a gift of Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Miller of Chestertown. Over fifty spectators were seated in Tawes Theater for the hour-long concert.

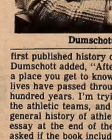
Kathleen Mills, chairman of the department, and Elizabeth Parcell began the program with several of Schumann's four-hand Pieces for Little and Big Children for the piano. Mills dedicated the pieces to "their first four-hand partners", Parcell's mother, and Mill's childhood friend.

Helen Stephenson, voice instructor, followed with several short German songs, including Brahms' lullaby. Translations were provided for the songs. She was accompanied by Dean Garry Clarke, and she dedicated the songs to the audience.

Lamond, listed in the program as "guest narrator," and Mills, at the piano, performed twenty humorous "Sports and Divertissements" from the early twentieth century by Erik Satie. The often humorous bits of prose fit the music and treated everyday subjects such as swinging, "Sea Bathing," golf, and sleighing, as well as more fanciful subjects such as, "Awakening the Bride," the devil's "Endless Tango" and Commedia dell'Arte.

The evening ended with Parcell on the bassoon, and his wife first at the piano and then on the flute. Having first declared that the nineteenth century bassoon repoirtoire was "limited," he played a piece by Spohr, a 19th century concert violinist and contemporary of Beethoven. Refreshments followed in the Green Room.

Dumschott's school history to be published in late spring



by GINGER KURAPKA

Early every weekday morning Mr. Fred Dumschott, 1927 graduate and Vice President for Finance Emeritus, can be seen making the short walk from his office in Bunting Hall to the Clifton E. Miller Library. Dumschott spends part of his day leafing through old newspapers and records in the lower floor of the library, but he does not do it just so that he can enjoy the memories of his youth. He is writing Washington College, a history of the school that should be published in the late spring.

Dumschott began his research by sketching the physical development of the school while he was working in the business office. "I decided after I left that I might as well put it all together," he said. The final product will be a history not only of the physical development of the school, but also of the different administrations.

To form a basis for his work Dumschott studied old local newspapers and boards and faculty meeting minutes, as well as articles and pamphlets on specific areas of the college's early history. "A lot of early history done by other people is in the archives here," Dumschott said. He added that the book will contain 80 illustrations of presidents, buildings and athletic teams.

Hayward also said, "This is really the first published history of the college." Dumschott added, "After fifty years at a place you get to know a lot. A lot of lives have passed through here in two hundred years. I'm trying to research the athletic teams, and I might add a general history of athletics here in an essay at the end of the book." When asked if the book included information up until the present day he said, "there are a lot of things I haven't been able to include." He signed, "I'd like to write more, but I'm not sure how much longer I have."

Widener loss means no playoffs for cagers

by RICH SCHATZMAN
Sports Editor

I don't' mean to say I told you so, but...so far I'm three for three on my predictions with one more to go. For the sake of the basketball team, I'll review the two defeats first (and quickly), and then the victory. Both defeats ocurred in the beautiful state of Pennsylvania.

Wednesday, February 6th, the Shoremen ventured to Haverford College to play the Fords. Remember the 84-64 win here at WC? The final score in Pa was 90-72 Haverford. Joe Moye was the leading scorer with 21 points, breaking out of a fivegame scoring slump. Weak defense and weak officiation, however, resulted in a defeat that hurt the Shoremen's play-off chances.

Wednesday the Shoremen's chance at post-season action ended at the hands of Wedener by a score of 88-61. The final score is Cain Athletic Center earlier in the year, was 70-69 Widener. This loss, however, could not be blamed on the officials. When asked about the ref, freshman Cecil Sapp said, "They were fair—it wasn't because of them (that we lost)." David Blissell led the scoring with 15 points and Joe Moye added 13.

Last Saturday night the Shoremen played like they could beat anybody as they handed Ursinus a 90-81 defeat. Jim Corey led all scorers with 27 points. In fact, each player that saw action played a fine game in the last home game of the season, Coach Tom Finnegan, whohas received a lot of criticism over the years, made a questionable move with above twelve minutes remaining in the game. Along with transfer sophomore Corey, Finnegan used three freshmen, (Paul Hynson, Sapp, and Blackwell) and junior Craig Langwost. This put starters Moye, Rich Dwyer, and Carl Fornoff on the bench. It was from this point on that the Shoremen stretched their lead enough to hang on at the end and come away with a win.

Tomorrow the Shoremen close their 179-80 season against arch-rival Johns Hopkins. The Shoremen defeated the Blue Jays 87-71 here. There is really no reason for the cagers to lose this game uniess they suffer a letdown after being knocked out of the playoffs. But Hopkins is also out of the playoff picture, which makes this game a matter of pride.

Bratt inducted into Hall of Fame

by PETE TURCHI

George Bratt, a 1921 Washington College graduate, has been inducted into the Oldtimers Baseball Association of Maryland's Hall of Fame.

Bratt played three sports at Washington and went on to become a baseball player, coach, avid hunter, and the president of the National Sporting Goods Company. He caught for a single season for Oxford, Maryland in the Tri-State League. His sixteen-year sandiot career including playing for and managing Fairfield Dairy, Cloverland Dairy, and Hampden, all baseball teams in the Baltimore area. Remarkable, in those years he was somehow associated with sixteen pennant-winning teams. For a short while Bratt also worked as a major league scout.

The induction ceremony was held in Baltimore on Friday, February 18, at the Association's twenty-fourth annual Hall of Fame Night. Other inductees included Franklin Gibson, Charles Bilshce, and Wilbur Snyder.

9.6 percent increase

$450 tuition, room, and board hike recommended

by GEOFF GARINTHER
Editor-in-Chief

The Finance Committee of the Board of Visitors and Governors will recommend a $450 increase in tuition, room, and board costs for next year at tomorrow's Board meeting.

The 9.6 percent increase for students is part of an almost five-and-a-half million dollar budget that Vice- President of Finance Gene Hessey says will almost surely meet with Board approval.

The $200 tuition hike—meaning a 6.4 percent increase over last year's figure—and the $250 room and board increase—16.1 percent higher—will raise tuition, room, and board costs for next year to $5150.

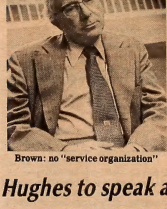
Salaries take biggest chunk

Hessey cited three reasons for the 11.5 percent growth in the College's overall budget for next year:

- College President Joseph McLain's recommended $250,000 increase in faculty and staff salaries.
- An expected $100,000—or 25 percent—jump in utility costs. (Hessey said other institutions, including Johns Hopkins University, are anticipating an increase of as much as 50 percent).
- $100,000 in additional student aid needed to meet the tuition, room, and board increase

Hessey also said that an additional $35,000 was included in the budget for building repairs for the New Dorms and the library and for painting of the exterior of Bill Smith Hall and the interiors of Dunning and Bunting.

"After considerable debate about the temptation to delete these items until later," said Hessey, "we decided to get them out of the way before further cost increases."



$600 increase avoided

A shortfall of approximately $347,000 between anticipated revenues and expenditures for next year might have necessitated a $600 increase in tuition, room, and board, said Hessey, if the College were not counting on higher annual giving and endowment earnings.

The College is also counting, said Hessey, "on the current rate of return on investments sustaining itself during the next year, which is very iffy."

Brown: no "service organization"

New computer chosen; no programs for other departments, says Brown

by PETE TURCHI
News Editor

Only two months after Washington College President Joseph McLain approved funds for a new computer, the PRIME 550 has been chosen and purchased for the school.

Last Friday a contract was signed with PRIME Computing Corporation, Inc., of McLian Virginia, for the main computer, a card reader, a line printer with graphic capability, and a magnetic tape unit. The tape unit and the graphic capability of the line printer are the most noticeable enlargements on the college's current system, which is organized around an IBM 1130.

Mathematics and Computer Science Department Chairman Richard Brown said that the new computer has a larger memory than the IBM machine, but more importantly the PRIME computer uses videoscreen terminals as opposed to punched cards. This means that an operator can type a program, run it, correct it, and run it again without leaving his seat. It also means that with the six terminals the school has purchased, six people can type and run programs at once, whereas with the current system only three people can use the card punchers at once, and only one program can be run at a time.

The proposal that the company submitted to the college begins by saying that, "The PRIME computer system proposed for Washington College has been configured to meet the College's current needs, while providing the flexibility and capacity to expand to requirements." Part of the capacity for expansion is the fact that the computer has facilities for up to 63 terminals which do not have to be in the same building as the computer. Cost of the terminals for the college is under one thousand dollars a piece. Another aspect of the new computer which especially suits the College is that a serviceman can run tests on the computer by remote control to see what is wrong with it before making a service call.

No programs for other departments

Brown said that in Fall he "will know if we have chosen a sufficiently comprehensive system." He also said that a major change in the computing center next year will be that it will not be run by one person, and it will no longer be a "service organization". I propose that in the future we help people solve their problems, but we will not run programs for other departments," he said. "I intend to offer to any person in the administration staff who is interested in a course on the computer over the summer."

Applications are currently being solicited by the College for a computer science teacher, but Brown said that he hopes the new teacher will teach a math course as well. Their will be at least four computer science courses offered,

Ball will highlight Birthday Celebration

by KATHY STRECKFUS
Assistant Editor

9:00 p.m. Cherry blossoms. The orchestra. Elegant gowns will take the place of Levi's. Carnations will be pinned on every lapel.

The traditional Ball will highlight Washington's Birthday Celebration from 9-1:00 p.m., tomorrow in Cain Athletic Center, featuring The Lester Lanin Orchestra.

The program of festivities also includes a meeting of the Board of visitors and Governors at 10:00 a.m., a buffet luncheon in Hodson Dining Hall at 12:30, the Washington's Birthday Convocation in Daniel Z. Gibson Fine Arts Center at 2:00 with speaker Governor Harry Roe Hughes, and an informal dinner at 5:00 in the Dining Hall.

Over 2000 invitations to the Ball were sent to students, parents, Faculty, the Administrative Staff, and alumni. According to Vice-President for Development and Public Relations George Hayward, "We will have a full house." There will be 100 tables and seating for 800. In previous years, about 450 students have attended.

The proceeds from patrons and tickets will go to the College's general Scholarship Fund. Hayward said last year there was a $2500 profit.

Hayward is coordinator of the celebration in conjunction with Dean of Students Maureen Kelley. The freshman class, led by class President Peter Collins, will decorate the Athletic Center. Director of Food Services Dave Knowles will manage the cash bar and midnight snack. The Maintenance Department handles the set-up of tables, the platform for the orchestra, and clean-up on Sunday and Monday.

"This year we strongly discourage bringing coolers of ice into the gymnasium," Hayward said. Buckets of ice will be available at the bar.

Freshman class President Peter Collins said that decorations include cherry trees with lights and cherry blossoms on the branches. About 15 freshmen are working on the decorations which Collins said will cost about $250.

The annual Ball began as a traditional event in 1965. Hayward said "In the early 70's, interest declined and attendence dropped off. In 1974, President and Mrs. McLain had a very strong interest in the upgrading of the Birthday Ball to a point where more students, alumni, and Chestertown residents would attend. In 1977 the Ball was moved to the gymnasium and attendence increased by 200 people."

Up until 1969 a "Miss Washington College," chosen by male students, was crowned at the Ball. The possibility of presenting the White House with a Washington College birthday cake has been suggested in past years, but the idea has never gotten off the ground.

Hayward said, "We view the Ball as a traditional social occasion for the college community and friends and neighbors of the College. I hope this year is the best we've had."

Academic regalia explained

The ceremonial traditions of Washington's Birthday Convocation link the College both to 18th century Maryland and to medieval universities.

The academic costume, the presidential chain, and the mace are the major symbols of academic regalia.

The tradition of academic dress goes back to the 14th century. A 1321 statute required that all "Doctors, Licentiates, and Bachelors" of the University of Coimbra wear gowns. By the end of the 14th century, the statutes of certain English colleges prescribed the wear-

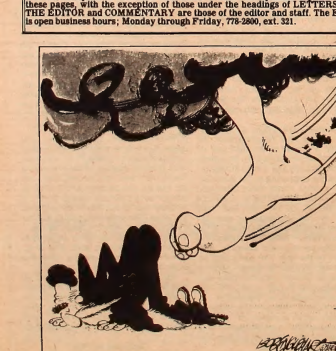
Taking the good with the bad

There were two news items of note during this otherwise slow news week leading up to the Birthday Ball: It was learned that we can expect a substantial ($450) increase in tuition, room, and board for nextyear, and that the College has chosen a new $125,000 computing system (the PRIME 550) to replace the antiquated IBM 1130. So you take the bad with the good, right? Except in this case the bad isn't all that bad, and the good—well the good just isn't all that good, either.

The $450 increase could have been worse—$240 worse, according to Vice-President for Finance Gene Hessey. Some less-than-conservative estimates on anticipated annual giving and investment returns for next year have kept the increase lower than it might have been.

And it's hard to contest the reasons for the increase: the faculty andstaff salary increase pool, at a-quarter-of-a-million dollars, is smaller than what many students called for last semester, knowing it might necessitate a tuition hike; the conservative 25 percent increase in estimated utility costs for next year is unavoidable; and the extra $100,000 necessary for financial aid goes right back to students.

$450 is a considerable sum, but that looks like the cost of keeping warm and keeping professors



The acquisition of the new computing system is welcome, but this benefit is qualified not only by the loss of Computing Center Director Bill Schmoldt but by the apparent elimination of the computing services he provided gratis to other departments. The new system may be much more capable than the present one, but it evidently won't be working for the administration or faculty unless they learn how to work it themselves.

The lesson here is that it's easier to replace a machine than it is to replace a man. That the tuition increase may help retain the faculty, upon whom the educational quality of the College depends, should provide some solace for students and parents when it comes time to pay that bill next summer.

Letter to the Editor

"What good is the Mona Lisa?"

This letter is in reference to a statement made by Washington College President Joe McLain in Peter Turchi's article, "McLain and Conkling on Pyrotechnic and other things that go boom in the night" in last week's Elm.

As quoted by Mr. Turchi in the body of the article, Dr. McLain said that when other people say "What good are fireworks?" he counters with, "What good is the Mona Lisa?" Whether or not the statement was made in jest I do not know, but the implications of it are too serious to be taken lightly.

I say this not only because I've never had anyone stuff paintings in my mailbox on Halloween, but because I think the inherent value of a work of art is enormously greater than that of a handful of chemicals burning in the sky. The matter, however, is not one of particular principles.

As some members of the Washington College community might remember, we are part of a liberal arts college which has itself a history of over 200 years. In the late 1700's when Washington received its charter, the chic thing in Europe was neoclassicism. This included a return to classical ideas of education such as Socrates', which, generally stated, was that education was to be had for itself; it's worth was not to make you an auto mechanic or a computer programmer, but instead to teach you ideas and principles that would enable you to better live your life. At about the same time Samuel Johnson was sitting in an apartment in London saying that, "Whether we provide for action or conversation, whether we wish to be useful or pleasing, the first requisite is the religious and moral knowledge of right and wrong; the next is an acquaintance with the history of mankind, and with those examples which may be said to embody truth, and prove by events the reasonableness of opinions." Hereabouts are the foundations of the liberal arts tradition.

Although, as I said, I can't be sure exactly how seriously Dr. McLain meant for his statement to be taken, it seems to me an opportune moment to remind ourselves of the purposes of a liberal arts education. Works of art such as the Mona Lisa have always been the high points of any culture; to change an old quote, the history of art is the history of man. To imply that our culture might be remembered because it was able to make things that go boom and make colors in the sky is, to me, absurd.

In conclusion I would simply like to say that fireworks and art works both have their places, but we must be able to distinguish between the two. People don't want to see paintings set on fire and thrown into the sky, but neither do they want to hang a Wilbur Lizza red shell in their dining room. All considered, however, I suppose I must admit that painting is the easier of the two "arts"; Leonardo da Vinci spent weeks painting the Mona Lisa, but while he was working on the hair, he didn't have to worry about her smile burning out.

The Great Paraphernalia Ban: Whodunit?

Holy Homegrown! They're still out of rolling papers at Marty Kabat's General Store. They haven't gotten any more screens. There hasn't been a bong in there (for sale, at least) since the late 1970's. And it doesn't look like any of this hardware is scheduled for a return engagement.

Some young punks on politics, the College Republicans, deserve much of the credit for the extra shelf space at the bookstore. The reactionary pot-totailers have been putting out facist propoganda sheets ever since the Republican Party decided that there may be life after Watergate. Their November excretion (printed with money that they sleazed out of the student Activities Fund) featured a "Jane, you ignorant slut"-type debate over the morality of selling marijuana paraphernalia in the bookstore.

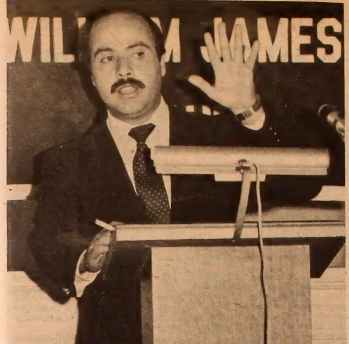
The pro- paraphernalia argument was written by a student who "never had, nor any time desires to have any connection with the College Republicans. "That's bullshit. If he takes part in a written debate in their rag, that's about as connected as he can get with these GOP sermon-on-the-mounters.

The anti-paraphernalia argument was written by someone who goes by the pen name "Publius." Whether or not Publius is the same writer that wrote the pro-paraphernalia argument is anybody's guess, but whoever he or she is should change their by-line to "Nuke Breath." The mystery moralist says that the college must "enstill in its students proper standards of conduct, ethics, and morality." The writer goes on to say that the sale of paraphernalia in the bookstore "flies square in the teeth of any sense of ethics."

I can think of many things to fly into Publius's teeth, but he sure gave Mr. Movies down in the bookstore a case of the willies. Kabat kept his cool but got rid of the rolling papers and screens he had so carefully placed in a drawer behind the bookstore counter.

A) Did Kabat get heat from Cap'n Joe and the Big Brass to get the dope toys out of his inventory? B) Did an angel appear in Kabat's dreams and turn him into a fire 'n brimstone crusader for moral reform? C) Or was Mr. "Green Acres" Haney of WC simply blown away by Publius's argument?

I'll go with D, none of the above, on this question. Kabat wasn't getting that much of a return selling rolling papers and screens, at least not enough to risk getting blacklisted by those who sympathize with the College Republicans.



But how can anyone sympathize with a klan that squanders student activity funds on trashy propoganda dedicated to the teachings of Anne Landers? This bunch also set up a politically saturated blood donor program with the Baltimore Red Cross last spring, totally ignoring the pleas of the Eastern Shore Blood Bank to keep blood here where it is donated. The College Republican's succesful eradication of marijuana paraphernalia from the bookstore is just the latest attempt by these meddling parasites to deprive W.C. students of party hardware, blood, and activity funds as completely as possible.

The College Republicans will no doubt receive GOP funds to get to Chicago for the Republican Convention this year, whether the folks with the student activity bucks spot the W.C. Republicans Presidential Campaign this Fall remains to be seen.

'Till then, rooooooooooooooll another one...

Rahman: The PLO and the 20 percent solution

by GEOFF GARINTHER
Editor-in-Chief

He has met with Andrew Young several times, and he said the Carter administration knew of the meetings Young had with high-ranking members of the Palestine Liberation Organization before resigning under pressure last year.

He was involved in the unsuccessful negotiation attempt of US envoy Ramsey Clark early in the Iran crisis last November.

And he predicted that Moscow will remove Afghan President Babrak Karmal by the end of this week.

But last Friday night, PLO Deputy Representative to the U.N. Hasan Rahman was concerned mostly with the plight of the Palestinians in the Middle East as he spoke to an audience of nearly 75 in Hynson Lounge.

"How to achieve peace in the Middle East—that is what we should be concerned about," said Rahman, a graduate of the University of Puerto Rico with a master's degree in public administration. "We (the PLO) understand that peace requires a concession. We have conceded 80 percent of Palestine; we want to establish our state on only 20 percent.

"We believe this can be settled peacefully...when everyone gets what belongs to them."

Crux of the conflict

Rahman presented a persuasive argument for the Palestinians as he identified what he called the crux of the Middle East conflict: "As long as the Israeli government declares theres is no such thing as a Palestinian people, the conflict will continue.

"I have no problem with living with a Jew in Israel or New York," Rahman said, adding that he does in fact live in a predominantly-Jewish apartment building in New York. "I do have a problem with someone who will not perceive me as his equal."

Allowing that he expected the issue to be brought up, Rahman asserted that the PLO did not introduce violence to the Middle East. "254 women and children were massacred by Menachim Begin in 1948," he said. "In his book, He even brags about this."

Rahman also criticized President Carter's decision to boycott the Moscow Olympics. "When Mr. Carter was asked why the athletes will not go to Moscow, he said, 'We will not go to a capitol that subjugates innocent people.'

"Why does this apply only to the Soviet Union, not Israel?" asked Rahman.

Saying that every Israeli citizen receives $1000 a year from American taxpayers, Rahman also also what the Palestinians had "done to the American people to deserve this kind of treatment."

Unable to visit family

Although he is the only PLO representative allowed by the US government to travel outside a 25-mile radius of New York City, Rahman said he has nonetheless been unable to visit his family in his homeland on the occupied West Bank for five years. "My father died three weeks ago—I have not been able to attend his funeral. I have brothers and sisters I have not seen for sixteen years."

After a 45-minute lecture, Rahman answered questions— some heated—for another 45 minutes.

Said one Jewish member of the audience, "You call yourself a peaceful organization, yet you've masterminded terrorist activities for years. The American people don't understand that if a Palestinian state were set up on the West Bank, it would be a Russian satellite."

Rahman answered that "The PLO is a nationalist movement. We have no interest whatever, under any circumstances, to become a satellite of the Soviet Union or the US. We wish to be friendly with all the nations of the world."

Hasan Who?

Concerning his relationship with President Carter, he said that five minutes after being introduced to him, Carter denied ever having met Rahman to reporters.

Rahman concluded with a warning on American foreign policy. "Anyone who is serious about the future of America in general will have to start questioning its policies in the Middle East."

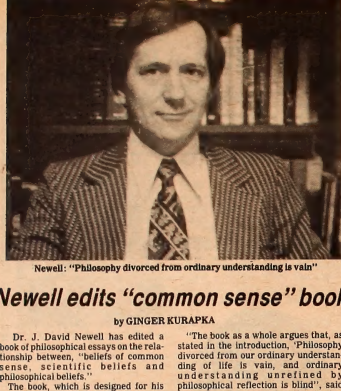
Question: What was your reaction to last Friday night's PLO speaker?

Jeff Donaho - Freshman - New York
I thought it presented a lot of things about the PLO I didn't know. I think I'm more sympathetic to their cause but it is no excuse for their actions.

Steve Groft - Freshman - Westminste
The speaker was well-versed. Th definitely have a legitimate cause.

Lee Clarke - Junior - Mass.
He enlightened me to the sorrowful plight of the Palestinians, but two wrongs do not make a right. You shouldn't fight fire with fire.



Marion Rock - Senior - New York
The lecture didn't have any effect on me at all. I thought the guy was very crafty and he dodged a lot of questions. He knows the sentiment in the US. It was what I expected.

Smith, Gillin criticize NASDTEC evaluation

by BILL MORTIMER

A draft evaluation from the Maryland State Board of Education has recently been submitted to the College.

The college was evaluated under the guidelines set by the National Association of State Directors of Teacher Education and Certification (NASDTEC) from November 14-16 last semester. The evaluation is designed to determine whether or not the various course plans in the Education Department here meet with the standards set by NASDTEC. If the College meets with those standards, students who fulfill the requirements in the Education Department would receive teacher certification upon graduation.

The Social Sciences area received some criticism in the evaluation, according to chairman of the History Department Nate Smith. He said however, that the problems are not serious ones. "Some of the recommendations are vague," he said.

The Humanities area also received criticism. Dr. Richard Gillin, Associate Professor of English said. "Some of their criticisms are valid to a certain degree". He added, however, "they (the evaluation team) wrote one sentence that is priceless. It is completely unintelligible."

One criticism of the Social Sciences, Smith said, is that the courses "are not teacher prep courses. Most of the problems departments encountered come from the general difference between a liberal arts college and a state school."

As far as the Humanities is concerned, Gillin reacts "most strongly to the criticism on literature. They say that the teaching of literature is secondary to media and television." Gillin said he fears the devaluation of literature without the teaching of literature, he says, "The literacy rate can't help but go down." He added that "our main concern is the students' writing abilities."

All departments have been asked to add what is missing or change the programs in order to meet the standards. "If we don't shape up—and it is not a minor thing—they will not give NASDTEC teacher approval" said Smith. He added that this does not mean that qualified students cannot teach. Smith said that the Committee did not supply any ideas or solutions to the problems.

In order to keep NASDTEC certification, Gillin said a course in Linguistics may be added permanently. He also said that the "state is asking us to do things now that we cannot because of our size." Due to lack of staff it is virtually impossible to include the variety which will please the NASDTEC standard, said Gillin.

The finished report, which will probably be out sometime in March, will reflect the November evaluation as well as comments and justifications by the various departments.

Newell edits "common sense" book

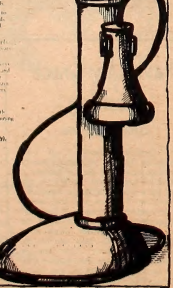
by GINGER KURAPKA

Dr. J. David Newell has edited a book of philosophical essays on the relationship between, "beliefs of common sense, scientific beliefs and philosophical beliefs."

The book, which is designed for his Introduction to Philosophy class, is published by University Press of America. "Five publishers were interested at the outset," he said. Although they liked the idea behind the book, they "weren't optomistic about marketing possibilities."

University Press is handling promotion of the book itself. "The book will be exhibited at 22 conferences across America this year," Newell said. The company will send order forms to "every teacher in humanities in America."

"The book as a whole argues that, as stated in the introduction, 'Philosophy divorced from our ordinary understanding of life is vain, and ordinary understanding unrefined by philosophical reflection is blind'", said Newell. Nine articles by noted philosophers such as William James, Henry Sidgwick and A.J. Ayer, and one previously unpublished essay by Newell comprise the book.



Newell first began thinking about such a book in 1974, but until recently, "I never seemed to have time to do it." By October of 1979 the book was in its final form. The college bookstore received its order about two weeks ago.

"I think it will be a very useful book of readings for the Introductary class," Newell said.

Photography Editor's camera stolen

by KEVIN MAHONEY

A $700 camera was stolen from the dark room used by Elm and Pegasus photographers on Sunday, Feburary 10th. The camera was the personal property of Jim Graham, Elm Photography Editor.

Graham said, "I locked the camera up on Saturday night after taking pictures at the Lambda party. On Sunday morning Rick Adelberg (another student photographer) went into the Elm office and saw two black males who said they had permission from me to be there. When Rick confronted me in my room with this story I said I had not given anyone permission to be there, yet when entering the Dark Room I found my camera had been stolen."

Graham and Adelberg reported the theft to Chestertown police. On their way back to the College, they saw the two suspects and recorded the license plate number. They then reported the number to the police.

"The police took our information, yet they didn't seem to be too interested. I felt they could do more," said Graham.

Graham said that will probably cover the cost of the camera.

There were no signs of forcible entry into the Elm Office.

Thieves infiltrate faculty locker-room

by FREEMAN DODSWORTH

The faculty locker-room in Cain Athletic center has been plagued by thefts this semester, with professors reporting articles of athletic gear and clothing stolen, as well as money and personal articles.

One of the victims of theft was Dr. Richard DeProspo, Assistant Professor of English, who had fifteen dollars stolen in two separate incidents. According to DeProspo, the thief is clever and fast. Not only did he gain entry to a locked room to which he theoretically shouldn't have a key, said DeProspo, but after he stole the money, he returned the wallet to its place in the locker. DeProspo's solution to the problem is simple: "Coach (Ed) Athey should change the locks, and issue new keys to all faculty members." He added that, "I'm going to hide down there on and off for the next couple of months, and if I find out who's doing it, I'm going to kill him."

Christian Science counselor provides services

Christian Science Campus Counselor

Christian Science Campus Counselors serve on a volunteer basis at colleges and universities near their homes. "They welcome conversations with people in the academic community about their interests and needs and the possible helpfulness of Christian Science in their lives.

"People" can be interested students, faculty members, instructors or staff members...anyone who'd like to examine a more spiritual approach to his life and work.

"The counselor's approach is one of friendly interest and idea-sharing. No religious proselytizing, just candid exchange of thoughts and experiences. No giving of advice, but exploring possibilities together.

The main focus of the Counselor's thinking is going to be on God—what God is, His relation to man, what reality is (and how it can be known), and what man can be because of God.

"but they won't all be taught by one person. Four or more people on campus next semester will be teaching Computer Science—at least three members of the Math Department, and perhaps one outsider. I think we have made a mistake in the past in giving one person the work of two people— (Former Director of the Computer Center Bill) Schmoldt was heavily overloaded." Brown also said that student assistants in the center will be relied upon more heavily than in the past.

One of the courses offered next semester will be on the computer language PASCAL. Brown said that although it will be exciting for students to take the introductory course on the new computer with the terminal set-up, students who can already use the IBM machine "will be able to use the PRIME 550 after about five minutes of instruction." Programs that have preciously been prepared on cards can be transferred onto the new computer, according to Brown, with relative ease.

The PRIME 550 will be delivered on May 27, and a champagne reception has already been planned for May 28 to celebrate the running of the first program, which will be specially designed for the occasion.

Parisians in America

Ribillard fits in "like a student"

by GINGER KURAPKA

A Parisian with an English accent acting as French Language assistant for the semester?

"I hate this accent!" Christian Ridillard said, "I wish I had an American accent" Having spent a year in England, however, and only a month here, it's only normal that her A's should be long.

Ribillard, who studies at the University in Cretail outside of Paris, first heard of Washington College from Assistant Professor of English Thomas Cousineau, who taught for a while at Cretell. Along with the three courses she's taking here, she has to keep up with her classes at home. She is in her last year of study for her teaching license, and she'll have to take four exams when she returns in June to receive her diploma.

She is studying to be a teacher, but teaching jobs are just as scarce in France as they are here. "I'd love to be a teacher, but if I can't," she said, "I could be an air hostess if I was desperately in need of a job." Airline hostess jobs aren't much more plentiful than teaching jobs, but her father was a pilot and through his connections Ribillard said she could probably get a job.

"America is still basically a dream land," she said, because the French system of employment is more impersonal. "I do like the French system, and I'm very pleased with what I've learned, but we're so selective and they don't give you a chance. Too often it seems, it's not what you know, but who you know. Jobs are given usually only on the basis of a resume, and there is rarely any personal interivew. She added, "I can criticize, but because of my background I tend to like the system."

As unbelievable as it may seem, Ribillard said cultural opportunities in Chestertown don't really match those in Paris. "I like life in Paris: it's a whirlwind," she said, "I go out every night, and it's not especially for drinks but just to be with friends."

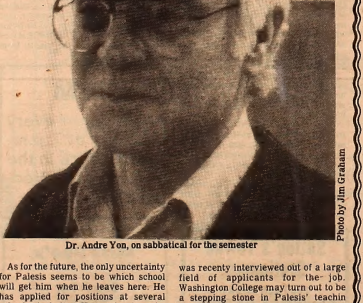
"I like it very much here," she said. "The only thing I was surprised of was that I wasn't surprised." She had her first MacDonald's hamburger the week before she left Paris, but being on the home territory of the hamburger doesn't seem to have changed her opinion much. "I try to avoid hamburgers," she said. "I definitely prefer French restaurants. Aside from hamburgers, the lack of sidewalks in Chestertown seems to be the only thing she doesn't like.

"My experiences in England helpied me in terms of language and contacts with people. People here have been very, very nice. I didn't feel as good in England: I feel myself much better suited here. I feel just like the students."

Palesis replaces Yon in French Department

by FREEMAN DODSWORTH

The apartment in the basement of the Minta Martin dormitory seems to have become a refuge for transient professors over the last year. Last semester it was occupied by Dr. Stuart Knee, visiting assistant professor of history. This semester it is occupied by visiting assistant professor of French, Dr. John Palesis.



Palesis, who recieved his doctorate in French Literature last August from the University of Pennsylavania, is filling in for Dr. Andre Yon, who is on sabatical this semester. Although this is his first full-time teaching position, Palesis has held teaching jobs on a fellowship basis at both the University of Pennsylvania and at Temple University, where he recieved his M.A. in French Literature in 1975. He also taught for a year at the University of Lausanne in Switzerland. He began his American education on an impressive note, receiving a Fulbright Scholarship for undergraduate study in the United States. He left his native country of Cyprus, an island off the coast of Greece in 1966, and attended Dickinson College, in Carlisle Pa. He graduated cum laude from there in 1970.

At age 33, Palesis is young for a man of his education. He shows it through a personal and engaging attitude toward his students, which lacks much of the ivory tower remoteness of many men of his learning. "I enjoy being with the students. I see them out of classes as well as during them. I even bear the cafeteria's food because I enjoy (the students') company." He continues, "I feel that teachers can learn alot from the students, by being around them and interacting with them. It makes you a better teacher."

He is equally positive when put on the spot about the faculty. "I don't know too many of them" he says, "but the ones I do know, I like." He says that there is an atmosphere among the facuity that is not typical of the academic community as a whole. "In our business," he says, "there is a saying, 'Publish or Perish'. That does not seem to be the case here. Most professors seem to place their teaching above their scholarship here. This is good for the students."

But it doesn't look like Palesis will perish academically wherever he goes. His dissertation on the screenplay as a genre is in the process of being published as a series of articles in various cinema-graphic and literary journals. He is also in the process of developing a series of dialogues on videotape for the teaching of French conversation.

In March he will deliver the lecture here that he presented at Harvard last week. It will deal with a French film by Jean Cocteay entitled "Blood of a Poet."

As for the future, the only uncertainty for Palesis seems to be which school will get him when he leaves here. He has applied for positions at several schools, including Harvard, where he was recenty interviewed out of a large field of applicants for the job. Washington College may turn out to be a stepping stone in Palesis' teachin career.

"Optimistic" is the word for Matthews this season

by DAN HUDSON

"If you are looking for an overall perspective on this compng season", offered Head Lacrosse Coach Brian Matthews, "I'd have to say that 'optimistic' would be the key work. We've got good depth and a real good attitude in practice so far. As we can do is wait and see how things develop". Matthews, in his second year as head coach, has good reason to be optimistic, but he also must be very anxious to see the Shoremen get back into the thick of the college lacrosse scene— after eight consecutive winning seasons the Shoremen slipped to 3-11 last year.

Lacrosse is a big part of Washington College. A winning team means national rankings and publicity that no other sport has been able to bring to the College recently. Even though the Shoremen play one of the toughest "clipboard assistants" according to Matthews. "I've tried to be very flexible in what thei duties are", he explains, "I don't sit down and map out everything I want done. They both seem very confortable and confident in what they are doing and are really a big asset to me. Expecially at this stage of the season, in that I am allowed to sit back and asses the players."

The big question mark on this year's team will be in the goal. "Not becauser of a lack of talent", cautions Matthews, "but because we depended a lot on Temmy Hart last year." The nowgraduated Hart was a third-team All-American last season. "At this point it looks like we are going to go with a two-goalie system. Both Brian Winand andChris Anglem have the temperment to handle the pressure and both have Sophomores Kevin O'Connor and Ray Cameron.

Perhaps the most glaring weakness on the Shoremen team last year was the midfield. As the season progressed it became obvious that the position was lacking in depth and scoting punch. This season Matthews plans to go with three mid-fields, illustrating that depth should not be a problem again. As he puts it, "This years team has too many good athletes not to run three."

The firepower will have to come from Senior Billy Hamill, who led the team in scoring last year, second year man Bob White, and the returning Ben Tuckerman, who took a year off from school last year. Tuckerman will aslo be relied on for face-offs, with the return of that rule this season. Senior Tim Hollywood, Sophomores Peter Jemkins, Jesse schedules in the country they have to win to be recognized.

Matthew's coaching staff consists of Clint Evans, who will once again be in charge of the defense, and Scott Allison, a star in both soccer and lacrosse at Roanoke College, who will coach the offense.

Neither of these coaches are mere the ability to play the postiion."

The defense is as solid as it hasbeen in the last several years. Last year's starting trio of Honorable Mention All-American Lecky Haller, Senior Will Herring and Junior Frank Felice are all back. Senior Jim Bradley, who has seen a lot of action in his previous three seasons' is also back, slong with Bacon, Shaen Harmon and Joe Cornerly and freshman Tim Cunningham round out the midfield probables.

The attack, stung by the unexpected loss of Greg Schaffner and Jay Atkinson, will have to develop quickly. The only players with any college experience are Paul Hooper, who started as a freshman last year, and Senior Timmy Norris, who was moved to attack also are being considered for starting berths. Brian Carr, Jeff Koffman and Chris Cox all have good high school careers behind them.

The Shoremen's first home scrimmage will be tomorrow at 3:00 against the Crease Lacrosse Club of Baltimore on the upper field. It may be the start of a come back season for Washington College lacrosse.

It's the beginning of the end for crew

by FREEMAN DODSWORTH

Washington College Crew opens its Spring season on March 22 with a race against LaSalle College, in Philadelphia.

But that's only the beginning of the end of the long story that makes up the season of any sport, especially crew.

Since the beginning of the school year, the crew has been working out, constantly both on and off the water, to make this the biggest season that the Washington College oarsmen have ever had.

Captain Court Trueth has been working his men harder than any captain in memory, with long runs of 6 to 8 miles twice a week, and intensive weight training on the others. Weather permitting, head coach Eric Stoll will take over the first of next week, when the team once again takes to the water for the last 4 weeks of training before the opener.

According to Trueth, hopes are high among team members as well as coaches, with LaSalle, a traditional power in the league, first on the schedule. They will also be looking for victories over other traditional rivals such as Virginia and George Washington University.

Of all of the sports here at WC, there is none that practices for so long, with so little to show for their work. Despite an estimated eighty hours of hard practice this Spring alone, total race times will number something less than an hour. But apparently they do have something to show for their troubles. Says one oarsman, "When you come over that finish line and your ahead by two tenths of a second, your thankful for every moment of work that you put in, believe me."

Hall of Fame: coming soon to a town near you

by PETE TURCHI
News Editor

There's one in Cooperstown, New York, and there's one in Canton, Ohio, and soon there may even be one in Chestertown.

According to Director of Alumni Affairs Frank Vogel, plans are currently under way for a Washington College Alumni athletic Hall of Fame. Like the Baseball and Football Halls of Fame, the college organization would give recognition to outstanding athletes, based purely upon athletic prowess. Although the program to organize the Hall is still in the very early stages, a committee has been established to talk about determining how funds are to be raised, how Hall members will be chosen and where the Hall will be located.

Vogel, who was elected to be Executive Secretary of the organization, said that over the three year period during which he has worked in the Office of Alumni Affairs, "there has been an interest expressed in some recognition program" for Washington athletes. During the past year various Halls of Fame around the country have been contacted, and an ad-hoc committee was developed to establish the program. The Hall of Fame Committee chosen by this first group then proceeded to elect executive officers.

The committee, which consists of fourteen people, will meet once in April and once again in May to continue organization plans and to decide when the Hall of Fame will actually begin inducting members. Although tentative thought has been given to establishing the Hall somewhere in Cain Memorial Gym, no definite arrangements have yet been made. Vogel said that no opening date has been set yet because, "we want to do it as nicely as possible. Anything worth doing is worth doing right." He also emphasized that the program was by no means a fund-raising campaign and that it was planned as another service for Washington College Alumni by the Alumni Association and the Office of Alumni Affairs.

Other officers of the Hall of Fame include Frederick "Dutch" Burmeister, President, Dr. Charles B. Clark, Vice-president, and Ed Athey, secretary-treasurer.

ing of a long gown. Whether the academic regalia was copied from ecclesiastical or court dress is uncertain.

European college vary widely in their choice of academic dress. American colleges and universities, however, met in 1895 at Columbia University to adopt standards for the academic dress.

A gown with pointed sleeves signifies the bachelor's degree, oblong sleeves the master's degree, and bellshaped sleeves signify a Ph.D. The doctoral gown may be trimmed down the front in black velvet or in the color that distinguishes the academic area in which the degree was earned.

The hoods are black, lined with the official color of the college or university conferring the degree. Harvard alumni would wear crimson, for instance, Yale dark blue, and Dartmouth dark green. Washington College is signified by maroon and black. The colored trimming indicates the academic subject. For instance, scarlet represents Theology, dark blue Philosophy, pink Music, and white the arts.

The chain is a symbol of presidential authority. The chain itself is sterling silver. The medallion that the chain supports is engraved with a portrait of William Smith, D.D., the first president of the College. The obverse of the medallion is engraved with the College seal. The links of the chain are engraved with the names of former presidents and their dates of tenure.

The mace, traditionally carried by the marshal of academic processions, is a symbol of the arts and sciences. In medieval days, it was first designed as a war club that could break through heavy armour.

The mace that is now used by Washington College was donated by Harry Powell Hopkins, the architect forBunting, Dunning, and Minta Martin Halls. The mace used before the present one was a wooden stick with a wooden knob.

The mace is worked with silver, and contains six garnets mounted in a circle around the head. Engravings of the seals of the College and of Kent County, a silhouette of George Washington, and Washington's coat of arms decorate the mace's head.

Blackwell: This year's Most Valuable?

Finish with 10-11 record

Cagers close season with double-overtime victory

by RICH SCHATZMAN
Sports Editor

The Washington College '79-80 basketball season concluded last Saturday night when the Shoremen came away with a 79-71 double overtime victory at Johns Hopkins University.

David Blackwell, who gets my vote for this season's most valuable player, led the scoring with 19 points, including seven in the second overtime period, as WC outscored the Blue Jays 13-5 in the last five-minute period. Craig Langwost had 18 and Joe Moye added 13 in the season-ending victory.

Although the result was satisfying, the Cagers struggled throughout the contest. Jim "Mr. Offense" Corey was ejected early in the first half, but the Shoremen still held a 39-29 halftime advantage. Hopkins came back early in the second half as the game developed into a real "barnburner." With three seconds left in regulation and the score tied, a Moye shot fell short at the buzzer, sending the game into overtime. Langwost missed a shot at the buzzer ending the first overtime, which forced the second overtime and the "David Blackwell Show."

WC finished this season with a 10-11 record, which is quite an accomplishment considering the youth of this year's squad. Coach Tom Finnegan is sitting on a gold mine if he can keep this team intact. There are no seniors on the team, therefore everyone could conceivably return to play next year. After just being nosed out of a play-off berth this year, the WC basketball picture appears to be a bright one.

"The Third Century Fund"

$10.25 million endowment campaign announced

by GEOFF GARINTHER
Editor-in-Chief

Saying that Washington "has not kept pace with many younger institutions in two respects—in terms of fame and money," Dr. Phillip J. Wingate last Saturday announced The Third Century Fund—a $10.25 million endowment campaign designed to bring the College both fame andmoney by 1982.

Wingate, General Chairman of the Bicentennial and a member of the Board of Visitors and Governors since 1963, said during his announcement at Convocation that the College already has $2.4 million "in hand or in firm commitments."

"A solid foundation"

"This campaign effort, the largest in the College's history, is being launched on the heels of six consecutive years of balanced budgets for Washington College," said Wingate in a prepared statement issued with the official announcement, "providing a solid foundation for this all-out effort to strengthen our academic programs and provide future financial security for the College on the eve of its Bicentennial year, 1981-82."

College President Joseph McLain, in the written announcement, stated, "Washington College has enjoyed a marvelous past but we must wisely and diligently plan for its future. Although we have lived within our budget for the past six years, we owe it to our students, and to future students, to strengthen our faculty and to enrich our overall academic programs offered in the liberal arts and sciences."

Four broad goals

The announcement outlined four categories of endowment goals:

• "Endowment is being sought to improve faculty compensation to a level which is more competitive with comparable colleges. Six endowed professorships are desirable to bring the number of endowed academic chairs at the College to ten. Funds are also needed to provide a greater range of academic enrichment opportunities for faculty to remain current in their fields and to explore related disciplines.

• "Washington College intends to increase its scholarship resources for needy and promising students from lower and middle income families and to reward outstanding students on the basis of academic merit. Inflation has substantially eroded the College's ability to provide all qualified and deserving students with adequate financial aid.

• "Two academic facilities, the Library and Computing Center, require additional revenues to meet the growing interest and anticipated needs of students and faculty in the 1980's. Endowment of these centers of learning will help the College face the rapidly rising cost of both operations. Although no expansion of the physical plant is planned, existing campus buildings and grounds need extensive annual maintenance and repair beyond current budget capability.

• "Planned enrichment of academic programs, both in and beyond the classroom, as well as improvement in the number and quality of cultural opportunities, exchange programs and work study internships also call for funding beyond current financial means."

Board Chairman Rob Roy called The Third Century Fund "a sensible undertaking, devoid of frills. Although no appreciable growth is anticipated in enrollment, faculty number, or physical plant, Washington aspires to grow in academic commitments and must do so with new-found means."

Board addresses student concerns

by GEOFF GARINTHER
Editor-in-Chief

A Report from the Student Affairs Committee at last Saturday's Board of Visitors and Governors meeting touched off a lively debate that ranged from student centers to student representation, and SGA President Jay Young says students came out on top on all counts.

In her Report on the Committee's February 16th meeting with several students, Chairperson Lynette Nielson said a lack of campus activities, attrition, falling admissions standards, and a lack of communication at all levels were among the problems discussed.

Concerning the problems with campus activities, Nielson recommended to the Board that "The area of the Bookstore be returned to the students, as it was formerly, provided a suitable place can be found for the Bookstore." The location of a student center was later referred to the Buildings and Grounds Committee.

Nielson also responded to the persistent SGA request for representation on the Board. "I would like to suggest that the opinion of the student representative be questioned," she said, calling on Young to summarize his view of the meeting between Board members and students.

Pool issue put to rest

In the discussion that followed Nielson's report, Board member James N. Juliana said "If these problems are as serious as the Report indicates, I think something should be initiated now.

"I for one will go on record that the Board should do so now."

The long-discussed issue of a College pool was also brought up, but was quickly "put to rest" by Board member William G. Russell.

"There is no way, under current finances, that we can afford a pool," said Russell, adding that initial costs would be $600,000 then $100,000 per year in maintenance. "You take that budget and tell me where you're going to find it (the money).

"I think the matter of a pool should be put to rest once and for all."

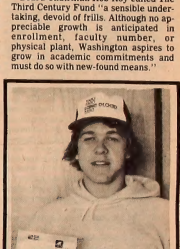
Nielson added that even students seemed to agree that a pool was not feasible, but were concerned with smaller scale improvements.

"Overwhelming recognition"

Young said he was "pleased—very, very pleased," by the Board's discussion.

"Their reaction, to us, was very favorable in that there was finally overwhelming recognition of the problems we've been trying to communicate to them all year.

"The thing that made me most happy was that three or four Board members said something in our favor, demanded prompt action, and even admitted that perhaps they were remiss in not taking action for so many years."



Young said he felt the Board addressed the issues of a student center and student representation most

Between pictures with President Joseph McLain (above) and State Comptroller Louis Goldstein and SGA President Jay Young (below), Governor Harry Hughes told the Elm he expects quick passage of the state bill that will provide the College with a loan for Hill Dorms renovation. He also expressed ambivalence toward a possible return to the draft: "I'd hate to see us go back to a peacetime draft, but I gather there is some concern about the readiness of our forces." Perry returns from Olympics

by JIM GRAHAM
Photography Editor

While many of us were glued to our TV sets last weekend watching the Winter Olympics, sophomore Chris Perry was there—up close and personal—in Lake Placid.

Perry saw several events, including the 90-meter ski jump, men's speed skating and the four-man bobsled, but it was the United States' victory over Russia in hockey he wanted to talk about.

"It was great. Everyone was going nuts when Mark Johnson tied it up with one second to go in the first period. That really broke the Russians' spirit. Jim Craig was outstanding—he made save after save. By the time the game was over I was drained. A friend of mine said he could hear the chants of 'u-s-a, u-s-a' up at the bobsled run, and that's 3 miles away.

"It was," said Perry, "the most intense thing I've ever done. It was the chance of a lifetime. I still haven't gotten over it. It's something I'll always remember."

Playing catch-up

Although some who attended last Saturday's Convocation may not have expected to hear a College Board member admit it, no one could have been very surprised by Phillip J. Wingate's announcement that Washington College has failed to keep up with many younger institutions in the acquisition of either fame or money.

Despite being the oldest chartered college in the state and the tenth oldest in the country, Washington College is neither well-known nor well-endowed. It has managed to survive through the years while reaping few of the benefits of age, and this remains its most noteworthy claim-it is indeed a very old college.

So the College is embarking on a $10.25 million endowment campaign. But as welcome and necessary as that campiagn is, it relies too much on simply continuing the Washington College tradition: Existing facilities and academic programs will be upgraded, and faculty salaries will catch up with those at comparable schools. Even current projects—Hill Dorms renovation and Kent House boiler replacement— aim only to maintain what is already here. The College seems to be aspiring no higher than to recoup its losses.

Nowhere is there any talk of building—literally or figuratively—for the future. Washington College has become so obssessed with its 200-year tradition that it cannot—or will not—look ahead, at least beyond 1982.

Where does the responsibility for this shortsightedness lie? The Board of Visitors and Governors in the past few months has demonstrated both a willingness and an ability to meet problems head-on, suggesting that the fault lies with the administration of the College.

That administration's satisfaction with doing no more than rest on the laurels of the College's past will get us no further than the Bicentennial Celebration. What this attitude will mean for Washington College ten years from now, or even sooner, has evidently been given little consideration.

Apology offered by the representatives...

Our apologies. As the representatives of the senior class on this year's Honorary Degrees Committee, we feel that we have failed to properly represent the views of the students with regard to the choice of this year's commencement speaker. However, we would like to make the following points:

Our initial input as student representatives was significant, and we would like to thank Dr. McLain and the faculty and the Board members who sat on this committee for listening to our views. The prime candidate for the 1980 commencement address, George F. Will, was strongly supported by both of us and by the students we consulted. As members of the committee we were asked the students' view of Will, and were allowed to speak at length, ask questions and engage in discussions on the matter. The alternative candidate, Dr. Carl Sagan, was initially proposed by us for an honorary degree at commencement. Not only did th.e committee approve our request, but it went on to name Dr. Sagan as second choice for commencement speaker. In both cases the views of the senior class were heard and discussed.

But the commencement speaker will be neither George Will nor Carl Sagan. Mr. Will cannot attend and Dr. Sagan could not be reached. Instead, Dr. Henry Wagner, professor of Nuclear Medicine at Johns Hopkins, will make the address at the 1980 commencement ceremony. We feel that Dr. McLain probably made a fine choice; Dr. Wagner's achievements in science and his professorship at one of America's leading academic institutions, as well as his connections with Washington College, make him, as far as we know, a perfectly appropriate speaker. However, we do regret the circumstances which necessitated the manner in which Dr. Wagner was chosen. A brief description of the highlights of the third meeting of the committee demonstrates our point.

At the beginning of the meeting, we were asked to approve Dr. Wagner as commencement speaker. We were informed that he had already been invited and had accepted. His credentials were mentioned briefly, and we were asked to vote. At this point we inquired about Will and Sagan, and were told that the former would be in Spain, the latter could not be reached, historian C. Van Woodward had been asked and declined, and Dr. Wagner had been asked and had accepted. We then suggested the possibility of reconsidering the decision so that other candidates might be considered, but were told that there was not enough time. Believing Dr. Wagner to be appropriate, yet not knowing enough about him or being able to suggest an alternative, we abstained.

We understand that Dr. McLain was acting in the best interests of the college; we are fortunate to get an apparently qualified speaker on such short notice,and Dr. McLain's work is to be commended. It should also be noted that he agreed to our suggestion of allowing next year's senior class to be represented at committee meetings which involve the 1981 commencement address. However, we regret that the views of the class of 1980 were not considered regarding the choice of Dr. Wagner (We were not asked to submit a candidate after Will and Sagan declined. We did not find out that these two were no longer candidates until after Dr. Wagner had been approached and had accepted. We were told that there was too little time for us to suggest an alternative. Our apologies to the senior class for not adequately representing its views.

Sincerely,
Steve Kinlock
Claire Mowbray
(Honorary Degrees Committee)

P.S. In a meeting with Dr. McLain after this letter had already been written, Steve Kinlock was informed that representatives of the Junior Class (not yet chosen for the Committee) will be invited to the next meeting of the Honorary Degrees Committee on April 19th. Plans for next year's speaker will be begun this spring, instead of next fall, and next year's graduating class will have a hand in choosing its own commencement speaker. It is too late for us, but for the class of 1981, and for succeeding classes, we sincerely hope this problem has been solved.

...And requested from the President

I've had it! As the letter from Steve Kinlock and Claire Mowbray reports, student opinion has once more been ignored by Dr. McLain and others in the College's Administration. At most colleges it is the responsibility of the senior class to select a commencement speaker and arrange for that person to come to campus and give his or her talk. But that is not the case here at Washington College. No, here at "old" WC the students are such "children" that the Administration feels that it must, for the good of the College, take the control of commencement out of the immature hands of the participants.

Well, I am not a child and I do not think that my fellow seniors are either. It is bad enough that the Administration has an influential voice in the preparations for our graduation, but the way in which it dominates the process is simply insulting. I have always been told that graduation is supposed to be a formal recognition of the accomplishments of the graduates. At WC it now appears that commencement is for the Administration and its guests instead of being for the graduates.

Remember, not only was the commencement speaker selected by Dr. McLain, but (as the Elm reported on January 25th) even the date of graduation was selected not to the accommodate the seniors but to fit the schedule of an honorary degree recipient.

Dr. McLain claims that he had to act on his own after George Will declined, Carl Sagan did not respond and time began running out. I would like to point out to our "dear" President that both Mr. Kinlock and Ms. Mowbray live on campus and he could easily have asked them to meet with him and consider other possibe candidates. Instead of following this reasonable course, Dr. McLain decided that he knew just the man to speak. I do not want to denigrate Dr. Henry Wagner, he may have been the best speaker available, but it was not Dr. McLain's role to determine that without consulting the representatives of the senior class. Mr. Kinlock and Ms. Mowbray have nothing to apologize for, they were presented with a fait accompli and they abstained during the vote to accept Dr. Wagner, which is about all they could do. Dr. McLain, however, does have something to apologize for, he should never have arranged for a commencement speaker without considering the wishes of the graduating seniors as expressed by our representatives on the Honorary Degrees Committee. Dr. McLain's actions have dampened the excitement with which many of us have looked forward to commencement and he should apologize for doing so.

SGA commends Board of Visitors and Governors

In my last letter I spoke of the need to give credit where credit is due, to look into a situation with weak situation and recognize and commend those deserving. The purpose of this letter is to recognize and commend the visitors and Governors of Washington College.

Last semester the S.G.A. devoted a great deal of its energies to promoting an awareness of the problems and perceived plaguing Washington College.

When reduced to simplest form, the problems consisted of low faculty salaries and low quality and quantity of students, due primarily to lack of facilities and a severe lack of communication between every division of the school, especially between students and the Board. We called on the Board to recognize the problems and take immediate action to correct them. Events of the past several weeks convince me that the Board is committed to that end.

Upon the initiation of its Chairperson, Mrs. Lynette Nielson, the Board Committee on Student Affairs requested a meeting of student leaders to discuss the problems of Washington College as perceived by students. In that meeting students quite openly and with candid detail presented our view. In summary, we spoke of problems of faculty morale resulting from pay disputes and frustrated attempts to communicate with the Administration, a lack of leadership and direction in the college, declining quality and quantity of students, the need for expanded facilities, and improvement of communication in all areas of the college. Our comments were well received by the committee and were answered with a promise that they would be communicated to the Board as a whole. After the meeting, the committee members inspected the basement of Hodson Hall to determine the feasability of establishing a student center there.

At the Board meeting of Feb. 23 Mrs. Nielson repeated the concerns we expressed the previous week and accompanied them with "a strong recommendation as Chairman of the Committee on Student Affairs" that the coffee house be expanded to better meet the needs of the students and that the Bookstore be returned to the Students for use as a Student Center. She further recommended that students be given the opportunity to make their concerns known to the Board directly by allowing a representative non-voting membership. Following that committee report several Board members voiced their agreement with Mrs. Nielson's recommendations and demanded that action be taken. At that point in the meeting, Mrs. Nielson asked that the Board allow the student representative a chance to speak. For the first time in recent S.G.S. history, a student representative was permitted to address the Board as a whole and communicate student feelings.

By these actions the Board of Visitors and Governors has clearly demonstrated its concern for the welfare of the College. For this we commend and thank them. We as students must continue to feed this concern by fostering an awareness of the problems.

Hughes' speech highlights Convocation

by PETE TURCHI
News Editor

A speech by Maryland Governor Harry R. Hughes was the highlight of Washington's Birthday Convocation held in Tawes Theatre last Saturday afternoon.

Approximately 200 people in the audience, along with one personal security agent lurking in a dark doorway, watched as over half of the College faculty entered to "The Earle of Oxfords Marche," rendered on the harpsichord by Assistant Professor of Music Kathleen Mills. The faculty members, with various degrees of solemnity, took their reserved seats, which were directly behind the three (empty) rows reserved for various members of the press.

Reverend William M. Hargett, Rector of St. Paul's Episcopal Church in Centreville, gave a blessing, after which eighteen chorus members offered up "The Silver Swan" and "Fammi una Canzonetta," with the best of intentions and no little success. Washington College President Joseph McLain then introduced the Governor as a man with a "good sense of humor," as well as various other pleasant attributes.

Hughes said that his speech was in large part taken straight from a speech he had given in the Maryland General Assembly in 1957. He began by commenting on the "wisdom and advice" of George Washington, after which he said, "It is to the great credit of this college that it has maintained over the two centuries of its existence a level of excellence that is worthy of itsillustrious namesake...I don't want to be flippant, but sometimes I wish I could invoke Washington's ghost in the debate in our General Assembly over my proposal for locating a new prison or finding disposal sites for hazardous waste."

He went on to say that Washington, as a politican, often warned against excessive party spirit; Hughes said that the crowd should be especially conscious of that belief in this, an election year. In discussing the plight of private academic institutions he said that, "As we consider state policy for higher education the needs of the private sector will be in my mind." After listing some of the advantages of private schools he said at, "Washington College is a prime example of just such a small liberal arts college that offers academic excellence in a rural, small-town environment."

Hughes went on to speak in detail about state legislation pertaining to higher level education and said that Washington is receiving $329,000 in state funds this year and will receive $354,000 in fiscal 1981. Hughes drew his speech to a close by saying that only nine other schools in the country canclaim to match the College's longevity, "and only one or two can claim to be as excellent."

McLain then presented Hughes with the Washington College Award for Excellence, which consists of a scroll, a plaque, and a ten-ounce sterling silber medaivalued at over $500, and is given at times when "an honorary degree would not be appropriate." According to McLain the award had been given only three times previously: "to the painter Andrew Wyeth, to the distinguished author James Cheser, and to Dr. Helen B. Taussig, who had the blue baby invention." In his modest acceptance speech Hughes said that he didn't know if he should be placed in such good company, "but at least Washington College got three out of four right."

Reverend Hargett capped everything with a Benediction, after which the faculty, in true rented-robe splendor, strode up the aisle to "The Old Spagnoletta." Outside the sun washing briefly, and the lacrosse team could be seen jogging out to meet The Crease, a club from Baltimore—all in all, it had been a beautiful day for a convocation.

Setting the Republican record straight

I would like to reply to John Wharton's Commentary, "The Great Paraphernalia Ban: Whodunit?" which appeared in the February 22 edition of the Elm. Mr. Wharton deserves credit for the creativity and imagination which pervaded his comments. I got a kick out of reading it, and Mr. Wharton certainly deserves one too. Mr. Wharton is entitled to his opinions regarding the paraphernalia issue, and I respect them, but he also made some remarks concerning the College Republicans which deserve clarifications.

Yes, the College Republicans' newsletter is financed by the SGA. However the organization is recognized by Washington College and the SGA as a legitimate and viable club open to all students who wish to join. In order to obtain such financing, the CRs had to go through the same SGA screening process as any other organization on campus, whether it was the William James Forum or the King Crab. The SGA and its Treasurer allot funds with scrutiny and in a conscientious manner. Mr. Wharton, or any other group of students, has an equal opportunity to organize an opposition club on campus, and to apply for SGA funds. It is, therefore, an insult to the College Republicans, and to the Washington College SGA, to imply that funds were obtained in a "Sleezy" manner.

It is repugnant to "convict" anyone of being a College Republican merely because they were asked to/and wrote an article for that group's newsletter. Are we therefore to assume, using the perverted logic of Mr. Wharton, that he, as well as I, are membersof the Elm staff, and share its editorial views? That certainly is bullshit. The author who wrote to keep the paraphernalia in the Bookstore is not a College Republican, not even a Republican, and does not necessarily share the editorial opinions of the College Republicans. He was simply asked to write an opposing arguement.

The College Republicans' newsletter is not "straight propaganda." It is provided to the college community as a source of information on College Republican activities, and on the Republican Party, as well as a forum for student opinion. The newsletter provides club members an opportunity to express their political and social opinions, much the same way as Mr. Wharton used the Elm to express his. Anyone who was inclined to read the College Republican newsletter in November noticed that the Paraphernalia 'Debate provided two opposing opinions. That certainly cannot be called propaganda.

As far as squandering "student activity funds on trashy propaganda," why hasn't Mr. Wharton yet responded to the propaganda campaign of the PLO here at Washington College last week? Certainly the William James Forum can likewise be accused of squandering student activity funds that it sleezed out of the SGA to "present a persuasive argument," according to the Elm, for the PLO's terrorist activities. Additionally, the Forum has not, and to the best of my knowledge, does not intend to present theopposing viewpoint for public debate.

Is it really so palpable that students who are in the future of our lives and our country become active in political campaigns? Should students be prohibited from working in political campaigns because one or more students have differing opinions and choices for President? College Republicans do not receive any funds from the SGA to campaign for any candidate, either on or off campus. In the February newsletter, the College Republicans did publish articles on the four Republican Presidential frontrunners, but endorsed none. As a partisan organization, and considering the nature of the Primary elections as infra-party struggle, they cannot be considered an abuse of SGA funds. Incidently, the Republican National Convention will be held in Detroit, and not Chicago as Mr. Wharton so incorrectly stated.

As Stated before, there is equal opportunity for the formation of a College Democrats club on campus, if anyone is interested enough and wishes to. The College Republicans have not "deprived WC\ students of...activity funds as completely as possible."

I certainly hope that my opinions will receive the same amount of respect from Mr. Wharton and others, as I have given his. Everyone is entitled to their opinions, no matter how different. It would be unfair, to say the least, to stifle the publication of responsible student opinion in the College Republican newsletter merely because there is no one else interested, willing, nor able to produce a publication with an opposing viewpoint.

Shame on you

Dear Washington College Fraternities,

Would you care to explain your actions as a group on the afternoon of Friday, February 22, 1980, 1:30p.m.? I am referring to the episode in which a certain young man was in particular, verbally harrassed, if not publically embarrassed. I would like to know, also, what a certain arabic apparition in the crowd had to do with the so very carefully planned group activity with respect to the young man. Do you, yourselves know?

"The Bald Soprano" playing this weekend

WC News Bureau

The Washington College drama department will present The Bald Soprano by Eugene Ionesco on four nights, Thursday February 28 through Sunday, March 2. The play, directed by Timothy B. Maloney, will be presented at 8 p.m. each night in the basement of the Daniel Z. Gibson Fine Arts Center on the Washington college campus.

Since its first production in Paris in 1950, The Bald Soprano has been regarded as one of the prime examples of absurdist drama. Ionesco is still viewed as one of the leading exponents of experimental theatre.

Set in the comfortable suburbs of London, the play presents a bizarre and wildly humorous demonstration of the banality of language made up of clinches and ready-made phrases which dominate the conversation of two middle class couples, a maid, and a fire chief.

The stage manager for the production is Larry Stahl. The cast includes Sally McKenzie as Mrs. Smith, John Williams as Mr. Smith, Beth Church as Mrs. Martin, Steve Gaul as Mr. Martin, Virginia White as Mary, and Steve Mumford as the fire chief.

Reservations may be made by calling the box office at 778-2800, ext. 268.

30-50 patients a day

Worst of flu season is over, says Health Service

by GINGER KURAPKA

The flu has hit Washington College, and for the third week students and professors have been fighting fever, nausea, and various aches and pains.

"This is usually the time when we see all this business," said Doctor Gottfried Baumann. "The College population is usually a prime target," for an epidemic. "Young people feel they can have a virus and still do everything."

According to Nurse Betty Schauber, the worst is pretty much over. "For two weeks we say between 30 and 50 people a day. There were quite a few students, 10 to 15 a day, missing class." Now, however, there are only a few people, "lingering with bronchitis," she said.

"There are usually only 2 or 3 students missing class," said Assistant to the Registrar Joan Forbes, but on several days during the last two weeks more than 30 students have turned in absentee slips.

Professors don't seem to have been hit as badly as the students. Since February 11, only five have been out, said Forbes.

Two years ago the flu epidemic was widespread enough to warrant the cancellation of classes. "There were so many faculty members and students who were so ill. Even if they weren't ill, they were so far behind (in work) it seemed to be a good idea to close," said Schauber. There was, "never any serious talk," about closing school this year, however, contrary to rumor.

In treating the disease, Baumann said, "There's not much we can do from a purely medical or therapeutic point of view. Antibiotics treat bactirial complications, not the virus itself. The body's own defenses have to be left to take care of it.

"The Food Service has been very helpful this year, in keeping the juice machines open (for) all three meals and in allowing students to take liquids back to the dorm," added Schauber.

Baumann concluded, "Ultimately the chicken soup bit and bed rest are the best solution."

Will, Sagan unavailable

Wagner will be Commencement Speaker

by KATHY STRECKFUS
Assistant Editor

Dr. Henry Nicholas Wagner, Director of Nuclear Medicine and Radiation Health services at Johns Hopkins University and Hospital, has accepted an invitation to speak at Washington College's 1980 Commencement—a development that has met with controversy among members of the senior class.

Seniors Claire Mowbray and Steve Kinlock, student representatives to the Honorary Degrees Committee, had suggested that the College invited either astronomer Carl Sagan or columnist George Will to speak at the Commencement.

President of the College Dr. Joseph McLain invited Wagner after Will declined the invitation and Sagan did not respond.

McLain said, "Wagner has taken a tremendous interest in Washington College and its students, and he is internationally known.

"About five years ago, he contacted me from his summer home in Crumpton and said he was interested in Washington College and would like to help."

According to McLain, within two weeks Wagner had arranged a workTudy program for pre-med students with four hospitals, including St. Joseph Hospital, Johns Hopkins Hospital, Anne Arundel General Hospital and Kent and Queen Anne's Hospital. Each of the four students who participated in the program worked at each of the hospitals for one week during the break between semesters. Through the four weeks, Wagner held a seminar with the students each Friday night.

Wagner received a degree from Johns Hopkins Medical School in 1952. He interned at Hopkins from 1952-53, and was Assistant Resident in Internal Medicine from 1953-55. From 1955-57, he worked for the National Institute for Health, and in 1958 he worked at Hammersmith Hospital in England. He was Resident at Hopkins from 1958-59, and since then, has been on the Hopkins faculty.

Wagner published a textbook titled Principles of Nuclear Medicine in 1968. According to McLain, it is the most widely used text on nuclear medicine in the world.

Wagner has received the Hevesy Award from the Society of Nuclear Medicine, a European organization, for his research in the field of nuclear medicine. He has also received awards from the Indian Society of Nuclear Medicine and the Japanese Society of Nuclear Medicine.

SAB plans mini-courses for after Spring Break

The Student Academic Board is planning a series of mini-courses on subjects of practical interest for WC students. These courses will be held on weeknights or weekends beginning after Spring Break and will cover such topics as photography and bartending. The instructors are WC students and residents of Chestertown. The SAB needs to get some idea of how much interest there is in these courses and would appreciate it if every student would visit the Student Affairs office and indicate if they are interested in any of the five proposed courses by signing a poster that will be in that office on Monday. The students who sign up for a course are not obliged to attend; the SAB simply wants some idea of how many students are interested in each proposed course.

Stating that an understanding of the Board's role in both issues was necessary, Young said, "Their responsibility doesn't lie with the specifics of a student center; it lies with the authorization. (But) they're done more than authorize a student center—they've made a commitment to it."

Young also said that Nielson's request to hear his opinion on the meeting indicates a willingness by the Board to provide for greater communication with students.

"In discussions with other Board members throughout the day, I would conclude that there is quite a bit of sentiment for our request (for greater representation)."

SAB asks greater student role in speaker selection

by GEOFF GARINTHER
Editor- in - Chief

In the wake of the controversial selection of Dr. Henry Wagner of Johns Hopkins as this year's Commencement speaker, the Student Academic Board and the senior class officers have recommended to the Honorary Degrees Committee that selection of the Commencement speakers become solely the responsibility of the senior class.

Wagner, Director of Nuclear Medicine and Radiation Health Services at Johns Hopkins University and Hospital, was selected by College President Joseph McLain after both Committee suggestions, columnist George Will and astronomer Carl Sagan, became unavailable.

"It was supposed to be a committee decision," said SAB President Paul Drinks, "but when the choices that were put forth by the Committee turned out not to be available, (McLain) just acted on his own."

The SAB subsequently sent a questionnaire to all graduating seniors to gauge student opinion on this year's choice and on the role of the class in the selection process.

"Just about all said they didn't aggree with McLain's action, and most said it made a differnece to them who the speaker was," said Drinks, who received responses from about one-third of the class. "And just about everyone felt that the senior class should have more say in the choice."

The SAB and senior class recommendation also stipulated that the Committee should reserve the right to withhold an honorary degree or special award without affecting the senior class's choice of a speaker.

Said Drinks: "The feeling I have is that it's the seniors' show, and they should be able to have whoever they want speak to them."

College responsible for Spring Break thefts, says student

by SUE JAMES

The thefts that occurred on campus over Spring Break may have resulted from faulty locks, and, in at least one case, a student says the College is responsible.

The problem of faulty locks in Worcester Hall was reported to the Student Affaris Office and the Maintenance Department before Spring Break, according to Howard Hecht, one of the victims of the theft. The locks were not changed, however, and as a result, Hecht's stereo equipment, worth approximately $2000, was stolen over Spring Break.

Hecht said, "The cylinders in the locks are so worn through that all the keys fit into almost all the locks."

Resident Assistant Bernie Kelley reported the problem of faulty locks after Hecht's electric typewriter and four checks belonging to his roommate, Russ Schilling, were stolen in February.

Hecht said his insurance company "will get the police report, then they may take action against the school".

"I'd be willing to pay $20 for the lock," Hecht said "because I just lost $2000 worth of equipment."

Jake Parr, resident assistant of Dorcester House, returned from Florida Tuesday to discover that his stereo receiver, tape deck and turntable were missing from his room. There was also a large hole in the wall separating his room from Bruce Caslow's, where a lock had apparently been picked.

Parr said that he believed the school should make an investment in new locks for the rooms, since either someone had a master key or the quality of the locks is poor enough to invite "lock-pickers." He has notified local authorities of the crime and it is currently under investigation.

The Richmond House Horror: "For God's Sake, Get Out"

The residents there are saying that their building is slowly falling apart

by BILL MORTIMER

Strange things have been happening in Richmond House of late, and none of the five writers in residence there is quite sure what to do about it. "Our next step" said Kirk Folk, "is to call in an exorcist."

Unlike the house with the starring role in The Amityville Horror, Richmond House is merely suffering from old age and lack of maintenance. All around there are things that go bump in the night—and sometimes in the morning as well. This week, part of the plaster from the ceiling over the stairway leading to the second floor collapsed.

About a month ago, Kathy Streckfus' bedroom ceiling, or at least four feet of the plaster from it, fell in and woke her up. "It fell in large, heavy chunks," she said, " and if they had fallen on me, I would have been seriously hurt." She added, however, that Maintenance quickly fixed the ceiling, although it was only done with a piece of plywood.

When Lee Ann Chearneyi arrived this past August she found "about half of the kitchen ceiling hanging down". Again, maintenance covered it up with plywood.

"The theory of fixing this place is to wait until things fall down and then cover them up," noted Claire Mowbray. All five writers feel that if maintenance had been kept up, they wouldn't be having the current problems. There are other problems.

Termites and mice are also living in the writer's haven. "My walls look like a cardboard because of the termites" said Nick Nappo. The front porch needs support as well. The entire porch needs support as well. The entire porch is rotting away as are the pillars supporting the second floor porch. If nothing is done about it, the entire facade of Richmond House could collapse. With it would go three of the five bedrooms. "The thing is that if the house goes you know there's not going to be another Writer's Union)," said Mowbray.

Richmond House residents are now planning their course of action. They say that they will first talk to Bob Day and see what he has to say. From there, they will go to the "Higherups". Their first hope is to see the house painted. "It looks like a slum from the outside" said Chearneyi.

To justify their cause, they note that the Creative Writing program pulls many students to the College. "How can they (the administration) justify the presence of the Creative Writing program without having the facilities?" asked one.

Part of their solution is not for the five writers to move out of Richmond House, nor is that what they want. "We're not complaining about living here," Nowbray said, "but that the administration is allowing this to happen to Richmond House. If they don't do something about it, they may have a lawsuit on their hands."

In the meantime, Nappo says "we're renaming it Maconde."

Students come to the fore

We've been less than hesitant to criticize the administration in recent months; the student body, on the other hand, has gone largely unscathed. That imbalance seems especially unfair now in light of some of this year's developments:

•Less than a third of the senior class responded three weeks ago to a Student Academic Board questionnaire that dealt exclusively with issues concerning every member of that class (see the page 1 story).

•The editors of the Washington College Review in this issue ask not for student support in producing the WCR, but only that students bother to read it after its publication.

•Applications for editorships of next year's Elm and Pegasus are being solicited this week. Although the yearbook will probably attract at least one applicant, we know of no one who will be here next year who has any particular interest in or qualifications for editing the newspaper.

•The student body seems indifferent toward the Student Government Association's most significant accomplishments this year. The SGA recommended for their eleventh-hour acquisition of Freewater when the band was in town for a night early this semester, but little enthusiasm has been aroused by their attempts to gain greater representation to the Board of Visitors and Governors, to acquire what have been called "greater facilities" (a student center, for example), and to improve the academic quality of the school.

It's a trite subject, but apathy has undeniably become a trait of Washington College students. The bright side of this subject, however, is that it's not an incurable malady. Any lacrosse game proves that.

WCR: helping the environment to thrive

We, the Editors of the Washington College Review support wholeheartedly the creative and academic interests of students at the college. The Review in fact, is designed as a show case of student and faculty poetry, prose, and art work. It is the tangible reality of the ambitions, the hard work, and the artistic striving of those whose work is published. Its significance is not to be taken lightly. Submissions are now being accepted for the Senior Issue. The deadline is March 30. The issue will contain what we feel to be the example of the best creative works of the Senior class. All Seniors are encouraged to submit.

The Spring Issue of the WCR is now in the making. We hope that upon its arrival on campus, it will be received and read by all students with a sense of appreciation for the literacy and academic explorations of the writers and artists whose works are included. The academic environment, and all publications such as the WCR which spring from it, should be foremost in the life of the college. We, as Editors of the Washington College Review are doing our best to help this environment to thrive. We write this letter in order to better inform students of the presence and purpose of our magazine and hope that through it they will become interested in and excited by the Washington College Review.

Sociology Survey delayed

Last semester, about one-hundred students at the College took the time to complete a survey of their attitudes and behaviors administered by my students in So421: Social Research Techniques. In the cover letter accompanying that survey, we promised to let people know about our findings. As it turns, out, we can't yet provide any substantive information.

Coding the data on the surveys so that they could be analyzed took far more time than I had allotted, and we ended the semester with the process incomplete. This research has not been abandoned. I shall be teaching So421 again next Fall. While last semester's version was mainly concerned with data gathering, next semester's course will concentrate on data analysis. Using the new Prime 550 computer, we will be able to search for relationships among the responses to the various questions in the survey with relative ease.

I invite interested students who have had a previous course in social research methods to join us in the analysis process. By the way, no prior computer experience will be required.

I want to thank those people who cooperated with my students last semester. We will share the results of our analyses as we complete them next Fall.

Sincerely,
Steven Cades

Registration proposal in trouble in Congress

Chronical of Higher Education

The Administration's bill requesting authority to register women was defeated by an 8-to-1 vote in the House Subcommittee on Military Personnel. Only Rep. Antonio B. Won Pat, the Democratic delegate from Guam, voted for the measure.

No further House action will be taken on the controversial proposal, unless the full Armed Services Committee votes unanimously to resurrect it. Committee aides said such a move was unlikely.

The defeat of the proposal to register women does not affect President Carter's call for the registration of men, which he can order under existing law.

However, it is not certain that Congress will provide the additional money the Selective Service needs to carry out the task.

The Senate appropriations subcommittee with jurisdiction over such funds began hearings on the question last week. Several Senators questioned whether registration was necessary now.

A House appropriations subcommittee has already turned down the President's appropriation request, although the bill was not killed.

President Carter asked Congress for an additional $20.5-million in the current fiscal year to register both men and women but the House subcommittee refused to provide even the $12.3-million that would be needed to register men.

The subcommittee sent the measure on to the full Appropriations Committee, recommending that $4.8-million be appropriated--just enough to allow the Selective Service to improve its capacity to carry out registration sometime in the future.

Rally against draft scheduled for tomorrow in DC

National Mobilization Against the Draft

Tomorrow's National Mobilization against the Draft (M.A.D) has announced plans to bring thousands of people from all walks of life to the Capital for a nationwide march and rally against registration and the draft. Michael Harrington, a spokesperson for M.A.D and chair of the Democratic Socialist Organizing Committee, said "A broad coalition—the left and the right, women's groups, minority organizations, labor unions and peace organizations—will fight the Carter registration proposal. The important thing is that we are all in agreement on the issue of registration. Military intervention an inappropriate response to a crisis ten thousand miles away," he added.

In a press conference at the East Lounge of the National Press Club on February 14, representatives of M.A.D. spoke to a large gathering of media people. Frank Jackalone of the United States Student Association said, "Carter is making the biggest mistake of his career in pushing his registration proposal. This is an overreaction and will lead to another war and possibly annihilation of the world." The U.S.S.A., which represents over three million college students, has pledged to bring its message against registration and the draft to campuses across the country. Already hundreds of demonstrations and teach-ins have taken place at colleges and in communities throughout the United States.

"M.A.D. is a coalition of many groups already working against registration and the draft," project coordinator Patrick Lacefield said. "We plan to make this election year a political quagmire for anyone taking the view that registration is the answer," Lacefield said. "If Carter is concerned about overreaction, he hasn't seen anything yet."

"Just as the movement of the 1960s and early 1970s said 'no' to President Johnson and Nixon on the draft and an interventionist foreign policy, so too the movement of the 1980s is turning thumbs down on President Carter's proposal for draft registration," explained Lacefield.

The March 22 action will begin around 12 noon with people gathering at the Ellipse in Washington before marching past the White House to a rally on the steps of the Capitol with prominent speakers and music. This mass nonviolent rally will be corrdinated with a mass lobby of Congress on the following Monday, March 24, coordinated by the Committee Against Registration and the Draft (CARD) and the Coalition for a New Foreign and Military Policy among others.

"President Carter came into office with a bible in his hand and now has a neutron bomb in his hand," said Washington, DC Councilperson Hilda Mason, in endorsing the March 22 action. "We can have no more Vietnams and corporate profiteering. Our concerns must be human concerns - housing, food health and jobs," she added.

Cooperating with the March 22 Mobilization is the Committee Against Registration and the Draft which represent over thirty organizations. Rev. Barry Lynn of the United Church of Christ, chair and spokesperson of CARD, believes the Carter registration proposal can be stopped. "This is a violation of traditional civil rights and civil liberties," he stated. "We will work to inform people about the issue and keep people in touch with the legislative process."

Retention Committee reports on attrition

by MIKE GARVEY

"Reducing the Dropout Rate" was the title of a conference attended recently by four college administrators. Director of Admissions Mickey DiMaggio and Associate Director Jody Dudderar, and Deans of Students Maureen Kelley and Ed Maxcy represented WC at the conference, which was sponsored by the American College Testing Program. Of seventy-five colleges and universities represented at the conference, held February 14 and 15 in Washington, D.C., WC and the University of Maryland were the only institutions from this state present.

Maxcy appeared optimistic about applying what was learned at the meeting to the continuing struggle against attrition here. He said that the most significant idea proposed at the meeting is the need for an institution to ascertain a "clear sense of mission" for itself. This mission should be described in a written statement so that prospective students can know more clearly what to expect and what will be expected from them at a particular institution. "That may just be common sense," Maxcy said, "but it's something that too many people take for granted. One concern shared (at the meeting) was that students get to a college or university and don't feel that they fit in. We have to investigate at Washington College exactly what we are as an institution and what students will fit in."

To apply the results of the conference to the rentention strategy here, an ad hoc Committee has been organized. This committee, consisting of principle administrators as well as students and two faculty members is led by Dean of the College Garry Clarke. The Committee presented a report of its investigation to the Board at its meeting February 23, listing several reasons for attrition here:

- The student has accomplished the desired goals that brought him to the institution in the first place.
- The student leaves the institution for financial reasons
- The academic program is too difficult
- The student is bored by College
- The student does not receive the psychological support of friends and parents
- There are better educational opportunities to be found elsewhere. As examples, the student may feel that the college curriculum is too narrow or may find that a desired major field is either too narrow is not offered at all.
- The student can discover more satisfactory ways of maturing, and these may have nothing to do with a college education.

According to the committee, it is very often a combination of factors that causes a student's departure from college.

Seventy-two students left the College at the end of the 1979 fall semester, 19 through graduation and 18 due to academic dismissal. The remainder left for a variety of reasons ranging from dissatisfaction with the academic program to medical and personal problems. Two students who received academic dismissal as well as those with medical or personal problems will return to the College at a later date.

Newspaper in danger next year

by FREEMAN DODSWORTH

The Washington College Board of Publications announced this week that it is accepting applications for editorships of the Elm and the Pegasus for 1980-81 but, at least for the Elm, those involved say there are problems this year that the Board has not faced since the fall of 1975.

Although the job is open to anyone on campus, it is usually given to a subordinate member of the Elm staff, says current editor Geoff Garinther.

"The difference between the jobs of, say, SGA president and editor of a newspaper" he said, "is that an SGA president can get by on enthusiasm and ideas,whereas to edit the newspaper requires some technical knowledge, and experience."

But of the people at the College with that experience, none will be here next year to take over when Garinther resigns in May. And so far, he says, there is no one else in sight. "I can't see anyone from outside the paper coming in, so as things stand, I'd say there probably will be Elm next year."

Loss of the Elm would not be a new experience to Washington College. As recent as four years ago, the paper's production was suspended due to lack of an editor. "The organization of the Elm is fairly thin," says Rich DeProspo, faculty advisor to the paper. "It's been more or less a one-person operation." He feels, however, that the responsibility for finding a new editor does not lie in the hands of the Board of Publications. "The Elm, "he says, "is something that (the students) take for granted, and it is in serious jeopardy for next year. The responsibility for preventing another lapse must lie with the students."

The reason for the problem this year, according to Garinther, is "a combination fo our drop to four pages, which caused a need for less people, and the fact that the paper has been taken for granted since it returned four years ago," adding that a year without a paper may spark some interest among students.

Applications accepted

Board of Publications is soliciting applications for editorships of the Elm and Pegasus for 1980-81.

Applications should consist of a resume listing qualifications and experience and a statement of why the applicant wants the position and how he/she would undertake it.

Applications should be submitted to Prof. Taylor, 6 rguson Hall, by March 31, and should be typewritten.

PACE enrolls 100 this semester

by FREEMAN DODSWORTH

The Washington College Program for Adult Continuing Education, (PACE), begins its second semester this week on a positive note, according to Ann Hoon, Director of Continuing Education here. Of ten courses originally offered, only three have had to be closed due to lack of enrollment, an achievment far surpassing the weak start the program made last Fall.

Hoon says that she is very pleased with the program this semester, with enrollments more than double that of PACE's first semester. "All told", says Hoon, "we probably have close to a hundred people enrolled now, with some of them commuting from as far as an hour away. We're very pleased." Although the College did not technically lose money on the program last semester, it received only enough to pay the professors for their time, leaving little or none for publicity. But this semester they are able to pay for the production of pamphlets and other informational material as well as paying the professors.

Some of the more popular courses offered this spring include Yoga and Aerobic dance, as well as courses in money Management and American furniture. "Many of the teachers won't even accept money for the classes," she says. "It's good for them, as well as us. It's really a public and community relations program."

Two students, tennis team in car accidents

by SUE JAMES

Senior John Wharton was listed in "improving critical condition" with a collapsed lung at University Hospital in Baltimore after his car reportedly flipped over early Tuesday morning on route 301.

Details on injuries to the passenger in the car, freshman Gervaise Feeley, were unavailable Tuesday night.

Members of the women's tennis team were also involved in a car accident. During the team's trip to Florida over Spring Break a car containing Coach Penny Fall, Millicent Wetherhold, Tammy Wolf, and Barb Powers received "extensive damage" said Fall, but she would not comment further on the accident. No one was injured.

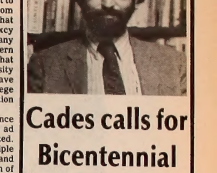
Rotary Club gives leadership gift

WC News Bureau

Washington College has received a leadership gift of $2,500 toward the Third Century Fund endowment campaign from the Rotary Club of Chestertown. The gift established the Paul Emerson Titsworth Fund for annual book purchases for the Library. Reade W. Corr, representing the Rotary Club, presented the check at the Club's February 25th meeting to George Hayward, Vice President for Development at the College.

Hayward said, "In its generosity toward Washington College, the Rotary Club has honored well its former member and first president. Your gift of the Paul Emerson Titsworth Fund for the library will give permanence to his name and his high academic ideals."

The Chestertown Rotary Club was organized in January, 1926. Dr. Titsworth was elected its first president. Titsworth had come to Chestertown to become president of Washington College in 1914. He was considered one of the most civic minded and progressive presidents to serve the College, a position he held until 1933.



Sears-Roebuck Foundation grants $600

WC News Bureau

Washington College has received an unrestricted grant of $600 from the Sears-Roebuck Foundation, Chicago Illinois. Representing the Foundation, Paul E. Wright, recently named store manager of Sears-Roebuck, Dover, Delaware and assistant store manager Gary B. Clements, visited the College to present the contribution to College Vice-President for Development George E. Hayward.

The Sears-Roebuck Foundation has assisted Washington College annually since 1963. The recent contribution brings the total received from the Foundation over the past seventeen years to nearly $10,000. Washington College is one of more than 1,000 private colleges and universities which received grants from the Foundation totaling $1.5 million for the 1979-80 academic year.

In accepting the grant, Mr. Hayward stated, "Washington College is honored to have this support from the Sears-Roebuck Foundation. The Foundation is to be commended for its nationally organized programs which focus almost exclusively on all levels of education throughout the country."

Cades calls for Bicentennial theme

by GEOFF GARINTHER
Editor-in-Chief

Associate Professor of Sociology Steven Cades says he expressed the opinion ofmany of his colleagues at the March 3rd faculty meeting when he criticized the Bicentennial Steering Committee for its failure as yet to propose a general theme for the celebration.

"I've gotten the impression talking with my colleagues that most of us are concerned we should not lose an opportunity to make ourselves better known," said Cades this week.

Cades said he realized the problems the large Committee has in agreeing so pon a theme, but added that time is growing short if major speakers are to be attracted.

"I think it's very late in the game. Only when you have a theme included in the budget can you contract notable scholars."

Cades would not say that it is too late for the Committee, only that a theme must be found soon.

"The priorities have not been what I'd prefer, in that the first should be an over-arching theme to which everything else can be hooked," said Cades, adding that a theme "has been virtually handed to the Committee by the Board "in the idea of a Third Century of Excellence."

Shoremen drop sea

by KEVIN O'CONNOR

The Washington College lacrosse team opened its season at home Wednesday with a 14-7 defeat at the hands of a very strong Naval Academy squad. The loss, however, can be looked upon with a degree of optimism. Let's face facts: Navy is ranked third in the country. Yet, the only difference between Navy and Washington College seemed to be size. The Middies have a much stronger and more physical team than the Shoremen. But a team that is stronger usually wins more ground balls, which in turn means greater time of possession, but this was not the case on Wednesday. Navy won only ten more ground balls (52-42), and Washington had more time of possession.

Offensively, the key for the Shoremen was in moving the ball. Navy plays a pressure defense, and the only beat it is to "move that apple" was done consistently, but seemed to be trouble in finding th man and getting good shots. A mentioned, the offense did an ex job of controlling the ball. Ran the squad venture from its gam showing a team with patience, and a sense of continuity—imp assets early in the season.

Leading the scoring was fre Jeff Kaufman with 3 goals a assist, sophomore Paul Hooper and 1 assist, and sophomores Bacon and Joe Cornerly with apiece. Dickie Grieves, Tim Holl and Ben Tuckerman all turned kind of performances that will the Shoremen a winner this seas held a quick and multi-talented offense from controlling the The scouting reports predicted ddies' entire offense; they cut, d reset so often that it limits any g up on their aggressive at- n. That's exactly what they did ire game, giving the Shore e trouble throughout. The e also seemed to become ed late in the game, causing a penalties. Navy is a team that let extra-man opportunities go t, and they proved it. The Shore was instructed to cut off fast- dvantages, which it did, con- only one or two during the of the game. The defense of Haller, Willie Herring, and Felice must be commended for ing respectably against an at- tack that without a doubt is one of the best in the country. Jim Bradley and Ray Cameron also contributed fine performances. Shore goalie Chris "Duck" Anglim has come into his own in his last two performances, and you can expect to see a lot more from him as the season progresses.

1980 looks promising for the Shoremen. After a disappointing 1979 season, it may be appropriate to compare the two teams. One thing this year's squad has is the incentive to push harder and never give in. This was evident in the third and fourth quarters Wednesday, when WC scored 2 and 2 goals, holding Navy to 4 and 3. It looks like a team hungry for the national championship. As for the Middies, wait'll next year.

Sabbaticals awarded for next year amid controversy

by KATHY STRECKFUS
Assistant Editor

Shivers

Dr. Colin Dickson and Dr. George Shivers, both inthe Modern Languages Department, have been chosen by the Committee on Appointments and Tenure to go on sabbatical next year. This development has met with controversy among members of the faculty.

Shivers will be on leave both semesters, but Dickson will only be on leave during the Spring semester.

According to Dean of the College Garry Clarke, several faculty members "are concerned that it will put the Modern Languages Department under a lot of pressure and strain. With the small departments here, it makes it difficult if even one person is on leave."

The two sabbaticals will place an additional burden on a department that is already under pressure, since Franz Birgel, Assistant Professor of German, is not returning next year, Dr. Erika Salloch, Professor of German, has been in and out of the hospital this semester, and Dr. Andre Von, Professor of French, is on leave this semester.

Twelve department chairmen submitted a letter to the committee that stated their concerns. "I think they hope that something will be done, and they hope this will be considered carefully in the future," Clarke said.

The faculty's complaint is based on a rule stated in the Faculty Handbook. "Ordinarily, not more that two faculty members shall be on leave at one time, and not more than one member of any department."

Clarke said that the word "ordinarily" at the beginning of the sentence makes the rule ambiguous.

"The chairmen really do have a point. It makes good sense," Clarke said. He added that he thinks the Committee will be more aware of this problem in future decisions.

But the decision for next year is permanent. The College will find replacements for Dickson and Shivers next year.

Dickson will study metaphor in Montaigne's essays in France next Spring. Shiversplans to study linguistics. He is considering several American Universities for his research.

The Committee on Appointments and Tenure consists of President of the College Dr. Joseph McLain, Dean Garry Clarke, and four faculty members.

California and back on less than a dollar

by KEVIN MAHONEY
and PETE TURCHI

More than a handful of Washington College students went to Florida and other far-away places over Spring Break and even more would have gone if it weren't for the high cost of fuel. Gas is well over a dollar a gallon, and home-heating costs are climbing out of sight. As if things weren't bad enough Texas International Airline announced in late February that a roundtrip ticket to New Orleans, Las Vegas, Los Angeles, Dallas-Fort Worth and Houston would cost fifty cents.

Some people might find that price a little stiff, but Washington freahman Russ Schilling and Howard Hecht thought it was just fine. The two took a bus from Chestertown to Baltimore-Washington International Airport where they lined up over the weekend to win the trip. The first fifty people in line won, but to do it they had to sign a list and check in at specified times, or else be bumped out of place. To while away the long hours, the over eighty people sat in front of the Texas International ticket counter playing backgammon, drinking wine, sleeping, and watching television.

Both Schilling and Hecht were included in an article in the March 3 News American which left out the most important detail—both of them won the trip. At 2 p.m. Sunday they were still in the line, and at 2:30 they were on their way to New Orleans. They stayed overnight with friends at Tulane University and also saw Bourbon Street, rode on a trolley and snacked at the Cafe Du Monde.

On Monday they flew to Las Vegas where they could only stay a half hour, but Schilling won twelve dollars in an airport slot machine. From there they went to Los Angeles, when they enjoyed the sunny California city for a full ten minutes. After the west coast excitment they relaxed on the final transcontinental ride, and they returned to Baltimore Tuesday afternoon.

Although bus fare to the airport was $7.50 a piece and personal costs were about $35, Hecht and Schilling agreed that the plane fare itself was quite reasonable. Said Hecht "We'd do it again for half the price."

Republicans "run away with the show"

by GEOFF GABRINTHER
Editor-in-Chief

The Washington College Republicans "ran away with the whole show" three weekends ago at the annual convention of the Maryland Federation of College Republican Clubs, winning two of the top three positions in the organization, plus the "Best Newsletter of the Year" Award.

Sophomore Joe Holt was elected First Vice-Chairman and junior Glen Beebe Second Vice-Chairman in the Federation. Beebe also introduced the keynote speaker, William Keyes of the American Conservative Union. And the WC Club beat out 15 others for the "Newsletter of the Year" Award.

"Considering we got two of the top three spots, and one of the two big awards," said Beebe, the Club's President, "I'd say we kind of ranaway with the whole show."

A Republican ticket of Ronald Reagan as President and Howard Baker as his running mate won a straw poll held among the convention delegates.

Hartsook, O'Keefe win Fulbright Scholarships

by BILL MORTIMER

Two Washington College seniors have been awarded Fulbright Scholarships this year for studies in Germany.

Lisa Hartsook, a German and Music major, and Gene O'Keefe, a Spanish major, recently received notice that their applications have been approved by the Institute for International Education. Both Hartsook and O'Keefe will study in Germany during the 1980-81 academic year.

According to Dr. Peter Tapke, who heads the committee at Washington College, three seniors submitted applications this year. The applications which Tapke and his committee received were then received and, after personal interviews, the committee assigned a numerical rating for each applicant. From there, the applications were sent to the Institute in New York for final approval. Tapke said that all three applicants received excellent ratings.

The three other faculty members are Dr. George Shivers Spanish, Vr. Frank Birgel for German, and Dean of the College Garry Clarke.

"We are all very delighted indeed," said Tapke "and we think that they deserve their awards." He added, however, that "it is a pity there aren't more scholarships available for other important countries."

The Fulbright Scholarships offer a limited number of awards for study in each of the foreign countries involved in the program. In the past three years, four Washington College students have been awarded scholarships for Germany.

Hartsook, a Sioux Falls, South Dakota native, submitted her proposal to the committee in October. "My project deals with researching the poetry of Friedrich Hoiderlin, who lived from 1770 to 1843," she said. While in Germany, she hopes to study his poetry and various musical settings of his poems. The study of Holderlin's work, which is neglected by most of the contemporary world in favor of his more famous contemporaries, will combine both Hartsook's majors German and Music. She will study "the union of poetry and music by researching the poetry of Holderlin and by examining and comparing the songs on his text by various composers." Included among the composers are Brahms, Peter Cornelius, Max Roger and Paul Hindemith. Through this study Hartsook feels that much valuable insight can be gained "into an understanding of Holderlin's poetry, not to mention what will be learned about the musical language songs."

Hartsook hopes to study at the Univesity of Munich, but will not know for certain for at least six weeks. "I want to go to Munich but it is not guaranteed. (The Institute) tries to place your where you want to go," she said. Wherever she studies in Germany, she hopes to take German Literature courses and continue her study of piano. Studies for her project will be done largely on an independent basis, possibly with an advisor. She will stay one year, from September of 1980 to August of 1981.

Hartsook hopes to study French literature and music also, after she gains fluency in French. "Right now," she said, "I have to narrow my interests and concentrate on one thing at a time. This is where I am strongest. I hope to expand upon my skills."

Hartsook comes from a small town, and looks forward to the change Germany will offer. "There is a lot happening culturally there." she noted. She spent last summer in Stuttgart and "enjoyed it, but three months was too short." In addition to living in Germany, she hopes to visit other parts of Europe next year.

The other Fulbright winner, Gene O'Keefe, has proposed an equally ambitious project. His proposal is a "study of comparative literature between Spanish and German writers from 1620 to 1830." In general, he plans to study the influence of Lope de Vega and Calderon on Grillparzer, Quevedo on Moschersosch among others. The important part of the project is to view the way in which one culture views another and how influences manifest themselves in another culture, O'Keefe said. He wants to "see how German authors adapted the Spanish literature to make it more Germanic in nature." Several professors had discussed the possibility of this being a viable topic with him and O'Keefe found himself more and more interested in it. He has studied German for three and a half years, and thus, as a Spanish major, he has knowledge of both languages.

This summer, O'Keefe hopes to do some background research relating to Histopic. He wants to "gain insight into the historical aspect of both countries in terms of the religious and political thought of the times." This background research will add to his understanding of literary influences. There has not been much study in the area on which O'Keefe's project is based. He said, "That's why I would like to do it."

In his application, O'Keefe listed three choices for Universities. If he receives his first choice he will be studying at the Friedrich-Alexandar University in Nornberg, Germany. There, he would like to study under two professors, Ulrich Fulleborn and Helmut Prange. His second choice is Koln, and third, Bochum. Like Hartsook, O'Keefe will know for certain is six weeks.

After his year in Germany, O'Keefe would like to persue his main goal—medical school. He also has a strong interest in languages and would like to become fluent in German and then French. "If I don't go to medical school I would like to pursue my studies in German and Spanish with a goal of teaching," he said.

The Fulbright Scholarship is exciting for O'Keefe, he said, since he has never been abroad. While there, he would like to go to Spain "to become more fluent in Spanish, and travel to France for the same reason." At the University in Germany which he attends, O'Keefe will probable study courses in German, but he has not received information on that either.

According to Tapke, the Fulbright Scholarship will pay all expenses for both winners. When the award was initiated with the Fulbright-Hayes Act in 1948, its intention was for some of America's allied nations to pay back war costs in the form of scholarships. The number of scholarships awarded prior to the Vietnam War was higher, but since then, the number of grants have been cut. With between eighty and ninety scholarships awarded in their country, Germany offers the largest program.

Hartsook recital tonight

by BILL MORTIMER

A senior piano recital will be presented this evening, in Tawes Theater by Lisa Hartsook, a German and Music major.

Hartsook, a Sioux Falls, South Dakota native, has included works by J.S. Bach, Johannes Brahms and Francis Pouleue in her program. "Basically, I was given pieces to choose from by Music Department Chairman Kathy Mills" Hartsook said. The recital is not part of her Senior Requirements, but is something which Harsook wanted to do "because I think that it is necessary for me to experience preparing for a recital first hand."

Hartsook graduated from Washington High School in Sioux Falls in 1976 and came to Washington College that fall. She has studied piano "intermittently" since she was six years old and seriously since her sophomore year in college. Originally, she came to the College intending to major in the Social Sciences.

During the upcoming academic year she will study in Germany under a Fulbright Scholarship, while planning to continue graduate studies in Germany upon her return to the United States.

According to Hartsook, her musical tastes are wide and varied. "I have a musical taste ranging from Frank Zappa to the B-52's; from Joni Mitchell to Brahms, Beethoven and Mozart" she said.

The public is cordially invited to attend the classical recital. Admissions is free of charge.

Squad returns from Florida

Baseball opens MAC season tomorrow

by RICH SCHATZMAN
Sports Editor

Spring is upon us, and at WC the season is synonomous with lacrosse. The 1980 version of Shoremen baseball, however, will be one of the finest in years. Only three starters from last year were lost through graduation, leaving a strong and experienced nucleus for this year's team.

During Spring Break, Coach Ed Athey and his assistant, Al Strechman, took the squad to Florida for more intense training in preparation for the upcoming season, and the trip was characterized as an overwhelming success.

"We definitiely came back with a stronger club than we went down with," said Athey. The week in Florida allowed the coaches to establish a set line-up with little variation. Freshmen Kevin Beard, Bill Bounds, and Glenn Gillis will fill in for the three graduates, Steve Wilkinson, "Buck" Buchanon, and Scott Rutter. Beard will play left field, Bounds will play third base, and Gillis will catch. To round out the starting team, Sophomere Tim Fagan will be in center field and junior Chris Kiefer will be in right. Other than Bounds, the infield will have juniors Rich Dwyer and Rich Schatzman at first base and shortstop, respectively, with senior Bruce Abbott playing second base.

This team will provide the Shoremen with a fine defense, but the hitting may be sporadic. This brings us to the strong point of the 1980 WC baseball squad. Senior Co-Captains Dan Barbieri and Bill "Arch" Hoopes are back for their fourth year as the two top pitchers on the staff. This year they have the opportunity to be the two finest pitchers in the Middle Atlantic Conference. Both Barbieri and Hoopes struggled in Florida, but hey learned quite a bit and will be ready for the season. Junior Mark Naser will be making sure of that. Naser was 2-0 in Florida, beating a Division I school (Indiana State) and a Division II school (Kutztown State of Pa.) He had shut-outs going into the last inning of each game. These three, helped out by an improving Jim Corey, could give the Shoremen the best pitching staff in the Conference.

WC played five games in Florida and came away with a 3-2 record. The Shoremen nine opened with a 7-1 lossto Indiana State, but followed this up with a 9-1 win over Kutztown State and an 11-1 victory over Kenyon College. Quinnipiaz College of Connecticut, possibly the finest team down there, handed the team a tough 5-2 loss. But the week ended with a 4-3 revenge victory over Indiana State. With this, everyone is coming back to Chestertown with their sights on a MAC title.

The Shoremen opened their season with a doubleheader against York College yesterday. Their MAC season starts tomorrow at 1 p.m. against Swarthmore College.

Student Affairs suggests housing improvements

by KATHY STRECKFUS
Assistant Editor

Housing improvements for next year include developing the idea of academic interest housing and possibly, instituting "squatter's rights," according to Associate Dean of Students Ed Maxcy.

"Squatter's rights" would mean that students could choose to live in the same rooms next year in which they are currently living.

The problem with making "squatter's rights" part of the room assignments procedure is that students who happen to live in particularly desirable rooms would have an unfair advantage over the students who would be participating in room draw. "It might not be the best system, but it would be interesting to see what the students think of the idea," Maxcy said.

Special interest housing

Groups of students with special academic interests who would like to live on the same floor or in a suite should submit a letter to the chairman of their department.

The letter should state reasons why they feel they warrant special housing, and request the department chairman's endorsement. The chairman should then submit the request to the Student Affairs Office.

The requests for academic housing will "be put ahead of the room drawlottery," Maxcy said.

Maxcy said that the purpose of both academic housing and "squatter's rights" is "to create more of a sense of floor identity, so students can live in an environment of their own choosing, so people can have their own lifestyle in a way that is comfortable for them."

If students identify with a particular floor or building, Maxcy said, the problem of vandalism in the dorms may be reduced.

After the Student Affairs Committee gets an official decision from Vice-President for Finance Gene Hessey about whether or not the Hill Dorms will be renovated next year, the room assignments procedures will begin. Maxcy said that he expects the decision to be made by April 18.

Maxcy invites any student who has suggestions for housing improvements to contact Student Affairs Office.

Anonymous donor may provide recreational facilities

by BILL MORTIMER

An anonymous donor to the College has expressed interest in contributing funds to improve student recreational facilities.

Dean of Students Maureen Kelley said that "We had requested a couple of thousand dollars for recreation." She was told by Vice President for Finance Gene Hessey to write a proposal outlining several different possible areas for improvement. A donor who has supported the College in the past had this year expressed interest in contributing approximately $2,500 to be used for student recreation.

The individual, who remains anonymous pending the actual contribution of the funds, has in the past donated monies to be used for scholarships and library books, among other things. This year they asked about possible recreational areas which might be helped, something which the entire College community could enjoy.

"Who will be used for will be determined by the donor. There are several things which have been recommended," said Hessey. Heading the list compiled by the Student Affairs office is the lighting of the tennis courts. But before the potential donor is informed of the college's preference, cost must be estimated. "We want to be fairly certain," Hessey said, "that if we suggest that it would be great to light the tennis courts, that we knew that the costs are within the range of the contribution."

Although Hessey said that the tennis courts are the priority on the list compiled by the Deans of Students, other possibilities exist. "I have an SGA committee looking at the groung floor of Hodson Hall for possible renovations as a student center," Hessey said. This could include the purchase of any number of things, a wall size tclevision for example. Computer games, pool and table tennis tables are also viable possibilities.

Until the double checking of cost is completed, however, the final proposal can not be submitted to the donor. Once the proposal is written, Hessey estimates that "we would have the funds within a few days, certainly within a week." If the lighting of the tennis courts is withing the donor's budget, Hessey feels that the project would be completed within a month and a half. "More than likely the benefits of lighting the tennis courts will not be recognized until next fall with the days getting longer in the spring," he noted.

Student Center plans highlight SGA meeting

by Kathy Wurzbacher

At Monday's Student Government Meeting, the SGA discussed a new student center, sports proposals, mini-courses, various social events, and changes for the Cafeteria bathrooms.

SGA President Jay Young discussed a new committee that would handle the proposed student center in Hodson Hall. The committee members are Dean of students Maxcy, Assistant Professor of Literature Marty Kabot, Dean of Students Maureen Kelly, Amy Pozerycki, Toby Townsend and Kevin Kroencke. They have plans for the blueprints and an architect to begin the work.

The Washington College Women's Lacrosse Club recieved $700 frpm the SGA for sticks, lacrosse balls, shorts and shirts. The club asked for $600 for the equipment and the other $100 for expenses at tentative games. Also, Vance Morris and Dan Duff are taking charge of a possible spring softball league.

There was discussion of mini-courses to be held in William Smith at 7:30 during the week. The couses included Photography, Embroidery and Bartending. A full list is available in the Student Affairs Office.

Due to damage to the basement bathrooms last weekend, the SGA voted to put locks on the bathroom doors. There also was talk about collecting the money at future dances at the bottom of the steps in Hodson.

This Saturday is Jr/Sr Day and the Lacrosse team plays Dennison. There will be a cocktail party before the game and live beer afterwards.

Friday 28—Kenny Fitzenmeyer will be in the Coffee House.

Saturday 29—Freewater will play in the cafeteria from 10 until 2. There will be 5 free kegs.

Faculty responsibility

In a letter to the editor this week, Jonathan Muellar writes that faculty members are responsible for bringing about change in a college community, and suggests that some of ours may be neglecting their responsibilities. He may or may not be right. But as it concerns at least one issue—the institution of English Composition courses—we think he has a good point.

As we reported in October, the Student Academic Report released four years ago this Spring called the need for an English composition course "embarrassingly plain." That feeling was reiterated in February when freshmen told the Admissions Office that they lacked basic writing skills. We said then that since it seemed the consensus of students, faculty, and the Academic Council that such a course was necessary, it shouldn't be long till there was one.

That prediction may have been premature. Unlike the Mathematics Department, which was quick to come forward with a plan to insure that students graduate with a competency in math, the English Department seems reluctant to admit to — or, more accurately, to accept any responsibility for solving—a deficiency that seems so obvious to so many.

Admittedly, the problem of insuring proficiency in English is more difficult thatn doing so in mathematics. But it is nonetheless a problem, and the English Department seems the logical choice to provide a solution. How the faculty handles its responsibility in this case remains to be seen.

Letter to the Editor

A question of intellectual leadership

Until just a century ago, instructors in Oxford University were not permitted to marry, and any one who wished to have a normal family life had to leave the University. Thankfully, this is no longer the case. But, by having had such a rule Oxford showed recognition that an academic career required more dedication than normal professional occupations and ought only be undertaken by men with the love of learning to inspire this dedication. The University felt–and still feels–that anyone who was not sufficiently called to teaching to give not just full time, but all the time he possibly could, to his responsibilities, anybody who was only interested in a career, should pursue something less rigorous.

The question I should like to pose for the reader's thought is, how many professors in this college recognize and accept the full burden of their responsibilities—I know some who do, and some who do not; I do not know enough professors to be able to evaluate the entire faculty. But that is not my purpose.

All I want is to ask the reader to reflect on his own experiences.

I have noticed that many professors are concerned about the un-intellectual or anti-intellectual climate on this campus. While I sympathize with their concern, I am rather disappointed that most professors, the older ones of long service in particular, place the lion's share of the blame on the students. These professors need to ask themselves if they are giving their students the moral and intellectual leadership that, due to their experience, wisdom, and position of authority, they can and should. And, there are several professors who need to ask themselves if they are not in their own conduct setting their students an example unworthy of amulation.

College students are transients; faculty members are more permanent members of the college community. They are the ones, with their position and tenure, who have the greater ability and the greater responsibility to influence change, for better or for worse.

sincerely
Jonathan Mueller

Security guard's car stolen

by PETE TURCHI
News Editor

In addition to the thefts that plagued students over Spring Break the Washington College security office reports that one of their cars was stolen on Sunday, March 9.

Steve Kendall, Head of Campus Security, said that "one of our men brought some reports to the office in back of the library to have them signed, and he left the keys in the car." Although it was left unattended for only a few minutes, Kendall said in that time the car, along with over $5,000 of radio and telephone equipment, was stolen.

Kendall also said that although the Chestertown police were contacted, it will be "almost impossible" to find out who took the car as it was found behind a cemetery the following Wednesday. "It must have been a prank," Kendall said. "Anybody else would've taken the equipment. The car itself isn't worth anything."

The mobile phone in the security car had only recently been installed, but Kendall said it, along with several walkie-talkies, flashlights, and other equipment was returned with the car undamaged. As far as the theft itself, Kendall said, "It was a new kid who left the keys in the car...I've done it myself; who the hell would have thought they would take it from right outside the door.

Campus security strengthened

by KEVIN MAHONEY

Due to recent thefts and complaints of unavailability, the campus security force is being strengthened under new Director Steve Kendall.

Two men, both in uniform and carrying walkie-talkies, will be on duty seven nights a week from 8 p.m. to 5 a.m. In addition, a security car equipped with a telephone will patrol campus.

Associate Dean of Students Ed Maxcy said the security force "is here to help students, not harass them," and he invites any suggestions for improving the system.

The night security office can be reached at 778-2804 (Miller Library). If there is an emergency or no response at the security office number, call the local telephone operator in Chestertown and request the Mobile Operator. Give the operator the phone number YL-3500801, which will connect you with the security department's phone in the security car.

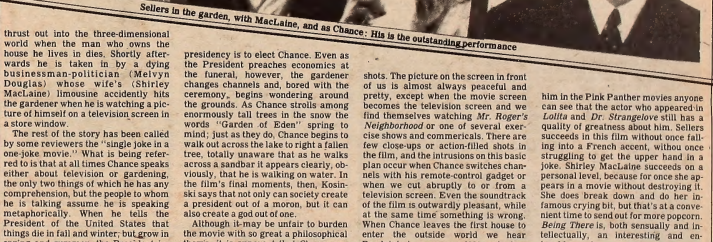
"Being There": More than a one-joke movie

by PETE TURCHI
News Editor

After picking up the TV Guide for any week, it's not the least bit difficult to see how someone surrounded by television and never allowed into the outside world for the first forty-or-so years of his life could become a total moron. It is remarkable, however, to see how easily and completely the society that produces television shows could accept that moron.

In Being There to be sure, the character of Chance (Peter Sellers) is not solely a product of his watching one too may episodes of Laverne and Shirley, but Jerzy Kosinski's screenplay—based on his own book—makes it clear that the quiet, maddeningly slow-paced gardener has been greatly affected by too many hours in front of the tube. Chance is thrust out into the three-dimensional world when the man who owns the house he lives in dies. Shortly afterwards he is taken in by a dying businessman-politician (Melvyn Douglas) whose wife's (Shirley MacLaine) limousine accidently hits the gardener when he is watching a picture of himself on a television screen in a store window.

The rest of the story has been called by some reviewers the "single joke in a one-joke movie." What is being referred to is that at all times Chance speaks either about television or gardening, the only two things of which he has any comprehension, but the people to whom he is talking assume he is speaking metaphorically. When he tells the President of the United States that things die in fall and winter, but grow in spring and summer, the President interprets this to say that the economy will fourish in another season, and that his job is like that of a gradener. Later, when the Russian ambassador quotes a Russian fairy tale, Chance (now known as Chauncy Gardener as a result of another breakdown in communication) laughs nervously, and the ambassador assumes Chance speaks the language. By the end of the party rumor has it that Chance knows over seven languages.



Although the "one joke" has to do with a lack of communication, the inherent irony involved leads to more than humor; we see that an unknowing society, every bit as moronic as the main character, can create geniuses of its own accord. At the end of the film, when the financer dies, the old man's fellow businessmen and politicans say that the only way they can hold on to the presidency is to elect Chance. Even as the President preaches economics at the funeral, however, the gardener changes channels and, bored with the ceremony, begins wondering around the grounds. As Chance strolls among enormously tall trees in the snow the words "Garden of Eden" spring to mind; just as they do, Chance begins to walk out across the lake to right a fallen tree, totally unaware that as he walks across a sandbar it appears clearly, obviously, that he is walking on water. In the film's final moments, then, Kosinski says that not only can society create a president out of a moron, but it can also create a god out of one.

Although it-may be unfair to burden the movie with so great a philosophical theme, it is apparent that Chance unconsciously helps people to feel better about themselves. When he is put on national television the President watches, not sure what to expect; although Chance comes close to making a fool out of himself, he ends up supporting the statements he had made earlier. When Chance talks to the dying businessman, Rand, he is told that he seems strong and firm, and brings a balance to life. The old man is not the only one who is comforted by Chance's presence. Chance's insistence on the fact that he "like to watch" in two cases leads to voyeurism: once when a homosexual at a political reception runs to grab a friend, and once later when Rand's wife, Eve, attempts to arouse Chance and ends up fiddling with her own knobs.

The firmness and balance that Rand mentions are visible in the movie technically; it proceeds at a slow, even pace, with precise, often symmetrical shots. The picture on the screen in front of us is almost always peaceful and pretty, except when the movie screen becomes the television screen and we find themselves watching Mr. Roger's Neighborhood or one of several exercise shows and commercials. There are few close-ups or action-filled shots in the film, and the intrusions on this basic plan occur when Chance switches channels with his remote-control gadget or when we cut abruptly to or from a television screen. Even the soundtrack of the film is outwardly pleasant, while at the same time something is wrong. When Chance leaves the first house to enter the outside world we hear Deodato's incongruous 2001, and when the limousine pulls up to the Rand mansion we are listening to an eerie song by black children playing basketball on an animated TV show.

At the end of the film, for those members of the audience who are struggling with their coats or looking for loose change under the seats, Director Hal Ashby has included a series of outtakes of a scene in which Peter Sellers repeatedly cracks up as he tries to deliver a monologue in Chance's flat, slow speech pattern. Although some may be able to tie them in with the film somehow, to me the outtakes were a cheap move; they seemed to be included to satisfy everyone who had come to the movie by mistake, thinking it was going to be a Peter Sellers comedy.

No matter how Hollywood tries to sell it Being There is not a comedy first and foremost; it is a movie with a message. The film has been nominated for two Academy awards, but the outstanding performace is Sellers'. After seeing him in the Pink Panther movies anyone can see that the actor who appeared in Lolita and Dr. Strangelove still has a quality of greatness about him. Sellers succeeds in this film without once falling into a French accent, without once struggling to get the upper hand in a joke. Shirley MacLaine succeeds on a personal level, because for once she appears in a movie without destroying it. She does break down and do her infamous crying bit, but that's at a convenient time to send out for more popcorn. Being There is, both sensually and intellectually, an interesting and enjoyable movie.

Dining Hall worker dies

by KATHY STRECKFUS
Assistant Editor

Dorothy Henry, who had been "the salad lady" in Hodson Dining Hall for nearly 14 years, died Monday afternoon, March 24. She was 39.

She began working in the Dining Hall in September, 1967.

Director of Food Services Dave Knowles said, "She was one of the four kitchen people who have been here for years. She did things on her own initiative. As an employee, she will be difficult to replace. As a friend, she will be impossible to replace."

She is survived by her husband Wallace Henry, 2 daughters, and 4 sons. One of her daughters, Cookie Henry, is a current employee in the Dining Hall.

Funeral services will be held tomorrow at 1:00 p.m. at St. James Methodist Church.

Student receives social probation

The Student Affairs Office this week placed a student on social probation after he allegedly threw a beer bottle toward members of the women's lacrosse club at the men's Navy game.

Sophomore Scott Dodge was reported to have "hassled" at least one of the women before throwing the bottle with a lacrosse stick. He was then said to have been abusive when asked to leave by the coach of the women's team.

Dodge's probation stipulated that he can be on campus only from 10:30 a.m. to 3:15 p.m.

RA applications

There are approximately seventeen openings for Resident Assistants for next year, eight for men, and nine for women, and applications for the job will be available in the Student Affairs Office next week.

Shoremen win big, lose big against St. Mary's and Hopkins

by KEVIN O'CONNOR

The Shoremen looked like a 'yo-yo' last week against St. Mary's and John Hopkins. An impressive victory over a potentially good team in St. Mary's gave WC a new high in enthusiasm. Unfortunately, their new high burned out with a solid trouncing by Hopkins.

The game last Saturday against St. Mary's left no doubt in anyone's mind who wanted to win. The two teams didn't really know what to expect from each other so the tension on the opening face-off was at its maximum. But after the opening faceoff WC took complete control of the game with their quick offense. They also built up that key factor in time of possession. The defense played such hard and aggressive ball that they nearly shut off all scoring attempts made by St. Mary's.

Beating any team by a margin of 15 goals (17-2) says a lot of things about the potential of that team. The talent is obviously there and it's only a matter of working together and being able to click on any given day. A win that big should establish a coat of confidence that can last a whole season. Confidence is a superior role in mentally preparing for a game. When putting these all together it comes down to playing consistently well, with confidence in oneself and fellow teammates

Then came Hopkins...

If it's possible to set these previous guidelines for the preparation of a game, the Sho'men broke every one against the Blue Jays. It was clearly evident that the team wasn't together because they were out-hustled everywhere, especially on ground balls (56-19). On riding their clears, Hopkins nearly converted every one and the defense allowed way too many shots (60 to our 9), all examples of a lack of hustle. The team's confidence never seemed to be present simply because of Hopkins' intimidation. They were very effective in this last respect by scoring 9 goals in the first quarter. The Sho'men defense tightened up somewhat in the 2nd quarter, allowing only 3 goals, but the offense still couldn't get things rolling. The offense was ineffective because there wasn't enough movement away from the ball. Whenever a team pressures the ball there must be movement elsewhere. This was done very effectively against Navy but not against Hopkins.

The Sho'men also had trouble in clearing the ball. This was due mainly to too many long passes and not enough short ones. Long passes, especially in the middle of the field, give the riding team a chance to jump the man catching the ball immediately. Short passes give the man tinie to look for someone else who's open and hit him, hence, moving the ball upfield.

The man-down defense was strong in only allowing 3-10 conversions for Hopkins extra man. This was Hopkins' most effective means of obtaining goals in their last outing with Harvard.

This 1980 Lacrosse team has the desire to be a winner as was proven in their first two games. Their third was, to say the least, depressing. The potential for a championship team is there. If the players want it badly enough it will take a lot of pride and hard work throughout the rest of the season. The first 3 are over, leaving a 1-2 mark. The rest begin tomorrow with Dennison and all are invited to give your support at 1:30, Kibler field.

First baseman Rich Dwyer missed this one, but Shoremen went on to win both ends of a doubleheader against Swarthmore, 4-0 and 20-0. They won again Wednesday, 4-2 over St. Mary's, raising their mark to 3-2. (Photo by Graham)

31 women out for club lacrosse

By CECE GRADY

Women's lacrosse has finally made its way to the fields of Washington College in the form of a club. Practices began March 10 for the 31-women squad coached by Nancy Dick and Jodi Dudderar. The club is being financed by businessmen from the community and a recent $700 allocation from the SGA.

Although the club will probably not turn collegiate for another two years, the girls say they are working diligently to prove that they can garnish enough talent and support to make a women's lacrosse team a reality.

Jessie Fowler, President of the Club, expressed her gratitude to the SGA and the Chestertown community for its "overwhelming support.

"We're looking forward to a winning season," said Fowler. "We have a hard-working and dedicated group of girls." The club hopes to take on St. Mary's on April 20.

Federal funding will provide Hill renovations

by KATHY STRECKFUS
Assistant Editor

After trying to obtain sufficient funds for the renovation of the Hill Dorms for two years, President of the College Joseph McLain says that the money will be available soon through the federal Health and Higher Education Facilities Act.

"The Health and Higher Education Facilities Act will issue bonds to enable us to borrow up to a million dollars at whatever the bonding rate will be," said McLain. "I don't know how much of that we'll need."

Before this method of obtaining the funds had been worked out, there was a bill in the Maryland General Assembly for a loan to the College.

"The House bill and the Senate bill were put in, then prior to the committee hearing, we worked out this other method. They pulled the bill, so it will never be acted upon, nor will it need to be acted upon," said McLain.

"This gives us the authority from the Secretary of Planning, the Governor's office, and the Comptroller's office, to start getting these bonds issued. Rather than go through the legislature, this will give us the money sooner, so we can start getting contracts."

The College has been trying to obtain funds for the renovation since 1978, when a state grant was matched by the Hodson Trust. The combination of the state grant and the Hodson contribution was not sufficient, however, so the College applied to the Housing and Urban Development Agency for a loan. The application to HUD was turned down.

A second application was made for a HUD loan in 1979, but it was turned down. According to Vice-President for Finance Gene Hessey, the Agency had received too many applications from larger institutions, and did not have enough money to divide between all of the applicants. The College elected not to apply to HUD a third time.

Council proposes revision of distribution requirements

by GEOFF GARINTHER
Editor-in-Chief

The Academic Council Monday passed a revision of the distribution requirements that would require courses from all four of the major academic divisions.

The revision must now go to the faculty for final approval, but Dean of the College Garry Clarke says he will wait until the May faculty meeting—or maybe even until next year—to propose the changes.

The proposed revision of distribution requirements:

1. Two semester courses from each of the four distribution groups plus two semester courses elected from each of

Council, Board discuss students' writing skills

by GEOFF GARINTHER
Editor-in-Chief

"I really felt it was the best such meeting I've attended because we moved from generalities to specifics," said Dean of the College Garry Clarke after a meeting of the Academic Council and the Faculty and Curriculum Committee of the Board of Visitors and Governors last Saturday at which students' writing ability became the main topic.

"The Board members were very vocal," said Clarke. "They were very interested and concerned about our students and their ability to write, and seemed receptive to doing something and to the implication that it would cost money."

Clarke said he expects an official recommendation from the Committee that something be done about the perceived problem.

"The fact is that if something positive is to be done here," said Clarke, "the entire College community will have to cooperate, and some outside help may be needed as well."

English Department Chairman Nancy Tatum said that "outside help" is a prerequisite for any solution.

"There's a lot to be hoped for if we can jsut get some people in here to help," she said.

At a meeting last Thursday that Tatum called only "the most recent in series of meetings that has been going on for" some two years, Clarke asked the English Departmet for a specific proposal.

The Dean added, however, that "we agreed it would be hard to do this in a slap-dash way," so the Department may institute "stop-gap" measures for next year.

Tatum said the one way to improve writing skills is to require more papers, and that to do that, a smaller teacher-student ratio in the Forms of Literature and Compostion course is necessary.

"If you want anything substantial in the way of numbers of papers a student has to write, then you have to do something about making smaller classes," she said.

Fifteen students per class would be ideal, Tatum said, but twenty may be a more realistic hope.

Tatum outlined two other developments she said would improve writing skills.

"I'd like to see faculty encouraged to pull away from term papers to shorter papers placed nearer the beginning of the semester, so that it becomes a learning experience."

Tatum also said "models" of good papers should be provided for students.

"If you ask people coming out of high school who have written largely 'descriptive' papers to come into a college classroom and write an analysis, then you haven't given them a model for that."

German measles may not have been

by KEVIN MAHONEY

The diagnosis for the outbreak on campus of an illness with symptoms similar to German Measles is still undetermined, according to Health Service Nurse Betty Schauber.

On March 25 and 26 six students reported to the Health Service with a rash, sore throat, and a low fever. Three of these students were sent to the Kent County Health Department for tests. A Health Department doctor said there was a good chance that the students had German measles. The tests that were taken were sent to the state Health Department in Baltimore in order to verify the diagnosis.

Innoculation was then scheduled on campus for Monday, March 31. But the results of the tests showed the disease was not the German Measles, but an undetermined virus.

editorial

For better or for worse

Three new ideas that promise to affect the College significantly were in the news this week:

•Student Government Association President Jay Young this afternoon was to present to the Board of Visitors and Governors' Buildings and Grounds Committee a proposal to convert the basement of Hodson Hall into a student center. Equipped with cost estimates, blueprints, and an artist's conception of the plan, Young is betting the student center will become a reality this summer. We'll have more to say about the plan after we see how shrewd a gambler he is.

•A proposal to revise distribution requirements has been drafted, and it will no doubt be a controversial one when it reaches the faculty. It raises some interesting questions: How liberal is an education in which a student can avoid such academic staples as math, science, and foreign languages—and in some cases all three? The proposal would require students to take courses from each of the four academic divisions, while providing more options in Humanities and Formal Studies.

•The Dean's Office, the English Department, and the Board all agreed this week that students' inability to write is a problem that must be solved at whatever cost. The Board once again showed remarkable sensitivity and concern for the students, and English Department Chairman Nancy Tatum feels she now has the "go-ahead" to find a solution. It remains to be seen what method will be used to ensure the literacy of WC graduates.

Goldstein replaces Shivers for sabbatical

by KATHY STRECKFUS
Assistant Editor

Dr. Michael Goldstein, Chairman of the Psychology Department, has been chosen by the Committee on Appointments and Tenure to go on sabbatical next year. The decision came after Associate Professor of Spanish George Shivers, who had originally been chosen by the committee,decided to postpone his sabbatical until academic year 1981-82.

Sabbaticals had originally been awarded to Shivers and Assistant Professor of French Colin Dickson, both in the Modern Languages Department. Shivers, decision to postpone his research solves the problem of the extra burden thatwould have been placed on the Modern Languages Department if both Shivers and Dickson were on sabbatical next year.

Letters to the Editor

Glorious Arrival

Our new computer has arrived two months early, but it is now fully in operation, and many faculty and students have begun to enjoy using it. My object in writing is to express publicly my appreciation to those members of the college community who have helped to make this possible.

To those members of the administration who obtained the money that cnabled the purchase—Gene Hessey, George Wayward, and President McLain—and to the Hodson Trust for providing the funds, I am extremely grateful. Dean Clarke was expecially helpful during the two months that I attempted to re-educate myself on computer hardware and revise an earlier recommendation. Dennis Corradi and Cynthis Hill (of the Prime Computer staff in McLean, Va.) were also very helpful during that time.

When the computer arrived on campus, our Maintenance Department responded magnificently. Throughout the period of installation, Ray Crooks met our needs quickly and efficiently. Bill Coleman was very helpful at several stages of the work. Don Starkey and Louis Saunders had the electrical power installed in less than one day, and several others removed furniture and got new flooring installed in just one more day. This has been one of the finest jobs that I have seen in my twenty years at Washington College.

Finally, I am grateful to both faculty and students who participated in the selection process. It appears that there is now unanimous agreement that selecting a Prime 550 computer was exactly the right decision. Again, my thanks to all who have helped to make this possible.

sincerely,
Richard H Brown

Reagan's his man

The record of Mr. Carter stands by itself. His defense of Bert Lance, the firing of David Marston, the U.N. vote, veto of the B-1 bomber, his slashing of warship construction, discontinuing of the neutron bomb and inflation. Mr. Carter's record is that of a confused presidency. A presidency which is always being surprised by events, such as Iran and Afghanistan. It is time that this nation had a president who will lead the nation in one direction and not vacillate in six. The man for the job should be aware of the people's feelings and not stay hidden in the "Rose Garden" for the last six months. It is time for a man better suited for the office of President. This man is Governor Ronald Reagan.

Governor Reagan can provide the leadership this nation needs. During his governorship in California he proved that he could reform a large and unyielding state government. In welfare reform alone he saved the taxpayers approximatly $2 billion over a three year period. Governor Reagan is also the man needed to restore America's military superiority while demonstrating to the world that the decade of appeasement has been laid to rest once and for all.

Sincerely,
Glen Edward Beebe

Applications re-opened

Two weeks ago the Elm published a request that applications for the editorships of the Elm and the Pegasus be submitted to me by March 31. To date, one person has applied for each position. I am therefore extending the deadline until April 14 in the hope that additional applications will be forthcoming.

These positions are too important to go begging or go by default. One editor will help shape his classmates' memories of their college years, and the other will help shape the discussion of many issues of current imporatnce to the college community. Several years ago Common Cause appealed to citizens to Give A Damn; I now appeal to students to do the same.

Dirty Politics

We are encouraged by the political activity that has been expressed on campus withing the last week. The Youth for Reagan have récently been circulating information fluers on our candidates position. The flyers have appeared in the cafeteria after recieving Dave Knowles approval.

However, wehave been enraged by the actions of a certain Oxford bound student. This certain student used the back side of our personally financed flyers to promore his own political beliefs. We appreciate different political view points, however, we can not condone his actions; they smack of dirty politics.

Lance machine destroyed

WC News Bureau

Still another Lance machine has been destroyed—this one in Talbot house—and residents there suspect Baltimore Symphony Orchestra conductor Sergiu Commissiona may be to blame.

Although no one witnessed the actual destruction of the machine when it happened sometime late last Saturday night, Talbot House Resident Assistant Jeff Bowerman says he thinks he has conclusive evidence concerning this lateat incident in what has become known as "The Lance Scandal."

"My entire collection of B.S.O. albums was ripped off that same night," said Bowerman, "and our Commissiona poster was stolen from the suite."

College President Joseph McLain, a close, personal friend of Commissiona's, said he knows of no connection between the eminent conductor and the Lance Scandals, but adds "I'll ask him at Commencement May 25th."

The seventeenth in a series of Lance machine destructions over the past three years, this latest incident touched off a wave of indignation among students. One student seemed to symbolize the general feeling when he said, "I don't mind a little dorm destruction, but this Lance machine stuff has got to stop."

Commissiona will be unavailable for comment until he returns from the Baltimore Symphony's world tour May 24th, but students weren't waiting around to hear his side of the story.

"First he cuts a week off our summer," said one disgruntled New Dorms resident, "and now this. All I can say is, thanks a lot, Sergill."

Boycott opposed

McLain: Commencement must go on

College President Joseph McLain vowed this week that he's going on with plans for the 1980 Commencement, despite the Elm's warning that it will boycott the exercises unless Baltimore Symphony Orchestra conductor Sergiu Commissiona pulls out by April 20.

"There is no place for politics in Commencement," said McLain this week after learning of the Elm's plan to withold press coverage of the exercises. "Our seniors have put four years—some even more than that—into this moment, and "I'm not about to let it be taken away from them."

Members of the senior class, although unified in their opposition to Commissiona, were reluctant to join atotal boycott of the exercises. Class President Tim Connorthis week proposed an alternate plan in which graduating seniors would accept their diplomas, but boycott the opening and closing processions, as well as the presentation of Commissiona's honorary degree.

McLain said Commencement will go on no matter how many groups decide to boycott, despite charges that the exercises have lost all meaning.

Student Affairs proposes improvements

WC News Bureau

Deans of Students Maureen Kelley and Ed Maxcy say that this coming fall will see the institution of a new type of room-drawing procedure.

"In order to make things more fair," Kelley said, "we're going to do the draw just as we usually do, then institute squatter's rights." According to the Student Affairs office, squatter's rights means that a student has legal right to a room whenever he is in it and has control of it. According to Maxcy, "in other words, as soon as you step outside the door, it's a whole new ball game."

Although students will still be issued keys, the Deans say they expect doors to be broken down and locks to be picked in attempts by desperate students to get better rooms. They make it clear, however, that a student must have "control" of the room: this means that he must have at least two pieces se his or her own furniture and tenpieces of his or her clothing with him or her to legally possess the room. This means that if a student can sneak into the new dorms and remove the furniture, the suite is then "up for grabs." Maxcy said, "it will make campus life a little more exciting. People will get to know each other faster—you'll wake up with people trying to throw you out of your room."

The Deans suspect that those students who draw the New Dorms and other highly-valued places of residence will initiate the use of guard dogs, trap doors, and perhaps even high-powered rifles. Dean of the College Garry Clarke said, "I think the new policy will keep students on their toes, wide awake. It's a dog-eat-dog world out there, with everybody trying to steal the shirt off your back. This will give Washington students a taste of the real world."

In an informal poll conduced by the Elm, students for the most part said they were "wary" of the new procedure, but current residents of the Hill Dorms and Richmond House said that they weren't worried.

Security Office stolen, recovered

WC News Bureau

Head of Security Steve Kendal disclosed this week that the security office was stolen on Friday, March 28.

Kendall said that "one of our men stepped out of the office to give some reports back to one of the guys in the field and he left the keys in his desk." He said that ever since the security car had been stolen in early March, this had been the normal procedure. Although the office was left unattended for only a few minutes, Kendall said in that time the room, along with over $12,000 in typewriters, code whistles and doggy toys, was stolen.

"I just opened the door and it was gone," Kendall said. Although the Chestertown police were contacted, it will be "almost impossible" to find out who took the office, as it was found behind a cemetery the following Wednesday. "It must have been a prank," Kendall said, "Anybody else would've taken the equipment. The office itself isn't worth anything."

The security office had recently been equipped with an elaborate $7,000 alarm system, two electric eyes and a real big lock. We just forgot to close the door," he admitted. The room was equipped with two desks, and IBM electric typewriter, an Electronic Olivetti 221 typewriter, a Bally pinball table, three Green Hornet code whistles, a Batman spy ring, and five Doggy Donuts. All of the equipment, including the alarm system, was found at the

Dorms burn to ground

The New Dorms burned to the ground last Saturday in the fire resulting from the Lance machine destruction. No further details were available, but the Student Affairs Office this week announced plans to relocate New Dorms' residents in Hill Dorms and Richmond House for next year.

Coffee House brews change

WC News Bureau

As of Monday, April 7, the Coffeehouse will no longer serve beer and popcorn, nor will it feature recorded music.

According to manager Jake Parr the changes are being made "to cut costs, but we've found that (the students) don't really buy the beer and popcorn anyway—it's not worth it for us to keep serving them."

As far as the music, Parr said that "nobody can ever decide what to play, and there's always lots of arguments. Some of the guys like Springsteen and the Who, some people like Neil Young—you just can't keep everybody happy." He added that although there has been no move to schedule more live bands or to replace the music in any other way, patrons of the coffeehouse will be allowed to whistle and to hum quietly to themselves.

So what's left? Parr said that "there's still foosball and the bowling game, and we're still going to serve hot butter."

Added Parr, however, "the bowling games broke."

Let's Boycott

As you can see from this week's Elm, Washington College students are getting pretty fed up with one Sergui Commissiona, conductor of the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra, and we think with good reason. Let's examine some of Commissiona's recent antics:

•A Lance machine is destroyed, the New Dorms burn to the ground in the subsequent fire, and the only clue is that several Baltimore Symphony Orchestra albums are stolen that night. Come on, Sergui—our security force is often criticized, but he spotted your method of operation all the way from Smiley's.

•Two stereos are stolen within days of the Lance Affair, and security makes the connection to Commissiona immediately ("Whadya think he was gonna do with those albums," asks chief Steve Kendall).

•The Board of Visitors and Governors blames the Admissions Office for out-of-control attrition, but the Elm learns that Commissiona is often the cause. One departing student told us he liked the school's size and academic quality, but "having Commissiona at Commencement really turns me off."

•In a special investigative report, the Elm discovers a link between Commissiona and falling academic standards at the College: the conductor often pressures Director of Admissions Mickey DiMaggio to admit illiterate trumpet players solely to beef up the rapidly-deteroriating school band.

Well, we've had about enough of Sergiu Commissiona. That's why we're withholding press coverage of the 1980 Commencement exercises unless Commissiona pulls out by April 20, and we'd like to see the rest of the College community follow our lead. We realize how disappointing this will be for our seniors, many of whom were favored to graduate with honors. But that may be the price to be paid if Commissiona is to be stopped. So, if you've had about enough of Sergui Commissiona, join us—Boycott Commencement.

An, Premo maintain lead in Presidential race

WC News Bureau

According to an Elm poll of 683 students this week, Political Science professors Tai Sung An and Dan Premo remain the frontrunners in the five-man race to see who will replace Dr. Joseph McLain when the 63-year-old College President retires in 1982.

An managed to maintain his share of the lead despite a gaffe that many experts say could cast him the coveted Jewish vote among students. After stating earlier in the week that he favored a relocation of all Jewish students to the Hill Dorms next year—despite administration plans to tear those buildings to the ground—An called his announcement a mistake, blaming the mix-up on "this damn English language."

Assistant Professor of Political Science Howard Silver, the man many say stands to gain the most by An's blunder, said the latest foul-up should have been expected.

"An's tenure as department chairman has been a demonstration of crisis management at its best," said Silver.

"Next thing you know, he'll be claiming vandalism as a victory for the department."

Co-frontrunner Premo was also critical of An, whom he sees as his lone challenger after wiping out hopefuls John Taylor of Political Science and Steven Cades of Sociology. Taylor, who claimed he had "Big Mo" behind him after early victories in the polls, was fading fast. And Cades, called by many the only "candidate of ideas" (his include a 50-cent tax on all shots of Jack Daniels, which he says would curb drunken vandalism), remained the dark-horse in the race.

So, as students rapidly approach an An-Premo showdown in '82, one disgruntled voter expressed a widely-held opinion: "I wouldn't be real happy with either one, but I don't really care, as long as the same guy doesn't get it again."

Carter, Commissiona decline

Oriole shortstop Garcia to speak at '90 graduation

WC News Bureau

After failing to receive commitments from either President Carter or Baltimore Symphony Orchestra conductor Sergiu Commissiona, College President Joseph McLain has contracted Baltimore Oriole reserve shortstop Kiko Garcia to speak at Commencement exercises for the Class of 1990.

"Carter said he wouldn't commit himself that far in advance, and Commissiona said he's already agreed to speak at Harvard that year," explained McLain this week. "The high-quality speakers were going fast, so I grabbed Kiko while he was still available.

The selection created some controversy since Commencement falls in the middle of Garcia's major league baseball season, but McLain says he already has a solution.

"We'll just hold graduation during the All-Star break sometime in late July," said the President. In the event that Garcia makes the All-Star team that year, McLain said the College may have to hold the ceremony "between games of a doubleheader" in order to accommodate the shortstop.

The selection also caused a stir among several of the sixth graders who expect to graduate from Washington College in 1990. Said 11-year-old Ricky Higgins, "I don't know much about commencements, but I think the President should have consulted with us before he made the choice." Higgins says he's given up any hope of changing McLain's decision, but he's continuing to work so that "this year's fifth-graders have a little more say when their turn comes next year."

Despite Higgins' objections, however, a majority of his classmates seemed pleased with the decision. Said one, "Kiko's my favorite."

Concerning Garcia's alleged difficulty with the English language, McLain says that too should be no problem. "I'll be giving Kiko private speech lessons until then," said the noted orator.

Garcia, contacted this week, said he hadn't decided on a topic yet, but that it would probably have something to do with the Grand Old Game. "Baseball" said Garcia, "baseball been very, very good to me."

Students say they have answer to campus thefts

WC News Bureau

A possible answer has been found to the thefts occurring on the College campus over spring break, but the ensuing controversy has delayed the Student Affairs office in issuing an official statement.

Freshman Howard Hecht and Russ Schilling and Senior RA Jake Parr were all victims of thefts in the one-week vacation period. Hecht lost stereo equipment, his checkbook, and a life-size doll of Dolly Parton while Schilling lost his typewriter, electric guitar, and his voice.

In an interview this week Hecht said that he "came in the room last night and Russ was typing a paper. I asked him where he got the new typewriter, and before I got across the room he had thrown it out the window." Upon reaching the machine on the ground outside Hecht said he recognized it as the one that had been stolen from him weeks ago. He also said that Shilling had been typing a check. "He was very, very clever," Hecht said. "He typed my signature."

In a later interview Shilling said, "Don't listen to Howard. I went to the bathroom this mornign and he was in the hall, calling up girls using my voice and playing my guitar. He thinks he can get away with anything." At that point Hecht entered the room. "You liar!" he said, "you stole my typewriter!"

"Did not!" Said Shilling.

"Did too." hollered Hecht.

"Did not either!" Shilling shouted.

"Oh yeah—" Hecht howled.

Jake Parr, Resident Assistant of Dorchester, says he found the criminal who stole his tape deck, stereo receiver and turntable. "I was in the gym the other day and I saw Bruce (Caslow, Parr's roommate) warming up for lacrosse, and he was pounding a punching bag," paunchy Parr reported, "and I realized it must have been he who punched the hole in my wall." Caslow only said, "what's going on? The guy's an RA, you'd think he'd be able to protect his own stuff. Pretty funny, huh?"

Do's and Don'ts

WC News Bureau

After our series last semester on how to take your own pictures, several of our readers wrote in to thank us for providing them with everything in the world they needed to know about photography. We recently discovered, however, that we left out a few important details. Some of the "do's and don'ts" of taking your own pictures:

•Close proximity to the subject you wish to shoot is important. Unless you have a powerful zoom lens, your subject should be in the same county.

•The angle is important in sport photography. In lacrosse, for instance, try to position yourself somewhere inside the goal in order to get the best angle on scoring opportunities.

The Lacrosse Player

Lacrosse is a strange sport to many. The following, from the March 19, 1955 issue of the Elm, provide some keen insight into the old Indian game:

Lacrosse is a cooperative team sport. It resembles soccer and football in that it is played on a long field with a center line and two goals at opposite ends of the field. Here lacrosse's resemblance to other sports ends. In other team games, the end line of the playing field sensibly coincides with the goal line, but in lacrosse, players may legally run around behind the goal or anyplace else they desire.

The players live up to the Indian origin of the games. They carry weapons called sticks, wear long gloves like falconers' gaunticts, and don helmets as war bonnets. With fringes on the gloves, feathers on the helmets, and buckskin uniforms, they'd be real redskins. They manipulate a small, hard ball around the field with these strange sticks, which are long wooden poles with rawhide pockets on one end.

These athletes speak a strange language, babbling about "pick, crease, feed, face-off, and check". The last is an order for one man to quickly whack another with his stick.

The men on the team race up and down the field like Olympic track stars, dismember as many opponents as possible, emit ferocious war whoops, and eventually hit the goalie with the ball. If they miss him, and the ball goes into the goal, they have scored a point, but the object of the game is to kill the goalie.

The goalie's job is to get in the way of the ball and to broadcast a play-by-play description of the game. At half time he advertises Gillettee Blue Blades!

The lacrosse player opens his eyes in the morning to gaze fondly upon his stick. At breakfast he talks about whether or not the field will be muddy that afternoon. During classes he doodles around his notes. He drinks quarts of milk and orange juice. At noon, table conversation concerns who will play first string that afternoon and how many guys will be back from the injured list. For his afternoon classes, the lacrosse addict dons his baggy sweat pants and sweat shirt and marches to class nursing his precious stick under his arm. In rain or shine practice is held, and the mad lacrosse player runs miles and miles around the track, performs strenous exercises, and scrimmages (runs, shouts, and boats others to a pulp for several hours). Then he runs a few more miles of track and staggers exhausted to the gym.

When the poor boy comes to dinner, he brings his sacred stick with him, and along with his food he digests plays, errors, and events of the day's practice. After dinner, when he associates with girls for the first time during the day, he makes stimulating conversation about what's wrong with the second string attack, how to get around a certain defenseman, etc. The poor girl can't get a word in edgewise. (That kills her.)

Curfew time for lacrosse players is 10:30, but most girls who date them are escorted back to the dorm at 8:00 so that their boy friends can "really hit that sack and be ready for practice tomorrow!" One young lady was being escorted home from a formal dance at 10:15 by a mid-fielder. Despite the fact that she had 1:00 permission and had danced only forty-five minutes, she had had a very pleasant evening until lacrosse entered the picture. At the door, the young athlete shook her hand vigorously and said, "I'd like to kiss you good-night, but I can't. I'm in training."

No other game is so physically dangerous as lacrosse. At every practice at least three men leave the field because of sprained joints, mild concussions, or exhaustion. The chronic ailments— weak ankles, shin splints, sore muscles, charley-horses, dislocated joints, and bruises—never cease. By the end of the season the whole team is held together by stitches and adhesive tape.

That's the life of a lacrosse player. But despite all the agony there's something about the game that makes it well worth the trouble. See you at the first game!

I'LL WALK YOU HOME

Emmanuel returned tired but happy. He had come back to his village, Nyabihanga in Tanzania, after accompanying his friend to the next village, seven miles distant, just to say goodbye.

Walking 14 males. Not many of us would make that kind of roundtrip to say farewell. But, according to Maryknoll missioner Fr. Joe Healey, the custom of "sindikiza," or escort, is an old African custom—a witness to the core African value of maintaining relationship.

Father Healey reports that when friends come to visit in rural areas of Africa, the host will walk them half way back home as a gesture of respect and friendship. The amount of time spent, the personal discomfort, the work left undone, all are secondary considerations. The person comes first.

"The European or North American is job oriented, a methodical prisoner of his plan and his time," says Zairean Catholic priest, Benedict Kabongo. "In single-mindedly following his plan, he cannot readily understand the African worker or driver who makes a detour to say hello to a friend or visit a relative. While the North American counts the time lost and the expense involved in the detour, the Zairois is happy to have used that time in what for him is of the essence—maintaining ties."

During a vacation, Father Healey visited the Tanzanian Ambassador to the United States whose daughter is a nun in Tanzania. It was a cold February afternoon, but when the priest prepared to leave, the ambassador's wife insisted on accompanying him to the car. He protested, but she said quietly, "It is our custom.. Then she laughed and told how her American friends say goodbye to her on inclement days. They peer through the glass panel in the front door and wave goodbye without stepping out into the cold.

A white priest working in a black parish in Detroit told me about one of his home visitations. After bringing Holy Communion to an elderly sick man in his apartment, the man's wife insisted on walking the priest not only to the front door of the apartment house, but the two blocks back to the rectory. She was living out the customs of her African roots.

Fussell: "There is only literary history"

by PETE TURCHI
News Editor

"To bring out the truth in anything we must use the carriage of fiction."

This statement by Dr. Paul Fussell, professor at Rutgers and author of The Great War and Modern Memory, summarized the basic theme of his lecture "The Fiction of Fact" given Wednesday night. Fussell, author of several other books and contributor to The New Republican, said that he agrees with Wright Morris, who says that "anything processed by memory is fiction." This means, he said, that certain types of writing such as corporate statements, military orders, speeches and legal arguments, while considered purely factual, actually contain elements of fiction.

Fussell said that while artistic potential is only acknowledged in writing labeled fiction, he is interested in studying "factual" writing. He used as his example memoirs, more specifically memoirs of men in wars. Fussell said that this is an example of what author Vladimir Nabokov calls, "that delicate meeting place between imagination and knowledge."

The two books which Fussell referred to were Edmund Blundon's Undertones of War and Robert Graves' Goodbye to All That. He said that decades after these books were written American writer Kurt Vonnegut, when attempting wo write about his own war experiences in what was to become Slaughterhouse Five, said that he thought he would only have to repeat what he wrote, "but found it impossible to do without an artistic scheme."

In Graves' book one can see the recurring images of poppies and roses, as well as larks and nightingales. Although other birds and flowers existed, these were always mentioned. The reason for that, according to Fussell, is that soldiers borrowed the symbols used in English literature since as early as Chaucer. Fussell said that "we must marvel at the ability of the general public mind of constructing a symbolism for itself."

Fussell said that Graves employed techniques from the theatre to delineate character, and that his dialogue was not paraphrased but reported verbatim, which is obviously impossible. He also said that "critics have called it a direct and factual biography, but is is actually a satire. It exposes 70. of its characters as either knaves or fools." While he said that the book, if it were indeed pure fact, would be of some worth, it is more valuable because "its structure keeps it alive. It is not true in the documentary way." As a final word Fussell said that in the book "Graves is trying to create an effect."

Fussell called Undertones of War a "true memoir. To Blundon both the countryside and the literature are equally alive." Fussell also said that the book helped to demonstrate that we use certain things to help us remember events. These notes, diaries, smells, tastes, etc. are all "intellectual metaphors and schemes. Without the schemes narrative recall cannot take place." He also said that we remember things in which situational irony occurs; that is, important instances in which we can imagine incidents taking a drastically different turn if only one thing had been different.

Fussell said that we may conclude that "there is no history, only literary history. Our knowledge of historical incidents must be from the makers of data. All documents have no greater truth function than other verbal modes (of recording events)."

The hour-long lecture, attended by over 45 people, was sponsored by the Sophie Kerr Committee.

Anderson: "There has to be some feeling"

by PETE TURCHI
News Editor

Tuesday night the Sophie Kerr Committee sponsored a lecture by noted playwright, screenwriter and novelist Robert Anderson.

Anderson, whose talk was entitled "Writing for Performance," spoke about writing and his experiences working in the theater. Although 62, the author of Tea and Sympathy, I Never Sang for My Father, Double Solitaire, and other plays, has a strong, pleasant voice. He recounted endless anecdotes during his hour-and-a-half talk, and ended it with a short question-and-answer session. He said that after recently writing his first play in eight years, during which time he wrote novels, he once again discovered that "Playwrights are sentimental—we all love each other and want each other to succeed." He also said that despite his reputation and the success of his past plays, it is still as difficult for him to get a play produced as it would be for a younger playwright.

During the talk he emphasized that although playwrights are often unknown to casual theatregoers, the cooperation between the producer, director, playwright and the actors is integral to the success of a play. He defined a writer in general as "a person who functions in a certain part of life, sees what has happened to him, and has the skill to communicate." He also said that while he is often tempted to sit down and write a farce or a play he knows will be accepted commercially, he is only able to write about things which come from his emotions. "When I talk to new playwrights I say, 'What are you trying to express?'" he said. "There has to be some feeling." He said that this close relationship makes the communication from the writer to his audience "intimate." "Writing is exposing yourself," Anderson said, "but that doesn't mean that fiction is autobiography. There must be a leap of imagination." He added that while this was true for all fiction writing, screenwriting and playwrighting are very different. "As a screenwriter, you are an employee," he said, whereas a playwright, under the rules of the Dramatist's Guild, has total control over the production of his play. Anderson's talk was filled with epigrams and quotes by F. Scott Fitzgerald, Ernest Hemingway, Ingrid Bergman, Henry Fonda, John Steinbeck, and various other members of the writing and theatrical elite. When he is most discouraged, however, Anderson said that he sits back and looks at a sign hanging directly over his desk which says simply, "Nobody ever asked you to be a playwright."

New computer arrives two months early

by PETE TURCHI
News Editor

The Computer Center, once characterized by the tapping of keyboards and the machine gun-like spatter of the printer for the IBM 1130, is now filled with a great mechanical hum.

The humming comes from the new PRIME 550 computer which, according to Mathematics and Computer Science Department Chairman Richard Brown, arrived two months early. "It was in the middle of the floor in cardboard boxes, and the students couldn't get to the 1130," he said. "It was an impossible psychological situation—they had to squeeze around the boxes, knowing they contained the new computer. Impossible."

Brown proceeded to call the computer company in McLean, Virginia and found that to install the computer the rug in one of the rooms in the Computing Center had to be replaced with linoleum to prevent problems with dust and static electricity. Also, a 230volt power line had to be installed. Brown said that Maintenance Director Ray Crooks put the power line in the same day he was made aware of the need for it, and persuaded a local contractor to install the linoleum the very next day.

Forty-eight hours later the system was operating.

Although there are one or two very minor problems, Brown calls the new computer, "A tremendous success." He said that in the afternoons and nights since students began using the machine (March 24) all six terminals have been filled, although the Center is much less busy in the early morning and evening. He also said that he is currently discussing the possibility of installing an additional terminal in one of the dormitories next fall, on what would be the "math floor." Several offices in the administration are also interested (in getting terminals)," he said, "it's only a matter of finding the money." He added that he feels the funds will be available, "if President McLain had done very well finding money for the new computer."

The only problem with the machine's early arrival is that Brown said he "didn't know everthing (he) needed to know about it" before it came. He expressed his pleasure at having it working so quickly after it's delivery, though: "I guess you could call it the Miracle on College Avenue."

Junior-Senior Day "success" despite rainout

by KATHY STRECKFUS
Assistant Editor

Over 180 juniors and seniors from 49 Maryland high schools attended Junior-Senior Day on Saturday. The day was dampened, the lacrosse game versus Denison was cancelled due to rain.

Director of Admissions Mickey DiMaggio, a former Washington College lacrosse coach, said, "I was appalled that the game was cancelled. I have played lacrosse in mud up to my ankles. I have played lacrosse in a blizzard. I know some of the townspeople were livid."

DiMaggio said, however, that the cancellation did not interfere with the success of Junior-Senior Day. "I don't think it had an effect on the day, based on the response I got from the parents. They felt they learned a lot about Washington College and about colleges in general."

Invitations were sent to high school students who have made inquiries about Washington College but who have not applied for admission. It was a "totally different group of peole from those who will attend Pre-Freshmen Day," according to Assistant Admissions Director Allison Miller. Pre-Freshmen Day, for high school seniors who have been accepted to the College, will be April 12.

Events of the day included a Welcome in Tawes Theatre, seminars for each of the academic divisions—Humanities, Formal Studies, Socail Sciences, and Natural Sciences, tours of the campus in the rain, and a question-and-answer session with the Admissions staff and the Financial Aid staff.

Shoremen say they lost a win in Denison mix-up

by GEOFF GARINTHER
Editor-in-Chief

After blowing a seven-goal lead and ultimately losing 12-11 to Denison last year, the lacrosse team was looking forward to getting revenge this year. But heavy rains and what many players were calling "bad communication" were the only winners last Saturday when the re-match was cancelled due to poor playing conditions.

"We feel absolutely positive we lost a win," said Shore Head Coach Bryan Matthews. The game cannot be made-up.

It could, however, have been played in nearby Wharton that day, according to Matthews.

As Matthews tells it , Athletic Director Ed Athey promised Denison Coach Tommy Thompson a verdict on the playing conditions within half an hour of their discussion at 9:30 Saturday morning. Matthews, having found the fieldunplayable here but dry enough in Wharton, was in touch with Thompson twenty-five minutes later, only to find that some Denison players had already left for home in Ohio.

"Sitting here," said Matthews Tuesday, "it's hard to understand that their communication system is that bad."

Several Shore players said they felt Denison had "backed out" of the game, but Co Captain Timmy Hollywood said, "You can't really say that," pointing out that many relatives of Denison players had travelled from as far as Ohio and New York for the 1:30 p.m. game.

"It really was a win, though" said Hollywood, "but now we don't play them unless we meet in the playoffs."

Stickers lose in overtime, 13-12

by KEVIN O'CONNOR

When tne monsoon season hits the Eastern shore, it becomes unpredictable for outdoor sports. Such was the case last Saturday when the Shoremen were to take on Dennison of Ohio.

But Wednesday afternoon the Shomen did host St. Lawrence. Although the day was beautiful, the outcome of the game was gloomy—St LawrenceIS WC 12.

The Shoremen were handed a defeat last year by a less than average team in Dennison. St. Lawrence seemed to freshen such memories. It was a simple matter of overconfidence. The Shore 10 started the game very unsure of their opposition's potential. Washington banged a few goals in and realized the team was no match for its refined talent. From then on it was downhill. Washinton's dominance of the game had turned into St. Lawrence momentum and they were coming on fast.

After the first quarter Washington established a lead, always leaving room for St. Lawrence to catch up. At the half WC led by a mere 3 goals, 6 to 3. Once the Shoremen collected their strategies at halftime they came out in the third quarter ready to play. This period was entirely dominated by the Shoremen except for one thing—goals. Offense, defense, groundballs, and time of possession all were controlled by WC, but they just couldn't get the ball in the goal.

By the fourth quarter, both halves of the field (offense and defense) were beginning to feel unsure of themselves, and it showed in their play. The defense did not dominate like they did earlier in the game. They were nearly reaching a point of intimidation simply because of a few let downs and cheap goals by St. Lawrence.

The offense, after dominating one period, did a complete reversal in the forth quarter by not establishing any specific offense. There were a number of key extra-man opportunities but the power play could nt ot convert any.

This left the end of the game approaching with an unsure Washington team and a momentum-building St. Lawrence team. It took no gypsy to predict who wanted that game more. It added another loss to WC's record, bringing it to 1-3 on the season.

If one error that the team made could have been remedied I'm sure it would have made a difference on the outcome of the game. The error wasn't on the field, nor in the score keepers books, nor in the officials. It was mentally within the players, before they ever set foot on the field. The Shore 10 were so confident in winning over a slouch team that they lowered themselves by playing into the hands of their opponents. The stickmen are approaching the heart of the season and have plenty more opportunities to show their stronger side that Washington followers know so well. This Saturday the Sho'men travel to Kutztown St. The next home game is Wednesday, April 9 against Lehigh.

Pitching leads Shoremen to 4-2 mark

byRICH SCHATZMAN
Sports Editor

Most baseball experts agree that pitching is 70. of the sport, and after the first six games, it looks like this year's Shoremen nine are very strong in this area. Two weeks ago, WC opened their regular season with two tough losses to York College. Mark Naser pitched the first game and came away with a 3-2 loss. All the York runs were scored in the first inning. However, Naser settled down and went on to pitch a fine game. The only problem with Naser's pitching was the fact that he got no bat support. Other than Rich Dwyer's two-run home run, the offense was virtually nonexistent. Unfortunately, this carried into the second game as Jim Corey received absolutely no support in a 2-0 defeat.

This hitting problem changed drastically as the Shoremen opened their MAC season Sunday against Swarthmore College. WC humiliated Swarthmore 4-0 and 20-0. Dan Barbierri hurled a twohitter, holding a no-hitter until the sixth inning. Bill "Arch" Hooper pitched a no-hitter until the seventh inning when he finally gave up Swarthmore's only hit in the second game. Dwyer again led the offense with a grand slam homer in the second game—a fine start for the Shoremen in the MAC race.

Last Wednesday WC hosted St. Mary's College as Mark Naser took the hill for his second start. It looked like a re-run of the York game as Naser got himself into a bit of trouble in the first inning. However, he pitched his way out of it, allowing only one run. The Shoremen came back with two in the first when Tim Fagan walked and Rich Dwyer singled. This set up Bruce Abbott's RBI single, then Dwyer scored on a passed ball. In the second inning, Jim Corey opened with a walk and Rich Schatzman followed with a single. Corey scored when he stole third base as the catcher's throw went in to left field. The game stayed 3-1 until the seventh inning when St. Mary's scored one to make the score 3-2. WC got an insurance run in the eighth when singles by Fagan and Dwyer preceded a sacrifice fly by Bruce Abbott. Naser was able to hold this lead and walked away with a 4-2 win, evening his season record at 1-1.

Wednesday, the Shoremen defeated a weak Washington Bible team, 26-6. The team got off to a fast start in the first inning, scoring eleven runs, Dwyer hitting his third home run of the season. Obviously, the game was never close, as Washington raised its record to four wins and two losses.

WC travels to Haverford College tomorrow to play their second MAC doubleheader of the season. A sweep there could start the team toward an MAC title.

SGA plans Second Annual Luau

by KEVIN MAHONEY

The Second Annual Student Government Association Luav will be held next Saturday, April 12 in the Kent Quad. A host of activities are planned for the day.

The Luau will get underway with a "Welcome Sunrise Bloody Mary Breakfast" at 5 A.M. All students are welcome to the breakfast and help roast the pig which will be served later in the day.

The Hawaiian Steel Band will perform authentic Hawaiian music from 3 to 7 P.M. Dave Knowles and Jeff DeMoss from the Dining Hall will prepare Hawaiian dishes. Exotic drinks and a beer wagon will be available.

A limbo contest will be held, and Washington College Natives will wear grass skirts.

S.G.A. President Jay Young said, "The Luau was a success last year. This year we are putting even more effort into it, and we hope to make it a tremendous event."

Hodson would be renovated

SGA proposes student center to Board

by GEOFF GARINTHER
Editor-in-Chief

"They seemed genuinely interested," said Student Government Association President Jay Young afterhis Committee on Student Facilities last Friday presented to the Board of Visitors and Governors' Buildings and Grounds Committee a proposal to turn the basement of Hodson Hall into a student activities center.

"It's a very solid and impressive plan, and it's hard not to agree with it," said Young of the proposal, which includes a cost estimate, blueprints, and an artist's conception of the renovation.

The Board's Budget and Finance Committee was expected to consider the proposal and its more than $45,000 preliminary cost estimate last Wednesday.

Young said he was "very optimistic" about the Financial Committee's consideration of the proposal. "I have no concrete reason to be so, but I have that feeling because it's been received so warmly by everyone."

"No central place"

The SGA's presentation last Friday came in response to a Buildings and Grounds Committee request for a detailed proposal for the long-sought after student activities center. Young, who offered both a written and oral presentation, told the Committee that "Right now on campus there's no real central place where people can get together and interact socially.

"We really do need a place for socializing. We think it might help the retention problem, and it might also help Admissions."

Young said the major change would be a "restatement of the purpose of the snack bar." In the proposed renovation, the Coffee House would be expanded to include the snack bar, and hours for the multi-purpose operation would be expanded to weekends.

The plan also includes a renovation of what is now the mail room area into a large-screen TV lounge. The office space adjoining the Coffee House would be remodeled into a game room.

A Maintenance Department estimate placed renovations to the interior of the proposed center at just over $15,100. Estimates for demolition and some of the larger interior work brought the total cost to more than $45,000.

Carter hopes to bring up SALT II after election, says official

by GEOFF GARINTHER
Editor-in-Chief

There must and will be a SALT II after Afghanistan was the message from State Department official Barry Schneider Tuesday night in Hynson Lounge.

A Foreign Affairs Officer at the US Arms Control and Disarmament Agency of the State Department, Schneider told a group of about 75 that he has been explaining the SALT II treaty to the public for the past 15 months. Before the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan Schneider said delaying the treaty does not mean that "SALT II is not in the American interst. It was not a favor we did for the Soviets.

"It is our intention to bring it up this year if the 67 votes (needed for Senate approval) look politically likely," Schneider added that this probably will happen sometime after the November election.

"You can see through a newspaper"

Schneider attempted to describe the impact of a nuclear explosion: "If you're fifty miles away at midnight, there's enough light that you can see through a newspaper and feel the heat in your body."

Casualties in a first-strike nuclear attack, according to Schneider, "Would run intotens of millions, or perhaps hundreds of millions, in a matter of minutes."

A large-scale nuclear war, however, is unlikely, said Schneider. "Perhaps the most likely kind of nuclear war would be between a Pakistan and an India, or between a terrorist and a city. Probably least likely would be a surprise attack on the US by the Soviet Union. So long as there are logical leaders that is unlikely.

"The need for a SALT II is to stop proliferation. Imagine a Khomeini with a nuclear weapon."

Limits the Soviets

The treaty not only helps the nonproliferation effort, said Schneider, "but it does put some limits on the Soviets," who he said might be able to double the number of nuclear warheads targeted on the US and its allies by 1985.

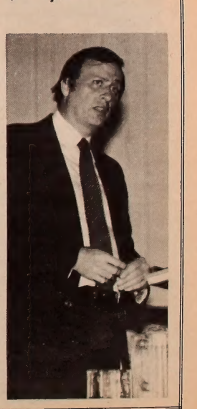
"For those reasons, the Administration thinks SALT II is in the American interest, said Schneider. "There is really no alternative if you don't want an open-ended arms race."

Schneider said that the treaty is not a "zero-sum game," in which one side's gain is another side's loss. "It's one of those rare occasions where both sides win."

Brehznev still leader

During a lenghty question-and-answer period, Schneider said Soviet President Brehznev has "proved himself sympathetic to arms control. Clearly Brehznev is first among equals in the Politburo still. But he's a very old 73-year-old man. It's difficult to predict who will be next."

Schneider also said Americans foster the perception that we are weak. "I think in this country we tend to talk from weakness too much. I think also that we set up the misperception by harping on our weakness."



"If you're fifty miles away at midnight, there's enough light that you can see through a newspaper and feel the heat the day after Christmas, the Carter administration had hoped to gain Congressional approval of the treaty in January, said Schneider, "with an eye toopening SALT II negotiations sometime this summer."

Policy re-evaluation

But the intervention, said Schneider, "caused a tremendous re-evaluation" of US policy toward the Soviet Union, including a delay in consideration of the treaty, an embargo in US grain sales to the Soviets, and the threatened boycott of the Moscow Summer Olympics.

"We have plainly served notice to them that we are quite shocked," siad Schneider.

Building up

The concept of a student center is one that SGA President Jay Young has been pushing for and the Board has been receptive to all year. But, like U.S. Presidents and head coaches, we're urging a "guarded optimism" for those expecting instant success.

By Young's own admission, the current proposal is far from complete. The mechanics of turning the snack bar management over to the College must be worked out. Alternatives must be provided for the offices currently housed in the area to be renovated.

But the biggest problem will be finding $45,000 in an already-completed budget. Last February when Vice-President for Finance Gene Hessey announced a $450 increase in student fees, he said the increase was as low as it was only because of some liberal estimates on endowment and annual giving earnings; we must assume that no additional funds can be found in the current budget for a student center. And past experience with the Hill Dorms' renovation should tell us that outside funding doesn't come easily.

All this is not to suggest that there is anything wrong with the proposal—only that those looking for a student center by the end of the summer may be disappointed. The Board has been willing to endorse new ideas, at least verbally. We'll soon see how quickly, or whether, they will search for the money to back up that commitment.

Nominating process for senior awards explained

by KATHY STRECKFUS
Assistant Editor

The recipients of the George Washington Medal, The Clark-Porter Medal, and the Henry Catlin Medal were elected by the faculty Monday night. The award winners will be announced at Commencement.

The George Washington Medal is awarded to "the member of the graduating class who in the estimation of the President and Faculty shows the greatest promise of understanding and of realizing in his own life and work the ideals of a liberal education."

The Clark-Porter Medal is awarded to the student whose character and personal integrity "have most clearly enhanced the quality of campus life." The award was established by Charles Clark, a 1934 alumnus, in memory of Harry P. Porter, a 1905 alumnus.

The Henry Catlin Medal is awarded to the "man in the senior class who is voted by the faculty to be outstanding in the qualities of scholarship, character, leadership, and campus citizenship."

Before the final recipients of the awards are elected by the faculty during a faculty meeting, the Nominations Committee solicits recommendations from the senior class and the faculty. After obtaining information about each recommendation, the Committee makes a single nomination for each award at the meeting.

Chairman of the Committee Dr. Richard Brown said, "The faculty then may make a nomination, provided that the person has already been recommended. The faculty discusses the nominations and votes. The Committee makes nominations, but not the final choice.

"We try to find out as much information as we can about each recommendation." The Committee obtains information about each recommendation from the Student Affairs Office, the Registrar, and every member of the student's major department.

The Nominations Committee consists of three members of the faculty who are elected by the faculty for a term of two years. A chairman is appointed by the President of the College from among the three elected by the Faculty. Chairman of the Mathematics and Computer Science Department Dr. Richard Brown is Chairman of the Committee this year. The other members are Susan Tessem, Chairman of the Art Department, and Assistant Professor of Political Science Dr. John Taylor. Next year, Chairman of the Chemistry Department Dr. Frank Creegan will serve as Chairman of the Committee.

Letter to the Editor

Support the Shoremen

Since my arrival in Chestertown last September, I've been extremely proud to be a part of the Washington College Lacrosse Program. Rarely in a small college setting, will one find such cherished tradition, exciting game performance, and a die-hard, vocal following of students, faculty, alumni and citizens of the surrounding community. Involved in the lacrosse tradition is the custom of enjoying a cold six-pack on a hot, sunny, spring afternoon. However, along with the privilege of drinking in public, comes the responsibility. I'm speaking of the post-lax game litter problem.

While we do not wish to judge the privilege of drinking at a lacrosse game, or any athletic event, we do see a need to address the problems that arise from it. By and large WC fans are among the best in the country. Yet, at the end of every lacrosse game, the entire Kibler Complex appears a virtual dumping ground. This directlyaffects the image of the entire Washington College lacrosse program, its players, and its coaches.

The Student Body as a whole should feel fortunate that they are permitted to drink during the games. After four years of varsity performance at a college of similar size and accreditation, I have yet to find a school whose policies on drinking beer or alcoholic beverages at outdoor athletic events been as lenient.

The lacrosse team appreciates the loyal support you have shown thus far, this season. We are working hard to continue brunging you an exciting brand of lacrosse. In return, we are hoping for your cooperation in placing your empty bottles and cans in the trash cans provided. With your help we can boost the image of the Washington College lacrosse program, asseen by the faculty and community.

Goodfellow recovering from operation

By KEVIN MAHONEY

Professor of History Guy Goodfellow is recovering from an operation performed at John Hopkins last Wednesday for a detached retina.

Goodfellow is in good health, but will remain at home for the rest of this semester unti his eye heals.

Each ofGoodfellow's three courses will have a separate replacement: Associate Professor of Physical Education Tom Finnegan; Dr. Marilyn Larwy, who has taught at the University of Md. for ten years; and Rich Streiner, a Ph.D candidate from U.M.

proposal outlines "advantages that render (each room) to be both practical and necessary." The Coffee House "needs desperately to be enlarged and improved as it is such a vital part of the social life of the campus," states the summary. "Even a facility thats maximum capacity is approximately 125 service the needs of 700?" The renovated Coffee House would, according to the summary, house lectures, dances, concerts, and movies.

Expansion of the snack bar area would increase revenues, which could then be reinvested in the student center, in the proposal. It would also provide more student job opportunities because the facility, according to the summary, would be a "student operation administered, managed, and supervised by students."

The summary also states that the proposed gameroom's "most attractive aspect ... is that while a much needed service is provided, large revenues are also generated."

The proposed TV lounge would serve a dual purpose as both a television room and an extension of the Coffee House area.

Committee questions included concerns for vandalism and the availability of student assistance. But, Committee Chairman Arthur Kudner said, "I think (the Committee) looks favorably upon such a plan."

Said Young: "There are just so many advantages that it's hard not to like it."

Sophie Kerr Collection on exhibit in library

by PETE TURCHI
News Editor

The door to the Sophie Kerr room in the Clifton E. Miller Library pushes open in absolute silence as only a result of modern engineering could. The room, used occasionally for meetings of the Board of Publications and lectures sponsored by the Sophie Kerr Committee, has the atmosphere of a beli jar; as the door shuts one immediately checks to make sure it hasn't locked, preserving him inside along with countless rare books, documents, and pictures.

We have a reason for being here. Miriam Hoffecker, Assistant Circulation Librarian, called us to say that there would be a Sophie Kerr Collection open house April 15 9 to 4 p.m. This means that everyone—students, teachers, members of the community—is welcome to browse through the collection, which is usually y kept in a series of locked glass cabinets which cover two of the walls. Hoffecker also tells us that the room contains everything in the library's "Maryland collection," old and rare books, books and documents written by alumni and professors over the years, and books Sophie Kerr's writings and personal library. No one seems to know off hand how many Sophie Kerr wrote, but we are assured that the library has "the largest collection of her writings anywhere— and she was prolific." We are also told that the open house is merely a formal invitation; the room is always available to patrons of the library simply by requesting the keys to the door and the cabinets.

It is those keys we hold now as we open the first cabinet inside the door. The room itself seems somewhat hostile, but as the cabinet opens an old, light brown volume virtually jumps into our hands. Carefully, like one trapped in a cemetery, we open it. It is, appropriately, the very first issue of Parley's Magazine For Children and Youth, dated March 16, 1833. Its very first words are:

If a stranger were to knock at your door, and ask some favor, you would first look him in the face, and then decide whether you would grant it or not. Now I, Parley's magazine, am a stranger. I come before the reader, and like him who knocks at your door, I ask you to take me in.

And we do. More at ease, we find in the same cabinet as Parley's Magazine The Life of Catherine II published in 1802, all three volumes of The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, and an 1801 edition of Memoirs of the Reign of George III. Duly impressed, we lock the cabinet and go on. A slim volume wedged between two short, fat books claims our attention. It is a handwritten copy of Lectures by Dr. Lyman Atwater on the Sciences of Logic and Mental Philosophy. The books near it range from other works on philosophy to the complete works of Lord Byron. The very thinnest book we see is an Appendix of Epigrams by Robert Herrick, with a note warning us that Herrick's coarser epigrams and poems are included in this appendix. A few decent, but somewhat pointless, epigrams have been added.

Honesty, no doubt, of an earlier century.

Written with somewhat the same sense of humor is a large book entitled Characteristics of Women which we thought would help us with our campus social life until we realized that it was written by none other than a member of that very species. Two of the most beautiful books we found were Oliver Goldsmith's Poetical Works and The Complete Works of William Shakespeare, both of which feature gold-tinted pages and pictures, though the latter collection boasts specifically of ...new and finely executed steel engravings, chiefly portraits in character of celebrated American actors, drawn from life, expressly for this edition.

A glass case in one of the walls contains various letters from College officials as well as one document which spans the bridge of time—a list of unpaid tuitions from 1800.

An unexpected find was the works of James M. Cain, whose father (James W. Cain) was once President of the College. The younger Cain attended the school in the early 1900's and went on to write several books, and several of them have been translated into Spanish, French, German, and, as far as we could tell, Chinese. One of the volumes, The Root of His Evil, was translated into L'amour di Carrie, which has a buxom, Anglo-Saxon blond open-mouthed on the cover. Cain was born in Annapolis but moved to California where, according to his biographical sketch, he "has written novels and done moving-picture work."

The highlight of the collection for the College is, of course, the work of Sophie Kerr, the prolific author who published books and short stories, had her books serialized in leading women's magazines, and who says in a note in As Tall As Pride that,

The human and animal characters of this book are entirely fictitious and any similarity to actual people, cats or horses is purely coincidental." There are over 20 volumes of Kerr's work in the Collection, and over 50 books by Cain. All of the books, after all, are much more accesible than we had expected. There is The British Plutarch, published in 1776, and John Barth's Sotweed Factor and many in between.

We lock the last cabinet, realizing that we have skipped over the vast majority of the Collection. The books have stayed bound, inviting, waiting to be read, some of them, for over one-hundred and fifty years. As the door swings into place—whispering against the carpet, now that we listen for it —and we lock the room behind us, we know that friends like Parley's Magazine will remain for a while to come, probably long after we have gone. They will be waiting there Tuesday.

Shoremen even record with Kutztown, Lehigh victories

by KEVIN O'CONNOR

The last two outings of the Shore 10 proved to be positive ones, as they trounced Kutztown State and Lehigh University. Coming off two straight tough defeats from Johns Hopkins and St. Lawrence, WC was in desperate need of a win. Their upset loss to St. Lawrence had depleted a once strong and confident team. These last two victories may, however, become a catalyst for an even better and stronger Lacrosse unit.

The long bus ride to Allentown, Pa., home of Kutztown St., was not a premonition of the type of ride back. A victory always makes that latter trip easier and that's exactly what the stickmen accomplished.

This game was, to say the least, a must-win for the Shoremen, at the time sporting a 1-3 record.

Kutztown was the type of team that had a few good individuals but lacked team depth. This was evident in the latter part of the game when WC's well-conditioned club pulled away from battered and exhausted Kutztown. Our physical strength showed on ground balls, which we won 61-36; shots, 46-26; and face-offs, 13 out of 21. The extra-man special team is improving and upped its percentage by getting 2 goals out of 5 opportunities.

The outstanding players of the game for Washington were Jeff Kauffman with 3 goals, 2 assists, Paul Hooper 3 goals 1 assist, and Billy Hamilton 2 goals and 1 assist. Ben "Bear" Tuckerman received player of the game honors for scoring 2 goals and for being consistent on faceoffs and ground balls. Bruce Winand had an excellent game, making saves.

Leigh University visited Chestertown on Wednesday for the Stickmen's second game in a week. Their team is known for its size and speed, so the Sho'men practiced hard for a physical and fast game and it payed off in victory. WC dominated the game from the very first faceoff and Leigh was never in contention. The important factor of this game was that the Sho'men were consistent, playing well the entire game. A few times, mistakes occurred and it cast our team goals offensively and defensively. But it never got the team down and they went right back to playing good lacrosse.

Lehigh, like Kutztown, was not a deeply-talented club. They had certainindividuals who were good, and the teamwas potentially capable of beating WC. But as mentioned before, the key was consistency. Capitalizing on their mistakes, and eliminating ours, put more goals on the home side of the scoreboard. The extra man unit is still not where it should be in getting only 2 goals out of 10 opportunities. There was good movement and the plays were run well but theball couldn't be put in the goal. The offense also moved very well, giving them the opportunity for 42 shots. This gave the team a lot of trouble in its St. Lawrence defeat, but they appear to be running plays smoothly, and, more importantly, scoring goals from them.

Lehighs goals came when the defense broke down and got away form fundamentals. Too many goals came off fast-break situations where defensemen were caught too far away form the goal. This is a fundamental mistake and can only be corrected corrected by concentration and eliminating mental breakdowns. This applies to the number of penalties as well. Leigh scored 4 of its 8 goals on extra-man opportunities (4 of 11 extra-man goals). If the penalties are cut down the goals they score will obviously go with it.

The players who contributed the most in its win are Paul Hooper, 2 goals, 5 assists; Dickie Grieves, 1 goal, 4 assists; and Chris Cox with 4 goals. The consistency of Lecky Haller, Willie Herring and Frank Felice also provided the team with those two victories. Jim Bradley and Ray Cameron added considerably to the defense. Bruce Winand had another excellent game, making 10 saves in a little over 3 quarters.

The Sho'men are sporting a two-game winning streak and look to increase it to 3 tomorrow against Delaware. The University of Delaware, a Division I team, only squeaked by WC last year by a couple of goals in the last few minutes of play.

Shoremen sweep one, lose another in doubleheader action

by DAN HUDSON

The Shoremen dug a hole for themselves last Saturday by dropping an important MAC doubleheader at Haverford College. Figuring on a split at the very worst, Athey's team must now look to sweep a tough conference opponent like Ursinus of Hopkins. The losses, by scores of 5-4 and 2-1, give WashingtonCollege a 2-2 record in conference play.

Fireballing redhead Arch Hoopes took the loss in the first game. After getting in trouble with 2 first-inning walks, Hoopes proceeded to surrender 4 runs on a 2-run single and a 2-run homerun before he could get the final out.

Four homeruns, all solo shots, enabled the Sho'men to get back into the game. Rich Dwyer and Chris Kiefer clubbed back-to-back homers in the top of the second. Dwyer collected his second a couple of innings later, giving him 5 of the year. And Rich Schatzman cracked his first of theyear in the top of the seventh. Normally, offensive power like this would assure a win with Hoopes on the mound, but an unearned run in the sixth, resulting from catcher Glenn Gillis' throwing error, sealed the win for Haverford.

The second game was over with quickly as the Shoremen bats fell silent in the clutch. Right-hander Ban Barbierre went the distance allowing only 2 runs and was saddled with his first loss. The Sho'men were missing the big inning all day due largely to the inability of the lead-off men to get on base. Schatzman, Tim Fagan and Bruce Abbott all had problems at the plate, leaving Dwyer and Keifer with no one to knock home.

Tuesday's doubleheader sweep of UMES got WC back on the right track. Eratic pitching by the visiting UMES team led to a 20-6 rout by the Shoremen in game one. Winning pitcher Barbierri, in relief of Mark Naser, helped his own cause by knocking in a couple of runs with a pair of hits, including a booming double off of the "snow-fence monster in left.

Game two on Kibler Field saw some good pitching by Jim Corey and timely hitting by his teammates in 3-2 win. Abbott singled in the fourth inning, stole second, and scored on Kiefer's single up the middle. Kiefer moved all the way around to third on a series of bad throws and freshman Kevin Beardpulled off a squeeze buntto plate him with run number two. UMES later tied the game with two unearned runs, but the Sho'men pulled it out in the sixth when a bases loaded walk pushed across the winning run.

The Shoremen are now 7-4 on the season. The next home game is Saturday at 1 p.m. against Farleigh Dickinson University of Madison, New Jersey.

Track team alters schedule to match low turnout

by SHAWN ORR

Due to a seeming lack of interest in running, Coach Don Chatfelier is not overly optimistic about the future of this year's track team. With only eight people on the team and seventeen track and field events, there is really no realistic way thathe could be optimistic when talking about track at the team level.

The low trunout gave rise to some changes in this year's schedule. Dual meets were eliminated because Washington College's eight runners would not possibly do well against some other team that could have as many as thirty members. This presented a problem for the Sho'men because each team has to meet a specific track team requirement: that is, they have to enter into a certain number of dual meets in order to loqualify for the championships and the Penn Relays. "Chatty" applied for and received, however, a special waiver in order to forego this requirement and still be able to have the team run in the championships. So this year, the team will be running in open track meets.

This year's team features sophomore Guy Sylvester, defending conference champ in the 400 meters and the mile relay team, which finished fourth last year out of twelve teams in the Penn Relays. Other members on the team are Ron Wright, Doug Brown, and Bernie Kelley. Running the 800 meters is Dan Beirne. In the 100 and 200 meter races is Richard Amirikian and Peter Northrop. Jeff Lucas is in the 10,000 meters. The lone weight man, specializing in the shot-put, is Jim Hibbert.

The team's first big test will come tomorrow, when they enter the Messiah College Invitational with sixteen other schools.

Proposed student center stirs controversy

by GEOFF GARINTHER
Editor-in-Chief

The Student Government Association Monday night passed a motion endorsing the proposed student center, after defeating a motion that would have abolished a petition designed to show student support for the center.

In the wake of the SGA's meeting, snack bar manager Ruth Dickerson said Tuesday she will resign at the end of May. "I don't want to go," she said, "but I don't think (the students) want me here."

Controversial change

The controversy surrounding the snack bar and the SGA-circulated petition arose following the SGA's presentation to the Board's Buildings and Grounds Committee of plans for the proposed renovation of the Hodson Hall basement.

The major change in the proposal, SGA President Jay Young told the Committee, would be a "restatement of the purpose of the snack bar." In the proposed renovation, the operation of the Coffee House and the snack bar would be combined under the College.

Objections to student operation

SGA Social Chairman Bill Baldwin voiced the loudest objections to the proposal at Monday's meeting. "The Coffee House is losing money, and if you put students in Miss D's, you'll lose money. You're crazy to give students another thing when we're losing money year after year in the Coffee House."

But Young said the expanded operation would not be solely student-run. "It's a hard thing to say, but this thing could not be run by students. It would be run the way the food line is, the way the dishroom is."

Baldwin also objected to a petition circulated among students earlier this week endorsing the proposal.

But Young said the petition was necessary because "the Board kept asking for a reassurance that this was in fact a proposal from the student body, not just my idea."

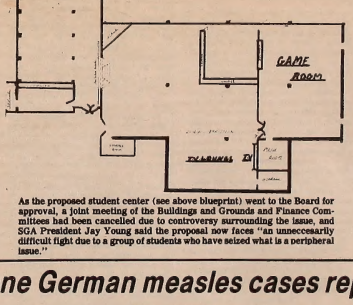
Baldwin's motion to abolish the petition was defeated, 16-5.

Snack bar opens late

When the snack bar opened more than two hours late Tuesday morning, Dickerson's daughter, Sharon Hurd, said, "Miss D didn't want me to open. She was too upset, because she didn't think the kids trusted us."

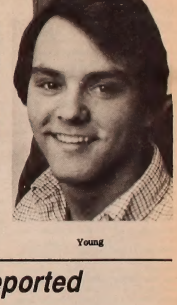
Hurd said she's "all for a student center. They do need what they're asking for. Jay's been in to talk to us about it, and we want to work with him."

Hurd added, however, she thinks the situation's been handled "poorly. Alot of kids had the idea they were just going to take over the whole downstairs."



But Hurd said that was not the case, and, although she thinks the proposal needs work, "We will work along with them."

Dickerson, however, maintained that she plans to leave at the end of May.



"I don't want to leave," she said, "but I don't want (the students) to think I've cheated them."

Dickerson

As the proposed student center (see above blueprint) went to the Board for approval, a joint meeting of the Buildings and Grounds and Finance Committees had been cancelled due to controversy surrounding the issue, and SGA President Jay Young said the proposal now faces "an unnecessarily difficult fight due to a group of students who have seized what is a peripheral issue."

Forty-one German measles cases reported

by PETE TURCHI
News Editor

A sore throat, swollen glands, headaches, stiff joints, a fever, and, most of all, a dark red rash are all symptoms of rubella, currently at epidemic proportions on campus.

Approximately 41 students have or have in the last 3 weeks had the disease also known as German measles, according to the College Health Service. While rubella is not particularly harmful for most people, it can cause severe congenital defects in babies if the mother contracts the disease within the first three months of pregnancy. The severity of these birth defects make any rubella epidemic potentially disastrous.

German measles are highly contagious and can be passed simply by coming near someone who has the disease. The reason that it spreads so quickly is that a carrier can spread the disease from a week before the rash (which usually lasts approximately 3 days) appears until a week after it leaves. Also, someone who has already had the disease or who has been inoculated can still act as a carrier while not actually suffering from the disease himself.

Inoculation does prevent contraction of the disease in a very high percentage of cases. College Doctor Gottfried Baumann says that only 78 students attended the inoculation clinic this past Monday morning (See box). The disease will in all probability not stop circulating until everyone who has not had it or who has not been protected against it contracts it. For this reason it is in the students', the community's, and all others with whom members of the College community come in contact, best interests that the disease be stopped as quickly as possible, says Bauman.

Recent epidemics include an outbreak at the Naval Academy two years ago, a mild outbreak in Maryland colleges last year, and the last major rubella epidemic in the United States in 1964, during which over 25,000 children were born blind, retarded, or with other birth defects.

Strictly Business

Students this week demonstrated a remarkable facility for disregarding their own best interests. With a $45,000 student center hanging in the balance, many seemed less concerned with the availability of funding than with who will cook the hamburgers at the snack bar if the center is built.

Contrary to what one student writes this week, the SGA has a perfect right to "question the business practices of a facility leased and run by what they have themselves called an outside interest," particularly when the outside interest in question resides on College property.

A sentimental interest in retaining the current management of the snack bar means little in what is ultimately a business decision—something even Ruth Dickerson recognizes. The current management should be retained if it proves best-suited for the type of operation proposed—not because of simple tradition or nostalgia.

A real cause for student fervor would be the Board's failure tomorrow to back up its verbal commitment to improve the quality of student life. The snack bar issue is a small tempest in comparison.

Letter to the Editor

"An affront to Miss D"

In light of the recent furor concerning the renovation proposal for the basement of Hodson Hall, we wish to express our solid support for what the SGA is trying to accomplish. It is clear to us that a less dingy student lounge would significantly contribute ot the resolution of the College's problems with the attraction and retention of students.

We feel, however, that the plan is an affront to Mrs. Ruth Dickerson. "Miss Dee" has operated the College snack bar for 27 years, and has become an institution in the process. Aand the way, she has assisted many a student in need with loans or credit, and we feel that to throw her out would be an incredible example of ingratitude.

We hope that this has been an error of omission, rather than one of commission, but either way it is plain that Mrs. Dickerson's contribution have been overlooked. We counter-propose that she be included in the new student center, along with the up-graded furnishings and the new floor plan proposed by the SGA. The inclusion of her managerial skills will prevent a decline of services which has occured in the Coffee House since the departure of the founding managers.

Most importantly, let us proceed on this matter one step at a time. Perhaps this proposal was spring upon people too quickly. The acts of the departments of the student body, such as the theft of the (unanimously approved) Talbot House petition from Jay Young's room, seem to indicate a rashness and irrationality on the part of those in the arena of meaningful change. We feel that a compromise solution, such as that which we have proposed, is attainable, and we urge the student body, as well as the powers that be, to forthrightly consider it.

Sincerely yours,
The Brothers of Lambda Pi Delta

Let's get the student center first

This Saturday, the College Board of Visitors and Governors will meet to decide whether to appropriate funds for the renovation of the basement of Hodson Hall into a new student center. The proposal of this renovation was drawn up by the Student Facilities Committee of the SGA, and has already been approved by the Student Senate and the Alumni Council. Some members of the College community, however, apparently have reservations about the practicality and the ethics of this proposal.

As to the practicality of the renovation as proposed, the fact is that the proposal is not cut and dried. Modifications or alterations have not been ruled out by anyone. Certainly, no one would disagree that the proposed student center would be superior to the existing facilities, even if the proposal now before the Board has to be compromised in some ways.

The question has also been raised about the propriety of replacing Miss D and the present snack bar staff. As stated before, the provisions of the proposal are not yet definite. Whether Miss D will continue as proprietor of the snack bar, or students will take over its control, or possibly a combination of the two, is not the question before the Board. Rather, the Board is deciding whether to allocate funds for a student center, or not to leave the basement of Hodson as it is. This decision should not hinge on who runs the snack bar.

Besides these questions, there are other benefits to the students and to the College, that would come of the student center. Regardless of who eventually runs the snack bar, there will be an increase of student jobs on campus. Also, a new student center would be attractive to prospective students. Although this is not a concern to many students here, it is an important consideration, and one that should not be overlooked by the Board. Finally, any improvement in student facilities is bound to improve individual students' attitudes toward the school, and the overall campus atmosphere.

We hope the Board will allocate the necessary funds for the student center, and that students will take advantage of and appreciate this opportunity to improve the campus.

Railroading Ruth

I am thoroughly and completely disgusted with the SGA's actions of Monday night. After attending the meeting—at which I was not allowed to either join the discussion or vote on the question involved because I am not a senator—several points came to mind regarding the proposed renovation of the Hodson hall basement.

The SGA as a student organization has made great strides within the last year in improving the quality of student life, yet as a student organization it does it have a right to question the business practices of a facility leased and run by what they have themselves called an outside interest? Do they have any kind of ethical right to attempt to move a business which has been in operation solely to serve students for two decades and which has become a Washington College tradition? Senator Dorsey equated the decision to the moving of Ye Olde Coffeeshoppe downtown, when the owner of a lease told a business it had to move, yet the situation here is violently different. As students we may say we own the school because we pay tuition but we do not own Miss D's lease—the College and its administrators do and they are the ones who should make such a decision—or even begin to consider it—independent of SGA influence.

The original Student Center proposal, as I understood it, included only the lower half of the Hodson basement—only area which presently houses student run operations and offices. Nothing was said about Miss Dee's. Was it ethical for that Committee to have gone not only behind Miss Dee's back but also to have flaunted parliamentary procedure by circulating a petition for student approval of an action before that petition was approved by the SGA as a whole? True, quite a few members of the Senate were involved with the Committee so some way but they do not constitute a quorum. Therefore, not only an ethical but a procedural question is raised.

Beyond the question of an SGA takeover of Miss Dee's is the question of the sheer feasibility of a student run operation as it has been proposed. Monetarily, Miss Dee has already stated that she does not turn a profit—and if she does is it any business of the SGA? Her employees receive $2.30 an hour and she is open but five and a halfdays a week. If students were employed for a seven day late nighi operation and a salary were added for an administrative supervisor, costs would rise not only for wages but also in terms of energy consumption. Extra hours equal extra money. And where are students to be found who are willing to work for $2.30 an hour at 8 a.m.? All those who are are already employed by the cafeteria. Workstudy programs and extra money sound very nice but personally I can not think of many people on this campus who would be willing to put in that kind of work at those hours. How many realize just how difficult cooking and serving at a snackbar is—to say nothing of running one? If anyone really wanted to work at such an operation there's always the Sub Shoppee and Gino's, and how many students have lowered themselves to work at either?

The Coffeehouse, as it is today, is a prime example of a student operation gone awry—it is beset by sagging attendence, employment problems, destruction, and it is running in the red. Running a snack bar is far more complex—will tit have to be shut down in five years for the very same reasons? One cannot cash a check at the Coffeehouse because so many were bounced. One can not charge at the Coffeehouse. Miss Dee allows both and we should be damn glad she does. It would be impossible for a student run snack bar to do either. Jay Young would not strike near so much fear into the heart of a debtor as does Miss Dee. The thought of serving beer and wine during the day in order to cut down on drinking or to keep drinking on campus is one of the most ridiculous ideas I've ever heard. True, students would be drinking on campus and keeping the money spent on campus, but they would also be drinking during class and study time. It has already been recognized that there is a drinking problem among students—how can the SGA further encourage it. The concept of keeping the snack bar open so that students can eat while they drink has already proved impractical—when the Coffeehouse served food pizza shells and pretzels went stale due to lack of customers. If Jeff DeMoss is made supervisor of the new snackbar we will be opening an extension of the cafeteria. Miss Dee's, as it is, is a departure from Dinner Dave—she orders from different suppliers, has specials of homemade pies and soups, and one is always sure of what one is eating. Would students be willing to pay for cafeteria food as an alternative to the cafeteria?

The SGA is railroading Ruth Dickerson out of business. She has been called an "outside interest" in the SGA meeting of April 14—I personally do not agree. Miss Dee runs the snackbar for the students, she cares about students, and she is an institution at the college. Who else has loaned students money, made them birthday cakes, and raffled off goodies on each holiday? What disgusts me most about this whole business is the lowfacedness of certain SGA senators—who at one moment chat merrily with Miss Dee and the next cut her to the bone. Renovation is one thing— destruction is another.

In my opinion the SGA has become a self-perpetuating monster. Bill Baldwin and Vance Morris should be applauded for not joining the wolves. The SGA and the Committee for Renovation have overstepped the bounds of their power and are railroading Ruth Dickerson out of business—something which has no ethical or constitutional right to do.

Allen: Studying problems of the future

by KATHY STRECKFUS
Assistant Editor

Dr. Dwight Allen posed a question to his audience in Hynson Lounge Tuesday night. If lily pads in a lily pond reproduce by a doubling process each day, so that by the end of the month the pond is choked with lily pads, on what day of the month will the lily pond be half-choked?

The answer is the 29th, because on the last day of the month, the lily pads would double.

"By the time you've noticed you have the problem, the pond is half-choked, and you have only one day to solve the problem," Allen said.

That is why we should study problems of the future, according to Allen. "Energy is a place we're getting choked. Pollution, nuclear control are places where we're getting choked. We have to do something now, before the problems are too awesome to solve."

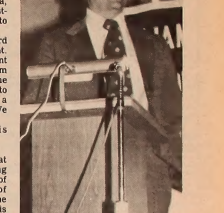
In 1979, Allen was one of 120 scholars from 46 countries participating in a critique of a report to the Club of Rome on global education called "The Learning Report." The Club of Rome, founded in 1968, is a non-political, multi-national group of scientists, humanists, industrialists, educators, and civil servants concerned with the need for a basic reassessment of science and technology. It has sponsored influential studies in such areas as population growth, international order, and world hunger.

Allen said that "The Learning Report" made two major points. The first deals with "anticipatory learning. The Club of Rome says we have to get people to anticipate and act on problems before a crisis."

The second major point is called "participatory learning. We have to involve more people in the learning process. We have a problem with this one. It's easier to teach people how to anticipate things than how to respond to things," Allen said.

One of the solutions, according to Allen, is "to understand a level of interdependence in the world. Nothing happens in the world that does not affect us here in Chestertown."

Allen described four basic views of the future. For some people, the future is like a roller coaster. We are thrown inevitably around the winding, pre-determined tracks. For others, the future is a dice-game—all chance.



The other two views, however, assume some amount of control over the future. According to these views, the future is either like a river, where the course is pre-determined, but one has some control, or like an ocean, where one can choose his destination, and the route.

Allen subscribes to the ocean view. He believes "we can influence our future."

In Germany, France, and Austria, "The Learning Report" was a best-seller. In America, it is difficult to find it in a bookstore.

"In our society, we have a hard time figuring out what is important. Whatever is the crisis of the moment attracts our attention. We go from fad to fad. But the needs don't come and go like the fads. We need to learn how to anticipate, to bring a better balance into our lives. We have to get all of us involved."

"The Learning Report" is published by Pergamon Press.

Four sophomores are Oxford-bound next year

by BILL MORTIMER

During the 1980-81 school year, four Washington College juniors will be studying at Mancester College in Oxford, England. "It's not that Washington College is invading Europe" said one of them.

Freeman Dodsworth, Katie Kuhn, Brian Meehan and Peter Turchi have recently been selected by the Oxford Committee to study abroad during the upcoming school year. Dodsworth and Kuhn will study Philosophy and Meehan and Turchi will pursue courses in English.

Each year the Oxford Committee, composed of Dean Garry Clarke, Mr. Bennett Lamond, Dr. Robert Fallaw and chairman Peter Tapke, select two or three sophomores who are interested in studying areas of English, Philosophy, History, Music or Religion at Manchester. This year, because of the great interest shown by sophomores, an extra admittance was gained, allowing an extra student to go abroad.

The college at Oxford differs from Washington College, and most American institutions, in several ways. While the four students are studying at Manchester they will have to adapt to different studying patterns. The system at Manchester is built around independent study so that students are assigned required readings and, once a week, they must meet with their professor for an hour. Each student takes only one course during the semester. Also there are three semesters in the school year, rather than two.

When the student meets with his or her professor for one hour, a paper written by the student is discussed. This format allows a great deal of contact and individual attention for the student because only one student meets with the professor at a time.

Throughout the course of the day many lectures are offered which, while not required, are considered extremely important. Many well known and educated professors and professionals speak at the college during the day on any number of subjects. The lectures are given mostly in the mornings, to allow students to involve themselves with sports, entertainment and studying in the afternoons and evening.

Recently the four Oxford bound students received their final acceptances from the college. Now they are expected to write in return, stating that they accept and are willing to follow the conditions which the school sets down.

While in Oxford, Dodsworth hopes to be able to study English as well as Philosophy, perhaps devoting two semesters to Philosophy and one to English. He feels that "the independent study will be good...it will give me a lot of discipline."

A current member of the Washington College crew team, Dodsworth hopes to continuehis athletic pursuits at Manchester. "The rowing will be different" he said. "Pressure won't be quite as high but I'll have a lot more exposure to different crews."

England will be his first exposure to the European culture. He hopes to travel to different places over the various breaks, as do Kuhn, Meehan and Turchi.

Both Kuhn and Meehan are interested in Philosophy and English, as well as Art History. Kuhn hopes that "the visually artistic atmosphere of Europe will broaden her scope and "have a possible effect on broadening others scopes when I return."

As a philosophy major, Kuhn looks forward to the diffene different courses offered at Manchester. "It will be interesting for me to study Religion" she said. She noted that Manchester has the largest library available for comparative religion. She plans to study as much religious philosophy as she does secular philosophy.

Meehan, aside from the benefits of education, he is looking forward to experiencing a different culture. Kuhn and Meehan agree that "even though we share the same language, England is culturally different," adding that she expects "some little cultural shocks."

Meehan, an English major, sees the town in Oxford as the campus in a way. "It is probably the most cultural environment in the world. It will be cultural both in the sense of art and of a new way of life." he said.

While at Manchester, Meehan hopes to participate in a literary organization and a drama society. Most of all he is looking forward to having the opportunity to study literature "so much more intensely that the classroom situation allows." In this way he is hoping to be able to direct his interests towards his major field of study, one area per semester.

The entire Oxford atmosphere will be a positive one, says Meehan. However, he says "I'm sort of going without too many expectations...I don't want to try to structure myself before I find out what the structure is."

Turchi, an English major, is also looking forward to his year at Oxford. He hopes "to find out if it's true that England swings like a pendulum do". He also hopes to visit "all the cultural hot spots" such as St. Tropez, the Riviera and Sweden.

"I've never been to Europe before" he said. "I plan on learning a lot and seeing a lot, but I hear that Oxford just can't be compared to Washington College."

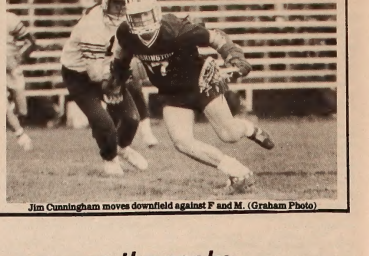
Shoremen take 10-5 win from F&M

by JIM GRAHAM and KEVIN O'CONNOR

It wasn't a must win for Franklin and Marshall Wednesday but it meant advancing in the rankings and a possible play-off spot. It was, however, a must win for the Shoremen. A loss could have meant a postseason vacation, again, for the team.



But the Shoremen took a 10-5 win, with Paul Hooper starting the scoring just 52 seconds into the game. He was quickly followed by Jeff Kauffman and Bill Hamill in the scoring column, and it looked like the streaking Shoremen were in the midst of a rout. But F & M came right back, controlling the ball in the Shore end for what seemed like ages before Bruce Winand came up with a couple of beautiful saves to shut the door.

It was a different story in the second quarter. The Diplomats were storming and tied it up at four with about five minutes left in the first half. F&M couldn't keep the momentum going, though, and with two seconds remaining Ben Tuckerman gave the Shoremen a 6-4 halftime lead.

The second half was Washington's. Chris Anglim, the secondhalf goalie, and the rest of the Shore defense kept F & M to just one goal, securing the 10-5 win.

NOTES: Kauffman and Hamill led the scoring with 3 goals and 2 assists and 1 goal and 4 assists, respectively. Hooper had 1 and 2 and Tuckerman 1 and 1, plus 11 groundballs. Winand (5 saves in one half) and Anglim (6 in one half) ahd good games also.

The Shoremen travel to UMBC tomorrow for a 1:30 p.m. game with the Retreivers.

They can't fool Mother Nature

Winds, Measles have crew on the rocks

by FREEMAN DODSWORTH

The Washington College Crew has taken a beating from Mother Nature this Spring, with three of its first four races being cancelled due to natural causes.

Their first race, which was to be against LaSalle in Philadelphia, was called due to extremely high-winds which forced the closing of the Schuylkill River to all boats. The other two races were with Stockton State, which was to be rowed at home this weekend, and a Tri-meet with the University of Virginia,Duke, and University of North Carolina.

Virginia, which was scheduled for last weekend, was called due to the recent outbreak of German Measles.

The only meet to get off the ground so far this year was the dual-match against George Washington University and Duke in Washington, and even then, the odds were against a good meet.

An extremely heavy tailwind through most of the course made for a fast but choppy race, with quick times, in the sub sixminute range. The Junior Varsity, stroked by junior Charlie Curtis and coxed by beteran Betsy Beard, stroked to a three- second loss in a tight race with a smooth but beatable GW crew. The women's varsity made a good showing with stroke Valerie Marsh and coxwain Molly Meehan guiding the boat to a second place slot behind Duke in a one-thousand meter race. The main event of the day saw our varsity pitted against two tough-looking crews, in what promised to be a competitive race. In the last 500 meters the final turn showed GW ahead by a nose. In the finish, the varsity boat, with Steve Jones at stroke and Captain Court Treuth at seven, with John Towsend, Allen Luthey, Freshman Jeff Landry, Dan Whitaker, Sophomore Richard Cookerly, and Bill Anderson, and with Bart Nathan at cox, pulled to a hair-splitting second place behind GW, a traditional rival.

As for the races that were cancelled due to the outbreak of German Measles, there is some bitter feeling toward the administration by some of the athletes, who feel that the situation was handled in an irresponsible manner.

"I think we were cheated," says varsity coxwain Nathan. "If the school had given the inoculations two weeks ago, when they had first planned, then we would not have had the better part of our season pulled out from under us. As it is, we will only have three races before the season is over."

These sentiments are heard echoing throughout the men's locker rooms now, with cancellations causing serious difficulties for many of the athletic programs. But team captain Treuth feels somewhat optimistic about the whole situation. "I feel that we have the best squad that the school has seen in years, and we'll prove it. Whether it be next week or the week after is unimportant."

But whatever the feelings about the events of the Spring of 1980, it cannot be denied that Washington College Oarsmen have had more than their share of bad luck and misfortune. The icing on the cake came last week when the freshman crew was blown by yet another fierce wind onto the skeleton of the old basket factory whose ruins lie just upriver from the crew's dock. The sharp teeth of the structure caused heavy damage to one of the older shells, the "washburn". This has forced the freshmen to practice in a much older and slower shell, ,complicating the already difficult process of learning for the novices.

Head coach Eric Stoll sums up the unfortunate events of this spring: "When you're snake bit, you're snake bit. Thats all there is to it."

Women's Tennis at 2-3 after five cancellations

by SHAWN ORR

The record for woman's tennis now stands at 2-3—not surprising, since two of the losses have been dealt by Catholic and American universities.

The wins were against Anne Arundel and Essex Community Colleges. They were very decisive at 7-2 and 8-1, respectively. Another aspect of the Essex match that should be noted is the fact that four out of the six matches started out with opposing players splitting the first two sets. TheWC team came back to win all four matches. This six matches have been cancelled, including two major tournaments. With only five matches left, the team will have a hard time getting into the MAC playoffs without a special dispensation.

The situation is also bad for the seniors, since it is their last season to play collegiate ball and they are not getting the opportunity to do so. This could put a damper on the team's morale, so it will be interesting to see how the team fares when it gets back into play.

seems to prove that the team is a solid one, with tough players that are able to bounce back.

Leading the team are seniors Tammy Wolf and Jeanette Bonsack. "They are playing extremely well," says Coach Penny Fall. Rounding out the team are seniors Carol Hood and Janet Sparre and freshmen Bria Beckman and Pam Elliott.

The measles outbreak has affected all the sport's teams and the woman's tennis team is no exception. Five out of

Faculty expresses doubts

Hill renovation to be funded by endowment

by GEOFF GARINTHER
Editor-in-Chief

After failing in attempts to obtain both state and federal funding, the College has announced that it will borrow up to $600,000 from its unrestricted endowment in order to finance the long-awaited Hill Dorms' renovation.

William Brogan, Chairman of the Budget and Finance Committee of the Board of Visitors and Governors, announced at last Saturday's Board meeting that the lastest attempt to obtain a state loan had failed. "In the meantime," said Brogan, "we want to move ahead with the renovations (by) taking some of our unrestricted endowment and lendingit to the College."

All loans refused

The College has been trying to obtain additional funding since 1978, when a $210,000 state grant was matched by a grant from the Hodson Trust. The $420,000 total represents less than half of what the Renovations are expected to cost. In the last two years, loan applications to the Housing and Urban Development Department, the federal Health and Higher Education Facilities Act, and the state have all been turned down.

College President Joseph McLain said this week that the option of borrowing from endowment hadn't been explored previously because "I hadn't thought of it, for one thing."

McLain said he "could have gotten the (state loan) through the legislature, if we had wanted to. (But) if we can borrow from our own endowment...we'll make whatever interest rate is prevailing at the time. Actually, it'll increase our operating revenue."

"The more we put (the renovation) off," said McLain, "the tougher it is, the more expensive it is."

"A prudent decision"

Vice-President of Finance Gene Hessey said that "Given the economic situation, this was clearly the most prudent cision.

"The point to be made is," added Hessey, "if we had borrowed from outside, it would have been necessary to budget for repayment of principal and interest (in a loan)."

Hessey said he plans to let out bids for the renovation May 1, and that construction could begin as early as June.

McLain, however, said he doubts that students will know before leaving for the summer exactly how the relocation plan would work.

"Not a good precedent"

Several faculty members this week expressed doubts about the College's plan to borrow the necessary funding from endowment.

Said Economics Department Chairman Mike Bailey, "The thing that would worry me is I don't think it's a good precedent."

Bailey said the College may face trouble in the recently announced $10.25 million endowment campaign if it has been unable to raise $600,000 for renovation of an existing facility.

"I don't think it's a good way to start an endowment campaign," he said.

Dr. Frank Creegan, Chairman of the Chemistry Department and faculty representative to the Board, said, "It seems to me there are too many con-

Deadline set for writing proposal

by GEOFF GARINTHER
Editor-in-Chief

Dean of the College Garry Clarke and the faculty have been asked by the Board of Visitors and Governors to submit by October 1 a recommendation to resolve the problem of students' inability to write.

A memorandum from the Faculty and Curriculum Committee of the Board states, "The Committee is very concerned that some Washington College students are permitted to graduate with marginal or sub-standard skills and abilities in written English communication."

"Should not award degrees"

"The consensus of the Committee," said one member, Sandy Jones, at last Saturday's Board meeting," is this College should not award degrees to students who are unable to write."

Jones said he did not think an inability to write applied to every student, "judging by the graffiti in the men's room." He also said the probiem was "not essentially the English Department's. The need to write can crop up in any (discipline).

"We feel that if the institution is chartered to award degrees," added Jones, "it has a duty to require a proficiency in order to recommend those degrees."

Jones added that the Committee felt it was not necessary that "every student take 'Comp. 101,' provided he can show a proficiency in that area."

Third clause discussed

In a related development Monday, the Academic Council met separately with members of the Modern Languages and English Departments to discuss the controversial third clause of the Council's proposal to revise distribution requirements, which states:

"Any combination of two literature courses in English, Literature in Translation (with the exception of LT305, Introduction to the Film) and Literature in a Foreign Language may be taken for distribution credit."

Modern Languages Department Chairman Tom Pabon said the clause would correct an "illogical premise" in the present system. "Literature is literature...and should not include just English literature."

"A long period of time"

English Department Chairman Nancy Tatum said the clause is equivalent "to asking us to accomplish in one

Board approves student center "in concept"

by GEOFF GARINTHER
Editor-in-Chief

The Board of Visitors and Governors last Saturday approved "in concept" the controversial student center proposal and referred implimentation of the plan to the Board's Executive Committee.

Board Chairman Robert Roy suggested the proposal is expected to be implemented this summer, saying, "The determination to proceed as promptly as possible...exists."

College President Joseph McLain, however, said this week that "the costs have to be worked out...that's why I worry about this summer."

Problems on problems

Called on to speak at the meeting last Saturday, Student Government Association President Jay Young said, "I think there's really an incredibly overwhelming feeling among students that we need this next year. It's going to be especially hard next year (with relocation of Hill Dorms' residents), and all those problems will be added to the problems we already have."

Young admitted that there was "a lot of dissension with what will happen to the snack bar," but that students felt a definite need for the facility.

"Ever since the plans came out, I've had a large number of students come to me saying we really need this."

A question of money

McLain said at the meeting that "the question of money is an important one. The Budget and Finance Committee is very prudent and wise in saying that...let's find out how much this is going to cost."

It was McLain who suggestd the Board "ought to endorse it fully in concept, then leave it to the Executive Committee to work out the details."

Young said after the meeting that he was not entirely satisfied with the outcome.

"It's unfortunate," he said, "that something that is needed this badly has to come down to a question of financing. The student center is not a question of what we can afford; it's something we can't afford to do without.

"$5,000 is a small sum to pay for what we stand to gain from this."

Apocalypse Now?

The Board of Visitors and Governors last Saturday made decisions concerning three long-standing and inter-related issues:

•Renovation of the Hill Dorms, delayed for two years during a search for outside funding, will now be financed out of the College's endowment—a development that has been known to mark the beginning of the end for an educational institution. The danger lies not in the single act of borrowing from endowment; as President McLain points out, at current interest rates the College will probably save money. It lies, as faculty members suggest this week, in setting a precedent for borrowing from ourselves. Having spent $600,000 of our savings, why not take a little more—another $45,000 for a student center, for example? The decision also poses a danger for the recently-announced $10.25 million endowment campaign. If the College has failed to raise $600,000 for a project as urgent and tangible as building renovations, how can it expect to bring in nearly twenty times that amount to put in a savings account? And does it now become a $10.85 million campaign, since we're supposed to repay the loan we will make to ourselves?

•After the Board's decision last Saturday to refer the proposed student center to the Executive Committee for implementation, one observer said he sensed thirty-six Pontius Pilates washing their hands of the issue. Two weeks ago we warned against being overly optimistic concerning a new student center. President McLain confirmed that this week with his own form of "guarded optimism." Although the President doesn't go so far as to deny categorically that the facility will be built this summer, don't expect to find it waiting when students return next Fall. With the Hill Dorms out of commission, Jay Young's current complaint that students have no place to go will become an even more glaring problem next year.

•The Board's directive the Dean and the faculty to recommend by October 1 a solution to the writing problem here raises an as yet unanswered question: Having just borrowed $600,000 from itself for building renovations, and perhaps having delayed construction of a student center for financial reasons, how willing will they be to find funds for a proposal that almost certainly will cost something? Difficulty financing dorm renovations and student centers is bad enough; difficulty financing academic programs would be an emergency (or, as the Board would say, a "financial exigency").

President McLain is fond of saying that Washington College's primary goal is to teach. Should a lack of money get in the way of achieving that goal, this school will be facing even more than morale problems.

semester something that takes a long period of time"—a reference to current attempts to teach writing skills in the recommended two semesters of Forms of Literature and Composition.

"I don't understand," said Tatum, "why I'm being told to boister students in the writing area, while being subjected to losing in the area of distribution."

Assistant Professor of English Bennett Lamond said that, although he was not in favor of the third clause, "I am also very troubled by the literature distribution as it exists."

Lamond said he thinks the problem arises from "an obsession with the need for composition.

"The students, the Elm, the faculty, and now I understand the Board is so concerned with composition.

"I think we have a confusion, a contradiction, and a terrible situation," said Lamond, "and I think it's because composition looms large."

Letters to the Editor

Stay on campus

Dean of the College Garry Clarke received the following letter late last week:

It is appalling to realize the inability of the students of Washington College to understand the danger which they may be inflicting on the people of Chestertown. Of course, I am speaking of the recent outbreak of Rubella and the seemingly lackadaisical attitude toward the warning to stay on campus.

There has not been a day in the last week that I have not seen college students throughout town, in restaurants and stores!

This is not a pleasant nor easy letter for me to write, being pregnant at the time and having spent so much time at the college lately with piano students. For myself and my baby, well, I am hoping there will be no ill effects. The doctors reassure me that I have a high resistance to the desease and that I am in my sixth month. But for heavens sake, there are so many other pregnant women in the Chestertown area. Odds are that many of them are unaware of their condition before the second or third month. It is in these months that the disease can prove to be most harmful.

Is there nothing more the college can do to convince the students of the horrible seriousness of this desease? Are the students so naive and apathetic that the idea of a seriously deformed child carries no weight with them?! At the risk of sounding bitter, it has not been handled that well from the beginning, having signs posted inside the arts center on the second night of the last drama department production, more than three weeks since the detection of the first suspected case.

If some more authoritative action is not taken soon, it can appear only as total irresponsibility on the part of the college as a whole.

I would be more than appreciative if my views could be make known to the students. Perhaps the concern of a past Washington College student could help to convince them of the awful seriousness of the situation.

Sincerely
Ann Atwater Bourne '78

Do Reagan's misstatements matter?

Reagan, a GOP front runner, seems to pluck his facts from the thin air. Reagan consistently documents his views by misstating facts. Taxes have long been a favorite theme of Reagan's. For example, "Reagan likes to be perceived as a taxcutter, as supporting evidence of this, he rebated $5.7 billion dollars to Californians during his Governorship. This is true, but the rebates came around after Reagan increased taxes by $21 billion, including a quadrupling of the states (sic) income tax."

"Reagan's misstatements cover a wide range. Some examples:

Reagan claimed: 'It cost's (sic) HEW $3 in overhead to deliver $1 to a needy person in this country.' The correct amount, according to HEW, is not $3 but 1¢."

"Reagan claimed: The Federal Government has increased by 131,000 employees in the past three years. The actual increase: 60,000."

"Reagan claimed: The windfall profits tax would cost 1 million bbl. in the US a day in lost production in the first year. The US Government estimate: 100,000 bbl. per day."

"Reagan claimed: Americans could 'have cheap gasoline again by lifting Government restrictions' on the oil industry. Not even the oil industry would buy that."

Reagan not only has unfounded facts, there are the unfounded accusations. "In Kansas, for Reagan declared: 'I have been told that some of the Iranians coming into this country are here to create disturbances and to form terrorist groups, and immigration officials know this because of some of the things they found in their luggage, yet the State Department has said to the immigration people,' Don't rock the boat!' Reporters asked Reagan for evidence of the charge; he was unable to produce any."

Maybe what the Republicans need is someone who doesn't make repeated misstatements, "even after being publicly corrected (as with his exaggerated claim that Alaska has more oil than Saudi Arabia)." But this strategy of misstatements has proved effective and the Republican voters are pulling the Reagan lever. Maybe the facts don't matter, after all.

Parent's Day scheduled tomorrow

by WENDY MURPHY

Contrary to what appears to be the popular opinion on campus, says Dean of Students Maureen Kelley, there is an abundance of activities scheduled for Parent's Day tomorrow.

The day's activities will begin at 10:00 a.m. with registration, coffee, and donuts. An outdoor brunch will be held at noon, and a cocktail party will be held at Hynson-Ringgold House on Water Street.

The planning of the day involved some difficulties said Kelley, but tradition was followed. The event was scheduled on the same day as the Spring Chorus Concert. Kelley said it also had to be scheduled after the Luau and Pre-freshman Day, the biggest public relations weekend.

The brunch will have a party wagon and a bluegrass band for entertainment, and during the afternoon there will be a women's intersquad lacrosse scrimage and a crew race on the Chester River.

Kelley said that she wanted to choose a weekend when the parents and students could spend a nice afternoon outdoors. April was chosen because March was too cold and May is too close to finals and comprehensives. She added that this weekend is being run differently than in past years because the parents seemed to prefer to have more time to spend with their sons and daughters and saw no need for a big dinner.

tradictions when on one hand they're trying to increase endowment by $10 million, then on the other, independent of that, borrowing from that endowment. I think that might not be good public relations for a campaign.

"What bothers me," added Creegan, "is it's a dangerous precedent. It's the easiest way out."

USOC Vice-President Kelly addresses crew gathering

WC News Bureau

A hundred alumni, friends, and members of the Washington College men's and women's crews gathered in Hodson Hall last Saturday evening for the fifth annual spring reunion of the Washington College Rowing Association.

Guest of honor and after-dinner speaker was John B. Kelly, Jr., former Olympic oarsman and currently First Vice-President of the United States Olympic Committee. Following Kelly's talk the Association inducted 17 new members and presented four Distinguished Service Awards. Thomas C. Hopkins '74 President of the WCRA, was master of ceremonies.

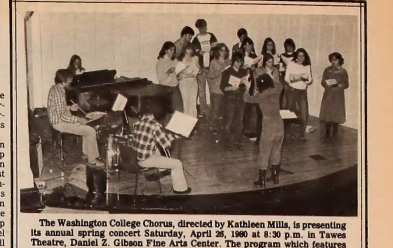
Kelly, who had spoken at crew dinners here in 1967 and 1976, began his remarks by decribing the frustration felt at the recent Colorado Springs meeting of the U.S. Olympic Committee. Kelly described the strong-arm tactics used by the Carter administration to force the Committee to boycott the Moscow Olympic Games. Yet, he said, he himself reluctantly voted for the boycott--"we really had no choice."

On a happier note, Kelly, who is now 52, described his own recent adventures in the new class of "master's" rowing, an annual competition of older oarsmen of which he is the current national champion. He urged the crew to participate in the annual Head of the Charles Regatta in Boston, in which three thousand competitors now participate every year, making it the largest regatta in the world. Finally, he commended the Washington College Crew for its steady progress over thirteen years and expressed his own personal pride in having assisted in its development.

The Rowing Association then presented certificates of membership to 14 former and present participants in rowing at Washington College. The first certificate went to Mary Jane Eavenson '73, the founder of the Women's Crew, who had come down from Massachusetts for the dinner. Three certificates of companion membership went to Ernest A. Cookerly, Samuel Loveland, and Mabel Mumford, all long-standing friends who have assisted the rowing program over the years.

As a result of a Phone-a-Thon conducted by the Office of Alumni Affairs and Annual Giving in early April, 684 alumni have pledged to donate a total of $25,039 to the College, and an additional 370 alumni have pledged unspecified amounts.

The Phone-a-Thon was held to promote the Silver Anniversary of the Alumni Annual Giving Fund.



"We tried to contact every one who had not yet contributed this fiscal year, for whom we had phone numbers," said Director of Alumni Affairs and Annual Giving Jay Vogel. Out of a listing of 5600 alumni, about 3200 phone numbers were availabie.

"Before the Phone-a-Thon, the total amount received was up 20 percent over the same time last year and the percentage of donors was up 15 percent said Vogel.

The goal this year, according to Vogel, is to reach a 40 percent rate of participation. The highest participation in the College's history occurred in 1969-1970, at 39 percent. The national average is 17 percent participation. "We've been above that for years," Vogel said. Last year's participation was about 24 percent.

The callers for the Phone-a-Thon suggested $25 donations, a symbolic of the 25the anniversary. The average specified pledge is $36.60.

The Chairman of the Phone-a-Thon was Priscilla Vallient Ely, a Baltimore alumnus from the Class of 1970.

The Washington College Chorus, directed by Kathleen Mills, is presenting its annual spring concert Saturday, April 26, 1980 at 8:30 p.m. in Tawes Theatre, Daniel Z. Gibson Fine Arts Center. The program which features choral music from Gibbons to Gershwin is free and open to the public.

Consents to interview

Day accepts offer at Iowa

by PETE TURCHI
News Editor

In what was, to his knowledge, his first in-person interview with The Elm, Associate Professor of English Robert Day admitted that he has accepted an offer to teach at the Creative Writing workshop at the University of Iowa next Spring.

Day agreed to give the interview, held during a meeting with one of his senior advisees, only if he was allowed to keep a 10-inch butcher knife between himself and the reporter and if two witnesses were present. When asked about the reputation of the rather well-known Iowa workshop, Day said, "If you've never been there or been asked to teach there, it's a factory where they turn out writers every year. As soon as you're invited to teach there it's the best school in the country, and only the best students are invited to go there." At that point the (female) senior English major asked why there weren't any women novelists in America in the twentieth century, and didn't Katherine Anne Porter write a novel? "She did," Day said. "It was an awful novel."

English Department Chairman Nancy Tatum, in an attempt to clear up the rumor that Day would actually remain on campus for the entire coming year, said that she believed "he was offered a position (at Iowa) for the entire year, but he felt badly about leaving his students. He felt that in the long run, however, the students at the College would benefit from what he would learn at the workshop" in the way of teaching methods and approaches to creative writing.

Tatum said that the College has already advertised an opening in the English Department for the spring and that she expects "a box full of applications. Last time we (filled a position) an open application we had about 200 applications." She went on to say that she is "almost certain (the replacement) will be a writer who has had some experience in the classroom."

Dean of the College Garry Clarke said, "It's a wonderful honor. I'm really proud of him. I've heard people say (the Iowa workshop) is the best workshop in the country. If it's that much of an honor to be asked to go I certainly think a member of our faculty should be able to accept the offer." Day was on leave last Fall, but Clarke said that Day's leaves are unlike those of most other faculty members as they are "uncompensated leaves"; that is, the College does not pay him for the time he spends away. Sabbaticals, on the other hand, are leaves during which a professor is paid one semester at full salary or all year at half salary.

The Iowa workshop currently boasts recently-announced Pulitzer Prize winner Donald Justice, a poet, along with fellow poet Marvin Bell, who spoke at the College last year, two full-time fiction writers who teach, and two writers-in-residence. Day has been invited to join the staff as Visiting Professor and Writer-in-Residence for the Spring semester. When forced by a relentless, news-hungry reporter to elaborate on this, Day waved the butcher's knife menacingly, then, for no obvious reason, startled witnesses with a straight answer. "We've sent students to the Iowa workshop before," he said. "My students no doubt paved my way. I'm in their debt."

A few minutes later, after the interview was over and the reporter was leaving Richmond House, he heard a sound. The reporter jumped. Robert Day was hiding just outside the door. The knife came down, missing him by inches, and he took off.

College receives new slide show

by JIM GRAHAM
Photography Editor

Washington College has a new slide show.

It was recently delivered to Admissions Director Mickey DiMaggio who was pleased with the final product and said he had four ways in which he planned to use the show.

One involved alumni groups getting together with parents of prospective students at relaxed gatherings. DiMaggio also hopes to involve parents of present students in the College's recruitment program. This would involve meetings similar to the alumni plan.

The show will also be shown in high schools visited by admissions representatives. DiMaggio said that he hopes to use it extensively in Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York,, where some prospective e students might find the travel distance prohibitive.

The slide show displays a wide range of the student body and many of the activities on campus. College President Joe McLain does some of the narration, expressing the aims of the College.

Adams Associates of Devon, Pa, which produce the show, may have had a better insight into the College than another company— photographer for the firm, Tee Adams is a former student at the College.

UMBC edges Shoremen, 12-10

by KEVIN O'CONNOR

If the lacrosse team has played its best game of the year thus far, it undoubtedly was the UMBC game last Saturday. The Retrievers, ranked number 1 in Division II, fought for their lives against a scrappy Sho'men ball club before winning 12-10.

The Sho'men were sky high before they ever reached Baltimore, and that feeling carried right on to the playing field. The Retrievers, coming off a big win over Division I power North Carolina, were over-confident. The Sho'men went out ready to put UMBC's swelled heads back into their helmets.

The game was also mentally tough for the Shoremen in that they had to force UMBC to play into their hands. The coaching staff should be commended for establishing a well-thought-out strategy. The Sheormen went out to control the tempo of the game, frustrating the Retrievers. This led them to take wild shots and get away from their game plan. The Shoremen, on offense, moved the ball rapidly, and ran well through their plays. This allowed shots from off the crease, from where most of their goals came.

As for the defense, the score alone should say something. The second half alone found UMBC scoring only 4 goals, two of them coming within the first minute of play in the third quarter.

The Retrievers did dominate the early part of the game simply by intimidating. They came out with 4 quick goals to settle Washington's edgey nerves. Once the offense got over their pre-game jitters (at the end of the 1st quater) the Shore 10 began to roll.

UMBC had more ground balls 82-72, but with that many the difference is barely noticeable. They also outshot the Shoremen, 52-35.

Handling the scoring for the Shore 10 were Jeff Kauffman, Chris Cox, and Timmy Hollywood, scoring 4,3,and 2 goals respectively. Peter Jenkins had 1 goal, Paul Hooper 7 assists, and Billy Hamill 1 assist. Chris Anglim had 17 saves, many of them key stops in the second half.

W and L tomorrow would be a good opportunity to collect a win and ride high in the division III polls. With the tournament approaching quickly, Washington has nothing to lose and all in the world to gain. Despite the injuries and illnesses taking their toll, the Sho'men will be ready to bring back a big win on Saturday.

SGA candidates profiled

by GINGER KURAPKA

Candidates for offices in the Student Government Association have begun their campaigns, to culminate in the election next Tuesday.

Present SGA President Jay Young is running again. "My basic platform of last year was that the school has problems of attrition, retention and dissension of the people here," he said. "We found the common denominator was a lack of facilities so we made proposals to alleviate the problems. There have been great attempts at increasing communication and we created an awareness on the part of the Board and the administration that these problems exist, and they've been receptive." Young plans to continue working on the SGA's present proposal for a student center. "It's a great opportunity to be able to start and to be here long enough to carry through."

Walter Foraker is opposing the incumbent on a platform of an, "open door policy, letting the students in on as many activities as possible and having a student government that is fair and responsible to the students. I want to avoid a student government that is isolated from the students and a being unto itself," he said. Foraker is currently a juror on the Student Judiciary Board and has had experience in student government in high school. "I want to see all the problems students face here solved in an orderly and effective way, be it large or small."

The race for Vice-President is also contested this year. Kevin Kroenke, a current senator, chairman of the student residental committee, a member of the student facilities committee and of the social and organizational committees, "would like to take on more responsibility in the SGA. I would work toward fulfilling the academic needs of the students, particularly in getting an English composition course, and a study skills seminar that would be a little more weil-defined than this year."

skills," he said. "After that there are just a million things you can do with the SAB."

Kathy Waye, unopposed candidate for Secretary, said in a written statement, "I would like to become an active part in a strong and effective Student Goverment Association. I am willing to work very hard to make the SGA a responsible organization for the students." Waye is currently junior class secretary SGA senator, Academic Council secretary and a RA.

Current social chairman Bill Baldwin is also running unopposed. "I think we had a good year overall, and a few disappointments. We'll diversify next year and I hope we'll have as much success with people coming out for dances and help with the Luau, because in that respect it was a successful year." His plans for next year include trying to attract a big name band for a fall concert. "I'll be working toward that this summer."

Baldwin's assistant will either be Diana Farrell or John Fitzgerald. Farrell, current assistant social chairman, said, "I believe I've added to the position of assistant social chairman by doing more than I have to alot. I'd like to add more responsibility to the position, and work more closely with the social chairman in social activities."

In a written statement, Fitzgerald stated, "At a school such as Washington College, the social activities should be exciting and interesting enough to bring the student body together. As assistant social chairman, I will, to the best of my ability, help the social chairman in bringing such activities to the campus. This includes having a variety of popular bands, coming up with new and interesting ideas for activities and making the WC upcoming school year the social committee seeks to outdo this year's activities, and I hope to be a part of that team."

The position of treasurer is being sought by Dave Pointon and Mark Slater. Pointon, currently a senator in the SGA, said, "I feel I could do a good job because I understand how the Student. Government works. I already know how many financial aspects are handled because I've been involved in a lot of different projects in the government. I would work to spend the money wisely, and not to waste it."

Slater could not be reached for comment.

Speech Night is Monday in Hynson Lounge.

Geoff Garinther, currently editor of the Elm, is also seeking the office of Vice-President. "When I got this job one of the things I was interested in was the academic life of the college—I thought as Editor I could have an effect on that. The principal job of the SGA Vice-President is to serve as President of the Student Academic Board. The first thing I'd like to do is work with the Dean's Office and the English department in meeting the October 1 deadline set by the Board to come up with a proposal to improve students' writing

63 percent voter-turnout

Young elected with 54 percent of vote

by GINGER KURAPKA

Jay Young was re-elected Tuesday as SGA President over Walter Foraker by a vote of 234 to 203.

In other results, Geoff Garinther won over Kevin Kroenke for the office of Vice-President, and Dave Pointon defeated Mark Slater to become Treasurer.

Diana Farrell defeated John FitzGerald by one vote, 206-205, for the office of assistant social chairman. "We counted those votes four times," said Bob Hockaday, SGA Treasurer.

Kathy Waye, Secretary, and Bill Baldwin, Social Chairman, ran unopposed.

"We had an excellent turnout," said Hockaday of 692 eligible voters, 437 cast their ballots for president. "I think that's really good. I think it had a lot to do with the Walter Foraker campaign," said Hockaday.

Turnout was lower in other SGA races, and, "it was much lower for class officers, because most people were primarily interested in voting for SGA elections," added Hockaday.

Sophomore President and Vice-President are Mark Mullican and Bria Beckman, Treasurer and Secretary are Laura Chase and Wendy Murphy.

In the junior class elections, Chris Lemmon and FrankDirks ran unopposed for President and Vice- President, and Emily Wehr and Liz Edwardsen were write-ins for Treasurer and Secretary.

George Dennis and Lori Moritz have been elected senior class President and Vice-President. Treasurer and Secretary are Frank Felice and Lisa Gunning.

Speech Night

In his speech Monday night, Young set forth three basic obligations of the SGA. They are, "to the internal running of the SGA,...to the additional larger issues of the school,...to establish and maintain credibility for the SGA. Experience is the o"most thing I have gotten and it's the most important qualification I have to offer."

Foraker opposed Young on a platform of, "working together to solve problesm...I want to make sure all of your opinions are valued inall SGA decisions."

Questions for the candidates came from a panel of Paul Krinks, SGA vice-president; Peter Turchi, Elm News editor; and Dabe Altvater, Chairman of the Student Juciciary Board and from the audience.

"I have seen the value of a Washington Cillege degree decrease just in the three years I've been here," said Geoff Garinther, "and I'd hate to see it devalued further."

Opposing candidate Kevin Droenke said, "Being Vice-President entails more than just an assistant to the president...I would work to re-establish the fame the school was once known for."

"Due to a previous commitment at Memorial Stadium," Bill Baldwin was unable to attend Speech Night.

Diana Farrel said, "I feel I know the workings of the SGA because I'be served on a lot of committees... I'd like to work closer with the Social Chairman in diversifying social activities." John Fitzgerald did not make an appearance.

"I feel it would be an honor to be a member of a strong and effective SGA," said Kathy Waye. "I feel we have things to do."

Treasurer candidate Dave Pointon said, "It's a very important job I feel I will handle well. I would work hard to keep a sound financial system. The office of treasurer is not a simple job."

Mark Slater, the opposing candidate, stated, "I would like to see a more active distribution of our money among student activities...I humbly request your support."

The making of a candidate

"If you can't beat them... scare the hell out of them"

Washington College Junior Walter Poraker has run for Kent House senator to the Student Government twice, for both the Freshman and Sophomore Class presidencies, for New Dorms' Senator twice, and for Vice-President of the SGA. Walter lost all of those elections. This week, in one of the most controversial and unusual Student Government elections in recent College history, Walter made his bid for the office of president of the SGA.

In the early morning hours of Tuesday, April 29, three Washington students went into all of the dormitories, slipping small sheets of paper under as many room doors as they could. They began after midnight and finished their job just after three in the morning. The pieces of paper they left

Writing problem discussed again

Council postpones proposed revision of distribution

by GEOFF GARINTHER
Editor-in-Chief

The Academic Council has decided not to send to the faculty this year a revision of distribution requirements that would require students to take courses from all four of the major academic divisions.

"A package has to be given to the faculty that will explain each proposed change and how each change relates to the whole," said Dean of the College Garry Clarke this week.

Third clause stricken

The decision to postpone presentation of the proposal followed passage of a motion by Modern Languages Department Chairman Tom Pabon to eliminate the controversial third clause, which stated:

"Any combination of two literature courses in English, Literature in Translation (with the exception of LT 305, Introduction to the Film) and Literature in a Foreign Language may be taken for distrbution credit."

"Basically," said Pabon, "I feel that a better solution's got to be found so the Modern Language Department can benefit from the literature sub-heading without hurting the English Department.

"Right now the issue's being confused because of the writing problem," Pabon told the Council Monday.

Research discussed

The Council also discussed Monday the advisability of hiring someone over the summer to research solutions for the writing problem.

Clarke said after the meeting, howeVer, that he's "not exactly sure what the benefits of such a plan would be."

English Department Chairman Nancy Tatum said this week that the recommendation to hire a researcher for the summer was "like saying to Frank Creegan, 'Why don't you call in someone from Delaware to restructure the Chemistry Department.

"It's obvious it has to be one of us," added Tatum. "In fact, not just one of us, but all of us who teach the course."

Tatum said she thinks it "won't take all summer" to prepare a recommendation for dealing with the problem, provided funding does not become a roadblock.

"There are all kinds of things that can be done," she said.

A third century for Washington College?

Last week the Board's decision to borrow from endowment to fund renovation of the Hill Dorms was described here as potentially "apocalyptic." This week it was students who nearly fulfilled that prophecy by coming within thirty-one votes of replacing one of the SGA's most successful presidents with a candidate whose apparently sincere campaign was turned into a joke by his associates. Washington College has survived for nearly two centuries, but, if this year has been any indication, just making it through the next decade may be difficult.

The Students

The SGA deserves high marks for promoting the College's future interests—and it deserved a stronger vote of confidence than students gave it this week. Aside from sponsoring the social activities that students enjoy on any given weekend, the SGA has also:

•responded to the Faculty Report on Violence, Vandalism, and Theft—a report that, in attempting to solve acknowledged problems, might have unnecessarily restricted student freedoms. The SGA defended student interests, the faculty and administration listened, and current and ongoing reforms bear the marks of continuous student participation.

•revised the much-maligned Student Judiciary Board. Perhaps the best measure of the success of the SJB this semester is how little has been heard about it.

•made significant steps toward gaining greater representation of students to the Board. Indications are that SGA President Jay Young may even be able to achieve some form of non-voting membership in the school's governing body next year.

But the SGA's most significant accomplishment has been recommending a solution to what it identified long ago as a "lack of facilities." For all the controversy raised over the snck bar, a student center remains an absolute necessity. It would, by Young's estimation, enrich several different aspects of college life here, including current student morale and prospective students' interest in the school.

The idea was Young's from the start, one that he has had in the works for more than a semester. Yet, in Tuesday's elections, he received only a 31-vote mandate, suggesting that students are either incredibly ignorant of his accomplishments or actually opposed to the strides the SGA has made. Ignorance, rather than any genuine opposition to actions that have served student interests, seems the more likely cause of Tuesday's outcome. Young deserved better treatment.

The Faculty

For the faculty this has been an important year in two respects. It may have cost the resignation of at least one professor, but in December the faculty received a twelve percent salary increase. With the annual inflation rate rising above eighteen percent, they remain less than totally satisfied; few salaries anywhere, however, have managed to keep up with inflation recently.

A second matter of importance to the faculty was the recogniton this year of students' inability to write as perhaps the primary academic problem here. Although some maintain that it is an overblown issue, a majority of the students, faculty, and even the Board think not.

The writing problem, however, is only part of a larger curricular issue. Faculty consideration of a proposal to make what some will consider major changes in the curriculum has been postponed until next year.

The Administration

It has been a mixed year for the administration. Despite receiving the largest Hodson Grant ever ($640,000) this year and $450 more per student for next year, Washington College remains in financial trouble. Unable for two years to obtain enough funding for renovation of the Hill Dorms, the College has decided to dip into its own endowment for the money. President McLain assures that the decision actually benefits the College, but others, as we reported last week, interpret the decision as a sign of institutional weakness.

This is only the latest in a series of criticisms directed at the President. Head of the College for the better part of a decade, he has surprisingly few strong supporters among either students or faculty. Critics on the other hand, seem abundant. Regardless of whether his lack of support is deserved, perhaps the President should ask himself the question that he has had printed and hung on his office wall—is his currently indefinite tenure "good for Washington College?" We think not. The President should announce simultaneously his retirement, effective in May of 1982, and the initiation of a presidential search to find a suitable replacement.

President McLain has been associated with Washington College for more than 45 years, and that association need not end. But, as the College enters its third century, a leader who is prepared to move ahead will become vital.

Letters to the Editor

"No hard feelings"

I am writing to thank all of those students who supported me in my bid for SGA President. Their support was loyal and true. As a candidate who wished to serve the people, I am grateful to see that so many people supported me. I had hoped to be their President and worked for their good. In reference to "their good", I mean the good of all students both social and academic in orientation.

I was a Student Council President in high school. As President, I worked hard for the students, the school, and the Student Council. With the highest of hopes, I had wished to do the same here. But that is not the case. I congratulate Mr. Jay Young who was a truly worthy opponent. I am sure Jay Young will be a great leader.

It was a close race, and I thank those who made it so. Apathy doesn't seem to have overshadowed this election as it has some. I hope student interest will remain high to help the S.G.A. Next year's senators will be aware of the students' ideas and represent them better, I hope, as a result of this. To those who didn't vote for me, I say "no hard feelings."

Sincerely Yours,
Walter Foraker

A fair and equitable solution?

As we all know, "new dorms" are considered one of the most desirable places to live on campus. These suites allow one a feeling of independence and privacy. The layout of the buildings and the quad are conducive to a general feeling of comradeship among the residents. No one can deny that the new dorms are set apart from the other dormitories on campus in a number of ways. The overall effect of the new dorms is a pervasive atmosphere of relaxed intellectualism. As a consequence of the absence of destruction and by the very fact neighbors respect each other's right to privacy, one can find the peace of mind to study in the suite.

To give one of these buildings to a fraternity would not only destroy the quiet atmosphere achieved by the balance of co-ed living, it would also deny many independents the option to live outside of the common dormitory, which is afforded by the fraternities. The very presence of a fraternity in the new dorms would be destructive. Fraternities, by their very essence, are exclusive. This is in direct opposition to the sense of cohesiveness which is so successful within new dorms. To put in an organization, which is based on the theory of only letting certain people in and keeping others out by arbitrary standards would be to destroy the bond felt among the residents. This would, in effect, destroy the advantages of the new dorms.

There is an unequal situation which exists on this campus. Fraternities seem to have rights and priviledges which are not extended to Independents. It may simply be due to the fact that fraternities have a unified voice. None the less, their rights should not infringe on those of the other members of this college. Living space is limited, and will be more so when the Hill Dorms are renovated. Fraternity members will benefit from these renovations. Therefore, why should the independents be deprived of one more place to live simply because a fraternity would like an entire dorm to themselves? This plan should be reviewed as to it's (sic) fairness and validity in terms of the entire college community.

I have but one question—If the New Dorms were being renovated, would a Hill Dorm be provided for the displaced residents?

A day of national fasting and prayer

In these days when people are on edge about years and rumors of wars and the difficulties in Iran, it was great to see, and be a part of a large group of people coming together, before God, with a purpose in mind. As laid out in II Chronicles 7:14 "If my people, which are called by my name, shall humble themselves, and pray, and seek my face and turn from their wicked ways; then will I hear from heaven and will forgive their sin, and will heal their land."

People of all different races and denominations filled the mall in front of the capital building, April 24th , united as the body of Christ to join hands in repentence and interceding for our nation and the situation in Iran and to raise hands in praise to God. Representatives from many states were present as far as Alaska and Hawaii as well as people from other countries including Guatamala. The day's agenda included hearing powerful Christian speakers and singers and a march down Constitution Avenue to bear witness for all to see and to claim this land for God again as it was originally intended; "One nation indivisable, Etc" and a nation who puts "in God we Trust" on its currency.

The rally was televised through the joint effort of Christian broadcasting networks on the 700 club. The man with the vision for this event is John Gimenez, a man who was free from a life of drug addiction and crime by the power of God. The police reported that the crowd was excellent, orderly and peaceful; they had very few problems. There was no litter strewn all over the mall at close of the day.

The main theme of the day was and is for all who claim to be Christian to leave behind apathy and sinful ways, to be the "salt of the earth", to be united as the body of Christ which is The Church to intercede for the nations and the freeing of the hostages, and very personally to let God's love heal the broken and emotionally wounded families of America.

"If you can't beat them... scare the hell out of them"

behind were various colors, each with a picture of Walter Foraker on them. Some said "Raise Cain. Walter." Others said, "If you can't beat them...scare the hell out of them." The final stages of the campaign to elect Walter to the position of the SGA president had gone into effect.

Walter's campaign was run by Kirk Folk and Nick Nappo, two juniors who said they they, "realized that Walter had been running for three years, and we had always voted for him, so we just said, 'Why not?'" The enigmatic "Why Not?" became the first slogan of the campaign. Folk introduced Walt to people in the coffeehouse and in the dormitories, but some people refused to take his candidacy seriously. SGA President Jay Young said that he "didn't realize that Walter was a serious candidate until after lunch" on the day of the election.

Young also said, "At speech night, and throughout the whole thing, I thought it was all a joke. I thought the people that turned out and cheered for Walter at speech night were...you would've had to have been there to understand." The fastest way to get Nappo and Folk angry, however, is to call their campaign a joke. Nappo responded th that statement, "If we didn't think we a better candidate, we wouldn't have backed him." Folk said, "Anybody that would run for office as many times as Walter has and wouldn't be beaten— nobody has any right to question why we backed him. I'm really sorry that people thought that we were making a bad joke on Walt."

Excitement was high on the day of the election. Both presidential candidates had signs up, and Nappo and Folk stood outside of the cafeteria during lunch handing out sheets of paper instructing the holder to pick the face that didn't fit. On the sheet were a dozen pictures of people such as Thomas Edison, Alexander Graham Bell, and other such well-knowns, as well as Walter—and a drawing of a rabbit. Voters clogged the entrance to the cafeteria and stuffed their ballots into the box as everyone tried to find out who was ahead. Rumors echoed across the cafeteria. One said that the method of marking the ballots wasn't clearly stated, so Walter's campaigners came out with a new sign, showing exactly how to mark the ballot. Another rumor was that many of the candidates for other positions on the executive board said that they would resign immediately if Walter was elected. After eating, Walter left the cafeteria and was stopped on the terrace by a crowd of supporters screaming his name. "They wanted me to say a couple of words," he later said, "so I told them, 'Why not?'"

While Folk and Nappo take responsibility for Walter's unique campaign strategy, they are quick to add that Walter was solely responsible for the speech he gave at speech night, during which he used no notes, and in which he expressed his strong desire for a student government which would serve the students. Nappo said afterwards, "Walt came through when he had to, and he came through big." The pair's strategy and belief in their candidate may have been best stated in the handout that said, "What will he do? His level best." Young, Walter's opponent in the election, said "I think Walter was a very sincere candidate. I don't think that all of Walter's supporters were as sincere as he was."

Walter says, though, that he "liked the way the campaign was handled because it was getting people excited, and I was getting a lot of support from all over campus, not from just one group. People were interested in the election, and I was glad to see that." Folk added, "They complain about apathy, then they're upset when we get people to vote. It's almost as if they were questioning our right to have a candidate."

Walter's supporters became active members of the campaign, in some cases; one sign which neither Nappo nor Folk created read, "There will be an important meeting of the President Young re-election committee at the new student center directly after the election. Thorogood cocktails at the new swimming pool." This might have been one of the things to which Young was referring when he said, "I felt that it was more of an anti-me campaign then a pro-Walter campaign." Determined to make their position clear, however, Folk said, "We never said Jay Young was a bad president. We just thought Walter would be better."

At dinner Young was nervous. If nothing else, the "scare the hell out of them" part of the campaign was working. Later Folk said with, "At the beginning I thought (Walter) was a long shot, but the day of the election I had no idea who would win." The voting closed at 6:30 and the ballots were taken to the Clifton E. Miller Library where they were counted. The lunch-time votes gave Walter a slight edge. The tension increased until the final count was given—Jay Young regained the presidency by 31 votes.

After the election Nappo said, "He had them running scared. I thought he might have won it." "There was no doubt that Walter and his campaign workers were disappointed. Reflecting on their strategy, Folk said, "If we had it all to do over again, we would've started earlier and emphasized Walter more. We knew though that the only way to get him exposure would be to take an off-beat approach." Nappo added, "When you meet Walt, you're gonna vote for him."

Although he lost in his attempt to win the presidency, Walter said that he is still anxious to work with the SGA in other capacities and to offer his ideas and suggestions. Despite their disappointment, the campaign managers wished their luck to the new administration and said of their own candidate, "We tried to run an imaginative campaign. Even though Walter lost, at least people met him, and they know he's not a loser."

Room draw coming soon

Student Affairs "planning ahead" for anticipated tighter housing next year

by PETE TURCHI
News Editor

Despite the fact that the planned HillDorms renovations will render those buildings useless for student housing next year and the fact that any renovation of Richmond House is still uncertain, the Student Affairs Office says that room draw will be held as usual in the coming weeks.

Assistant Dean of Students Ed Maxcy said that the three fraternities currently housed in the Hill Dorms have been told that they must apply for special interest housing for the coming school year. He said that while the fraternities may not enjoy the same physical unity that they now have, "everything will be done to help them maintain their physical integrity." Maxcy added that two of the fraternities have already submitted their requests to be considered as special interest groups.

Other questions about housing next year concern Richmond House, Spanish House, Little House, and the building in which Buildings and Grounds Superintendent Ray Crooks currently resides. Richmond House, as stated in an article in The Elm earlier this semester, is in need of repairs and may not be used for student housing next year. The house on College Avenue next to the Gibson Fine Arts Center will not be used by Crooks next year, so will be available either as housing or for offices. Depending on the success of the plan for a student center, Spanish House may be another choice as an office site.

Maxcy said that because of the renovation of the Hill Dorms all doubles in all dormitories currently used as singles will hold two students next year, and women residents will not have "the excess of space they've enjoyed this year. Everyone must share the burden of the loss of the Hill Dorms." Maxcy went on to say that this will probably mean the changing of one of the floors in one of the women's dorms to a male floor. He also said that Resident Assistants in Kent House and other buildings that were not designed with "RA rooms" will still have singles, "because it's part of the salary, and it's advantageous for an RA to have a single when they have to deal with other students."

Maxcy confirmed the rumor that one of the fraternities may be placed in one of the New Dorms. According to him, the Kappa Alpha fraternity has exactly 32 people, the number of housing spaces in one New Dorm, to relocate. Maxcy said that while "squatter's rights," or the priviledge for students of being able to retain their current rooms, was discussed earlier in the year, "there was no apparent interest in the student body," so the plan was dropped. This means that no current New Dorms residents have priority, with the exception of a special interest group of creative writers currently housed in Cecil House.

Other special interest groups that have applied for special housing include language students, math stunts, and the writers from Richmond House. Maxcy said that special interest groups will be notified as to whether or not they were accepted for special housing before the room draw, and that interest group applications are still being accepted. All special interest groups applying for housing should, he said, have the signed endorsement of a faculty sponsor.

Because of the many complications this year in determining housing, students will not know which of their room choices they have gotten until sometime la t in the summer, but Maxcy said that students would not go uniformed. He said that if next year's enrollment is high the housing problem will be a very difficult one, but Students Affairs is "trying to plan in advance, to use all space as thought fully as possible." The dates for room draw will be announced next week.

I've learned how to deal with a lot of different people. The experience here has taught me how to think.

Worst of German Measles may be yet to come

by PETE TURCHI
News Editor

Although the first case of German measles at Washington College in the recent outbreak was reported over four weeks ago, The Maryland State Health Department says that the worst is yet to come.

Over fifty students have had rubella (also German Measles) in the past month, but dispite two mass innoculation clinics held by the Health Service estimates are that over half the student population has not had the disease nor the vaccine. A letter to College Physician Gottfried Baumann from John A. Grant, Deputy State Health Officer of Maryland, dated April 25 said in part that "... we expect a third generation of (rubella) cases somewhere around the first of May."

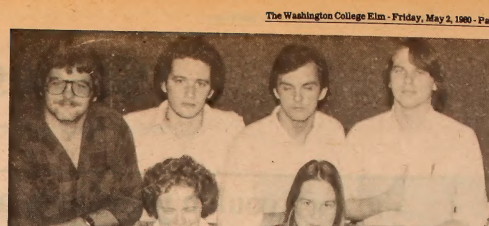
Grant goes on to say, "According to our records there are approximately 450 students who have not had either (blood tests), verification of desease, or immunization. I want to stress the importance in reaching this large group of students who would be the target of future generations of cases. If you know of any way to persuade them to either verify their immunization status or receive an immunization injection, we would be delighted to assist you in any way. We can have additional mass clinics any time and any place you so desire. I am concerned that we could have the largest outbreak of cases during examination time or commencement time."

Many students who claim to already have had rubella have gotten the disease "again," but College Nurse Betty Schauber said that this is because students have had in their childhood diseases resembling rubella that were actually other respiratory diseases. She also said that the vaccine given in Maryland public schools in 1969 is not take" in ten percent of the cases, so some students who had that vaccine may still be susceptible.

The "examination time or commencement time" outbreak forecasted by the State Health Department is potentially much more dangerous not only because there will be many visitors on campus at commencement, but because this means that students that have the disease will go home with it and possibly spread the disease.

Free innoculation shots are still available at the Kent County Health Service on College Avenue.

Graduate program opens June 23



by FREEMAN DODSWORTH

The summer sessio of the Washington College graduate program begins on June 23, according to Dr. David Newell, Director of the program.

In an effort to combat the dropping enrollments that are plaguing all programs of this kind, some changes have been made in the structure of the curriculum, says Newell, who has directed the program since 1975. It has been condensed to two days a week, with evening courses being offered, which cuts down on commuting. "Seventy-five percent of our students commute over an hour to get here," says Newell. "That's a lot of driving."

Additionaly, most of the graduate students are also full-time employees, making it difficult for them to attend several classes at once.

Newell says he thinks the changes will bolster the program. "I'm optimistic. I think the enrollment for this summer will be good."

Newell awarded NEH grant

by FREEMAN DODSWORTH

Dr. David Newell is going to be a busy man this summer. Aside from directing the summer graduate school program here, he has been awarded a summer grant by the National Endowment for the Humanities to take part in a seminar being offerred at Temple University in Philadelphia.

The seminar, to be taught by Dr. Joseph Margolis, professor of philosophy at Temple, is entitled, "The Concept of Culture in the Philosophy of Art," and is being held June 16 through August 8. "I'm very excited about studying with Margolis," said Newell. "He's a very versatile scholar. I myself think he's a genius."

Newell is one of only twelve people from all over the country to be selected to participate in the seminar, which will deal with different aspects of the concept of culture and how they relate to questions concerning the philosophy of art. The area Newell plans to concentrate on in his individual research project will be literature and painting. He hopes as a result to be able to offer students here a course in the philosophy of literature which would complement the one that he has been offerring for the past three years in the philosophy of art. This individual research effort will constitute most of his time there.

The grant is $2500, which he feels will be enough to cover all his expenses. Despite the academic opportunities, however, the idea of a summer in Philadelphia is not very pleasant, he says. "I plan to be home every Friday afternoon and not leave until Monday morning."

College book available soon

by KATHY STRECKFUS
Assistant Editor

Nearly 700 copies of Washington College, written by Vice President Emeritus Frederick Dumschott, have been sold, out of the 1500 that will be printed. The book will be available "hopefully by Commencement weekend, and certainly by the first week in June," said Vice-President for Development and Public Relations George Hayward.

Washington College, printed by Maple Press of Pennsylvania, is a record of the development of the College up to the present administration. It traces each administration and deals with such topics as curriculum changes over the years.

"Mostly alumni and area residents" have ordered the book, Hayward said. Orders have come from all over the country, including Florida and California.

Order forms are available in the Public Relation Office in Bunting Hall. The price is $15.00 before publication, and $20.00 afterwards.

The Athletic Dept. is looking for the starting pistol it lent to a student earlier this year.

Pegasus flying ahead of schedule

Pegasus rears and stretches his wings high, silhouetted against a vibrant orange sun. He is about to take flight from the cupola of Bill Smith Hall. He has an air about him of strength and determination.

That is what the cover of the 1979-80 yearbook will look like. It was designed by Yearbook Editor Bonnie Nelle Duncan and Junior Mary Van Tuyl.

According to Duncan, production of the book is "a little ahead of schedule." She sent 41 pages to the plant this week to meet the April deadline, so a total of 81 pages are completed out of the final 144 pages.

The sections that have been completed are the Seniors, the Faculty, and part of the Activities section and the opening section.

The theme for the opening section is "One Step Further...A Year of Our Own."

The book should be available soon after the return to classes in September.

SJB "running smoothly"

by WENDY MURPHY

"I believe that the present system is the best one since the Judiciary was implemented," says Dave Altvater, Chairman of the revised Student Judiciary Board.

"I think that the Board is pleased and that the people who come before the Board have been treated fairly," he adds.

"The good point for students being on the Board," says Altvater, "is the they live with the college community and are aware of what is considered acceptable behavior at Washington College. (They) are, therefore, able to make much fairer decisions."

Cases handled by the SJB have concerned mostly general misconduct, including destroying college property and endangering the well-being of other students.

Most of the students who appear before the Board have already admitted their guilt and the Board must simply decide their punishment.

Concerning next year's SJB, Altvater says, "I think is should run as smoothly next year as it did this year."

Scenes from an

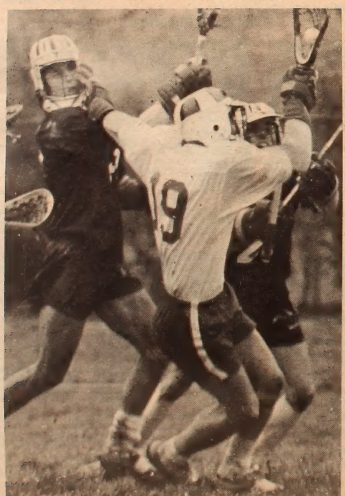
Sho'men couldn't beat 'em, but they scared the hell out of 'em

by KEVIN O'CONNOR

Last Saturday the lacrosse team challenged the Washington and Lee Generals in a game that was to have been dominated by the Generals. To their dismay, however, this formula just didn't mix. The Shoremen were an obvious underdog from W&L's position in Division I polls at the number 3 slot. The Generals also had only 1 loss—to the nation's leading Division I power, University of Virginia. To top that, the game was being played at their home field. The only factor at the entire contest in the Sho'men's favor was a field that had been soaked by rain. Being used to this type of weather on the Eastern Shore, the Sho'men considered this an advantage.

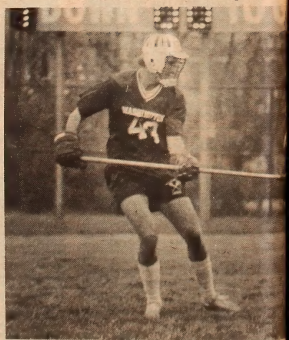
The team was told that the long bus ride and overnight stay was to be a fun one. But, the real fun for the Shoremen wouldn't start until they evened the history of WC&L competition—they hold a 14-13 edge.

The energy among the players before tha game could have lit the stadium lights, and that was transformed into 2 goals for WC—W&L in the first 3 minutes of play.



But that early psychological edge soon vanished as WC made its comback. By the end of the first quarter, W&L was trying to figure out how the score was tied at 3-3. All 3 WC goals came unassisted, compliments of Paul Hooper.

WC's momentum carried into the second quarter. Good defensive play and 2 unassisted goals by Billy Hamill left WC with a 5-5 standstill at the half.



The second half was very much a defensive battle between the two teams. This was a time that the Generals felt they could catch up on goals so they pressured the cage. Chris Anglim came up with some key saves here to keep WC in the game (He had 19 in all.) W&L also had many extra men opportunities but the Sho'men kept the door shut, allowing only 1 out of 10 tries. No one scored in the third quarter.

The opening minutes of the fourth quarter could very well have meant the outcome of the game. This was surely the feeling held by both teams. The first goal meant that that team could settle the ball and slow the game down whenever it wished, whereas the other team would have to constantly attack the goal in hopes of making up the difference. Both teams had possession of the ball and opportunities to score, but W&L was the first to fire it between the pipes. WC came up with two more hard-earned goals, by Hooper and Timmy Hollywood, but W&L scored 4 times in all for a 9-7 win.

These last two games were heartbreakers for the Shore 10, but there is a postivie side. Earlier in the year the team was not confident. These last two games, however, have proven that this team has the potentioal to play with anybody. A little more refining of the rough edges and this team will be unstopable. With 3 games in the next week, wins in each will make WC the David in a Goliath tournament.

Sho'men fate lies in hands of play-off selection committee

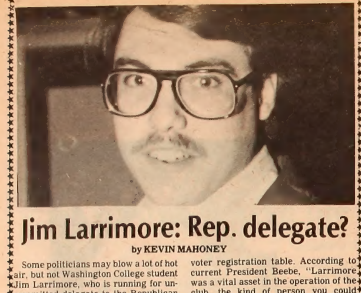
by JIM GRAHAM
Photograpty Editor

The regular season is fast approaching its end, bringing with it the mystifying play-off selection system.

Last year the selection committee, left the Sho'men off their list and placed Babson in their place. Babson was blown off the field by a UMBC team that had had a tough time here on Kibler Field.

This year's team, however, is a much stronger one. The attack, bolistered by the goal production of Jeff Dauffman and the assist-wizardry of Paul Hooper, have helped it over last year's 3-8 hump. The defense also seems to be much stronger, Leckey Haller, Willie Herring and Frank Felice as a unit are perhaps one of the toughest in Division III. Backed up by Chris Ahnlim and Bruce Winand in the goal, the Sho'men have been in all their games, with the exception of Hopkins, where we seemed to get more to the them than did the Blue Jays.

The three games left should prove to be tests to this team, coming off two tough losses at UMBC (12-10) and Wand L (9-7). Its play at Washington and Leed was exceptional and left a normally thunderous group of spectators silent as their Generals were unable to mount any sort of continuous attack until late in the game. With a break here or there, or perhaps a whistle from the indomitable Virginia referees WC might have pulled off the upset of the year.



Their play shows they are an extremely capable team and probably should end up being 7-5 at season's close. All three games (Towson, Delaware, adn Loyola) will be tough. But they come at a time when coaches Brian Matthews, Scotty Allison, and Clint Evans have the team peaking for all their games. This peak will hopefully carry till May 25 and a National Championship.

This all depends, of course, upon the selection committee. The Shoremen are currently ranked 7th, meaning that if the playoffs started tomorrow we would be playing Cortland State, most likely at Cortland.

The chances of playing at home depend upon the seeding WC gets. But most likely the committee will leave the Shoremen behind St. Lawerence and have WC play away. The selection committee is so unpredictable, though, that no one really knows who will meet who on May 14, when the tournament starts.

The committee can make it tough by putting us in a low seed and making the team travel a long, long way for its games. But this team has the potential to play any team and beat it. It showed it against Wand L.

Ours is a team that is dedicated with a hunger that, if sustained or hightened, could carry them far. And there's nothing like being the best when you make that trip home to Chestertown.

Jim Larrimore: Rep. delegate?

by KEVIN MAHONEY

Some politicians may blow a lot of hot air, but not Washington College student Jim Larrimore, who is running for uncommitted delegate to the Republican National Convention.

Larrimore is very serious about running, so sincere that he was the first candidate to file for that position in September of 1979. "I've been interested in politics since high school," he says.

As soon as he came to Washington College, Larrimore continued his interest in politics. As a freshman he worked for the 1976 Ford campaign, and in 1978 he worked for the Republican gubernatorial campaign.

Yet his biggest accomplishment in politics was the formation of the Washington College Republicans three years ago. Larrimore was the President for two years before resigning the position to Glenn Beebe this year. The College Republicans were formed to create a climate on campus where politics would be more accessible to students, says Larrimore. They are the only political club on campus, and in the past have hosted an Iranian demonstration, blood drives, and a voter registration table. According to current President Beebe, "Larrimore was a vital asset in the operation of the club, the kind of person you could always depend on."

Now Larrimore is looking to bigger and better things; he's running for delegate because "he feels it's a stepping stone to, hopefully, other political offices." Delegates are representatives for the party; they will vote for the party presidential nomination at the convention in July at Detroit.

There are 25 people running for the three spots in the first congressional district of Maryland, which covers the Eastern Shore and other counties.

Speaking on current events, Larrimore feels that "Carter is imcompetent, as well as relying on his weak advisors. The Crisis in Iran has gone too far for too long. I was glad to see military action taken, but it should have been done within 72 hours of the embassy takeover."

University of Baltimore Law School is the next step for Jim; after that he hopes to go further into politics. "I want to get more involved in politics because politics is the instrument of change."

McLain snorkels, rides camelback in Egypt

by SUE JAMES

While many of us were at home or on the beaches of Florida during Spring Break, College President Joseph McLain was touring Egypt.

McLain was one in a group of alumni from Johns Hopkins University and the Naval Academy.

The group set out on their trip March 6 on a flight to Cairo. There they boarded the Greek ship Argonaut, which took them down the Gulf of Suez to a port on the eastern coast of Egypt, near the Red Sea. McLain and the rest of the group then proceeded to Luxor, where the Great Temple of Carnae, the tomb of Ramses II, and Tutankhamen are located.

While in the vicinity of the Red Sea, McLain also went snorkling and seashell hunting in the biblical waters.

One of the highlights of the trip, said McLain, was a visit to the recently uncovered town of Petra. McLain said that he had to ride a horse to get to this remote area on the Jordanian side of the Red Sea, but apparently this ride was not as rough as the camelback ride to dinner in a Bedouin tent. Arabian food is quite different from ours, said McLain, particularly his dinner of prepared rice and goat.

McLain then travelled up the South end of the Suez Canal to Cairo, where he toured the great pyramid of Cheops and visited the American International University.

While in Cairo, McLain make it a point to vist the bazaar area and a number of shops recommended to him by a 1964 alumni of Washington College who just happened to stop and chat with McLain while the group was waiting for a flight toCairo in Paris.

The bazaar area of Cairo was also an educational experience, said McLain. During the engraving of an amulet that he hadjust purchased for his wife, he asked the engraver what the nieroglyphic symbol with the appearance ofwaves was. The engraver replied "N," and went on to say that the representation was taken from the Nile River—the first thing for Egyptians to associate the word water with.

Aside from touring, McLain gave lectures and attended those given on Egyptology, the Islamic rise, and the political situation in the Middle East. The President also acquired a friend during his visit: an Egyptian camel named "Sweet Lips."

Newell says cafeteria is a bargain

by FREEMAN DODSWORTH

Few people have anything good to say about the food at Washington College. So it is not surprising that when an outsider (that is, someone who is not forced, for whatever reason, to dine there regularly) comes in to the cafeteria to eat, a round of suspicious whispers and puzzled glances spreads from table to table.

So it has been for the last semester for Associate Professor of Philosophy David Newell. He can be seen at least twice a week at dinner and as often at lunch. Newell is the newly-appointed faculty advisor to the food service committee, and, as part of the job, he eats many of his evening and noontime meals here.

According to Newell, he received a letter last January from Food Service Director Dave Knowles asking if he would accept the position. Other duties include attendance at contact dinners and the right to inspect the food line and make any suggestions he feels are necessary. Often he will ask students at nearby tables for their opinion of the food, and use that information to help him formulate an overall view of the dining hall service.

Newell attributes students' negative attitude toward the food to several components. "First," he says, "it is a tradition to complain about school food. They wouldn't feel right if they didn't. Second, they wouldn't complain if they had to eat at other schools. There is really is no comparison. The amount you get and the quality is a real bargain."

He also feels that students become to used to homecooking. "Everything can't be cooked the way everyone likes it—that's impossible."

Newell says, "I have a very positive overall reaction. I feel that Dave Knowles is doing a bang-up job."

Newell does, however, make one small concession to those of us who live with the food all the time. "The hamburgers," he says, "are not fantastic."

Hamilton at the controls...again

by SUE JAMES

If you were taking a stroll past the Fine Arts building last Wednesday afternoon you might have heard the high-pitched, electronic sounds of an ARP synthesizer, part of the electronic apparatus used in a seminar given by Dr. Eugene Hamilton, called "The Physics of Sounds."

An Assistant Professor of Math, Hamilton has applied his knowledge of mathematics to the synthesizer. Last Wednesday he attached a kind of graph-machine to the synthesizer to indicate the different sound waves produced electronically.

Drawn on the blackboard in the room were various graphs indicating the waveforms that combinations of sounds can produce on the synthesizer, Hamilton explained, the intricate process of combining pitches to produce these wave forms, and discussed such factors as amplitude (loudness), frequency (pitch, number of cycles per second), and tenbre (shape of the wave) that make up the structure of the sound wave. Sound was defined as "time varying air pressure."

A synthesizer only makes voltages—the speaker makes sounds", Hamilton added. Each key that is pressed down delivers an "applied voltage" on the control panel of the ARP next, the lever of one of the three oscillators (which vary the pitch level on an ARP. Each one contains more than the eighty-eight notes of a piano) is regulated to control the imput, or sound voltage, on a different oscillator. Hamilton ended his seminar by playing some instrumental sounds that resemble those heard in the brass section of an orchestra.

Truitt first to win science fellowship

by PETE TURCHI
News Editor

"As far as I know I'm the first person from Washington College to win (a National Science Foundation Graduate Fellowship) ....That should be the headline."

Those are the words of senior Chemistry major Leah Truitt, who was recently chosen as one of the 390 winners of the awards. The fellowships, which include money for research, tuition, and scholastic expenses for three years, are worth over $20,000. Truitt adds, "This is a very prestigious award. I think this should get at least as much room as the (Elm article on the) Fulbright winners."

The winners are chosen on the basis of grades, GRE scores and a research proposal. Truitt, who tentatively plans to work towards her Ph.D. at the University of Wisconsin at Milwaukee, won one of only thirty-seven awards given in the field of chemistry.

One of eight senior chemistry majors at the College, she applied for and was accepted into a program at Argonne, a Chicago-based organization, last year where she did research in the fields of crystallography and organic synthesis. She is currently completing her senior requirements under Chemistry Department Chairman Frank Creegan.

Duke of Gloucester to receive honorary degree

Queen Anne's Day

Washington College will confer an honorary Doctor of Fine Arts degree on His Royal Highness Prince Richard, Duke of Gloucester in a colorful 11 a.m. ceremony highlighting Queen Anne's Day at Centreville on Saturday, May 3.

The Duke, a first cousin of England's Queen Elizabeth II and grandson of King George V, will be in Queen Anne's County by invitation of the county commissioners as guest of honor for four days of cultural, educational and festive events celebrating the county's 27th birthday.

James O. Pippin of Centreville, overall chairman of the affair, said the honorary degree ceremony in the courthouse square will be the highlight of the entire schedule.

Washington College officials and faculty members in colorful traditional academic robes will be led in procession by the Registrar, Ermon Foster who will carry the ceremonial mace.

The Duke will be escorted by a U.S. Air Force color guard, and introduced with fanfares by the U.S. Army's Herald Trumpets, the ceremonial unit for official welcoming functions for foreign dignitaries at The White House.

Robert Roy, chairman of the college's Board of Visitors and Governors will read the mandamus for the honorary degree to be awarded His Royal Highness in recognition of achievements in fields of historic preservation and restoration. The citation will be read by Dean Garry E. Clarke.

Dr. Joseph McLain, the college president, will then symbolically confer the honor as the doctoral hood isplaced on the Duke by the Registrar, Mr. Foster.

The theme of the Duke's remarks in accepting the degree is expected to be the value of preserving an area's architectural heritage.

Paul M. Long, Headmaster of the Gunston School at Centreville who is subcommittee chairman for the degree ceremony, said this will be only the second off-campus award ceremony in Washington College's 200 year history. The college presented George Washington with an honorary degree in 1789 in New York, when that city was the nation's temporary capital.

The Duke, who is 35, was educated at Eton and at Magdalene College, Cambridge from which he later receiVed a graduate degree in architecture. He practiced with a firm of London architects for a time before succeeding to the title at the death of his father in 1974. His Royal Highness is president of the Royal Society of Architects-Artists and alsoof the Royal Victorian Society of Great Britian.

The Duke will not be a stranger to Washington College when he receives the unprecedented honor.

The schedule for the Royal visit for Queen Anne's Day will bring him to the Chestertown campus on Friday, May 2. The Duke will participate in presentation of the Queen Anne's County Citizenship Awards during ceremonies at Church Hill at 10 a.m., and is scheduled to arrive on campus at 11:30. Dr. McLain will escort him on a tour of the College, and then through the historic district of Chestertown. The Duke will end his Chestertown visit after a luncheon at Dr. McLain's home, for which he will be guest of honor.

This is the fifth year for the Queen Anne's Day observance. It was started in 1976 as part of the American Bicentennial celebration, and is one of a handful of heritage events that have survived as permanent fixtures.

Queen Anne's Day has been hailed as an unusual "hands across the sea" event that recognizes an American county's colonial heritage and honors Queen Anne of England for whom it was named.

Several students studying abroad next year

by BILL MORTIMER

Several Washington College students will be traveling abroad during the upcoming school year. These individuals will be going on various programs to study in fields ranging from Acting to French.

Five of the students who are planning to spend the 1980\1981 school year abroad are Jennifer Ahonen, Kathleen DeFlaun, Mandy Fansler and Emily Kaufman. Others as well are planning to study abroad during their junior year. Ahonen, will be studying in Paris, France as will DeFlaun. Fansler will study in London, England and Kaufman and in Madrid, Spain. All of them went about finding their respective programs on their own, with some help from College professors. Their programs are not, however, connected with the college directly as is the Manchester program in Oxford, England.

While in France, Ahoenen will study at the New York University in Paris. As well, she will be able to take courses at the Sorbonne. "I have courses to select from the Universities own school," she said, "and then I'll also choose others by visiting professors." Although she is not sure exactly what she will study, while there, she plans on taking courses in Spanish and French Literature, and French Grammar and Civilization. "I want to take Portugese as well, if I can," shesaid.

The year which she spends in France will be beneficial to Ahonen, she says, because "I want to enrich my knowledge of a foreign culture." She feels that Paris is an excellent cultural center and is familiar with it, as she went there last summer on Vacation. During vacations, Ahonen plans to visit such places as Italy, Spain and Belgium.

Another French major, DeFlaun will study with the Institute of European studies. Leaving in September, she will spend an entire year in Paris taking courses at the Institute and La Sorbonne. DeFlaun feels that by living in France she "will learn French much more quickly. I've been there before and really enjoyed it. It will be good for helping me with my major." Living with a French family will, she feels, help her by having her speak the language constantly. As well, she says "It will teach me a lot about the French people."

She hopes that everyone going abroad next year will "get together and see each other." For herself, she hopes to be able to travel to different parts of Europe.

Fansler, a Drama major, will study with the Marymount College program at the Royal Acadamy of Dramatic Arts in London. There, she will be taking courses in Acting, Stage Combat, Movement and Voice, and Alexandar Technique. She has wanted to study in England because "academically England's techniques of theatre are different from those in the United States, they have a strong background in Shakespeare and I'll be able to improve my voice and movement there." Classes will meet for her during the courseof two semesters, once a weekend lasting no more than two hours.

In England, Fansler will be living with a British family. She looks forward to experiencing the English family life and culture first hand. During her vacations she hopes to travel in Europe, as well as throughout the British Isles.

Greatest of all for Fansler is the fact that she will be studying with people who are considered experts in their fields. She says she is "Looking forward to going there and learning enough to show people here that I have grown in my field."

Although not a Spanish major, Kaufman will be studying in Madrid, Spain during her junior year. "I'm a Humanities major," she said, "but by the time I get back, I'll have a minor in Spanish."

At present, Kaufman is not positive of the exact program she will take up, but it will definitely be centered in Madrid. She has been accepted by Marquette University, but would prefer Middlebury. She is waiting now to hear Middlebury's final verdict.

In either case, Kaufman intends to spend her year in Spain studying "Spanish literature, art, history and maybe even music; not typical Spanish grammar, but something involved with the humanities." After deciding to go to Spain during Christmas break, Kaufman settled upon her program choices with the aide of Chairman of the Modern Languages Department Thomas Pabon.

She says she decided to go away for all the "typical reasons of wanting to experience another culture; all that David Copperfield type of stuff." In addition, she felt, and still feels that a change from Washington College will make her "appreciate the school more."

WHAT COULD THE ARMY POSSIBLY OFFER A BRIGHT PERSON LIKE YOU?

Drop your guard for a minute. Even though you're in college right now, there are many aspects of the Army that you might find very attractive.

Maybe even irresistible. See for yourself.

MED SCHOOL, ON US

You read it right.

The Army's Health Professions Scholarship Program provides necessary tuition, books, lab fees, even microscope rental during medical school.

Plus a tax-free monthly stipend that works out to about $6,450 a year. (After July 1, 1980, it'll be even more.)

After you're accepted into medical school, you can be accepted into our program. Then you're commissioned and you go through school as a Second Lieutenant in the Army Reserve.

The hitch? Very simple. After your residency, you give the Army a year as a doctor for every year the Army gave you as a med student, and under some conditions, with a minimum scholarship obligation being two years' service.

INTERNSHIP, RESIDENCY & CASH BONUSES

Besides scholarships to medical school, the Army also offers AMA-approved first-year post-graduate and residency training programs.

Such training adds no further obligation to the student in the scholarship program. But any Civilian Graduate Medical Education sponsored by the Army gives you a one-year obligation for every year of sponsorship.

But you get a $9,000 annual bonus every year you're paying back medical school or post-graduate training.

So you not only get your medical education paid for, you get extra pay while you're paying it back.

Not a bad deal.

A GREAT PLACE TO BE A NURSE

The rich tradition of Army Nursing is one of excellence, dedication, even heroism. And it's a challenge to live up to.

Today, an Army Nurse is the epitome of professionalism, regarded as a critical member of the Army Medical Team.

A BSN degree is required. And the clinical spectrum is almost impossible to match in civilian practice.

And, since you'll be an Army Officer, you'll enjoy more respect and authority than most of your civilian counterparts. You'll also enjoy travel opportunities, officer's pay and officer's privileges.

Army Nursing offers educational opportunities that are second to none. As an Army Nurse, you could be selected for graduate degree programs at civilian universities.

ADVANCED NURSING COURSE, TUITION-FREE

You get tuition, pay and living allowances.

You can also take Nurse Practitioner courses and courses in many clinical specialties. All on the Army.

While these programs do not cost you any money, most of them do incur an additional service obligation.

A CHANCE TO PRACTICE LAW

If you're about to get your law degree and be admitted to the bar, you should consider a commission in the Judge Advocate General Corps. Because in the Army you get to practice law right from the start.

While your classmates are still doing other lawyers' research and other lawyers' briefs, you could have your own cases, your own clients, in effect, your own practice.

Plus you'll have the pay, prestige and privileges of being an Officer in the United States Army. With a chance to travel and make the most of what you've worked so hard to become. A real, practicing lawyer. Be an Army Lawyer.

ROTC SCHOLARSHIPS

Though you're too late for a 4-year scholarship, there are 3-, 2-, and even 1-year scholarships available.

They include tuition, books, and lab fees. Plus $100 a month living allowance. Naturally they're very competitive. Because besides helping you towards your degree, an ROTC scholarship helps you towards the gold bars of an Army Officer.

Stop by the ROTC office on campus and ask about details.

UP TO $170 A MONTH

You can combine service in the Army Reserve or National Guard with Army ROTC and get up to $6,500 while you're still in school.

It's called the Simultaneous Membership Program. You get $100 a month as an Advanced Army ROTC Cadet and an additional $70 a month (sergeant's pay) as an Army Reservist.

When you graduate, you'll be commissioned as a Second Lieutenant, but not necessarily assigned to active duty. Find out about it.

A BONUS FOR PART-TIME WORK

You can get a $1,500 bonus just for enlisting in some Army Reserve units. Or up to $2,000 in educational benefits.

You also get paid for your Reserve duty. It comes out to about $1,000 a year for about 16 hours a month and two weeks annual training.

And now we have a special program to help you fit the Army Reserve around your school schedule. It's worth a look.

A SECOND CHANCE AT COLLEGE

Some may find college to be the right place at the wrong time for a variety of reasons. The Army can help them, too.

A few years in the Army can help them get money for tuition and the maturity to use it wisely.

The Army has a program in which money saved for college is matched two-for-one by the government. Then, if one qualifies, a generous bonus is added to that.

So 2 years of service can get you up to $7,400 for college, 3 years up to $12,100, and 4 years up to $14,100. In addition, bonuses up to $3,000 are available for 4-year enlistments in selected skills.

Add in the experience and maturity gained, and the Army can send an individual back to college a richer person in more ways than one.

We hope these Army opportunities have intrigued you as well as surprised you. Because there is indeed a lot the Army can offer a bright person like you.

Sophie Kerr left 500 short stories, 23 novels—and almost $500,000

by PETE TURCHI
News Editor

To most people the name Sophie Kerr means light, entertaining fiction. To many, it also suggests the delights of the gastronomical art—menus temptingly presented, mouth-watering descriptions of delectable delicacies. To Marylanders, Mrs. Sophie Underwood's eminence in the kitchen is not surprising, she was born and brought up on the Eastern Shor'.

—From an undated article in the Sunday Sun found in the archives of the Clifton E. Miller library.

On May 25, 1942, Anna Eleanor Roosevelt received the honorary degree of Doctor of Letters at Washington College. After a rather lengthy speech she presented College President George Mead with a check for twenty-five dollars. He expressed his appreciation, then stepped to the podium and delivered the following remarks:

"Of the Eastern Shore by birth and tradition; of the wider world of letters of genius and experience, you have stood for years in the choice position of a weaver of stories and novels wherein the hearts of mankind have revealed through your skillful pen the web of their experience; nor have your characters forsaken the region which was yours in girlhood and young womanhood. We honor you as an adornment to the world of letters and a source of pride to your native community and native state."

The subject of Mead's remarks was popular short story writer and novelist Sophie Kerr Underwood. Kerr did not present Mead with a check, but upon her death in early February, 1965, she was to bequest to the College nearly $500,000.

Sophie Kerr, author of over 500 short stories and 23 novels, was born on August 23, 1880 on a farm in Denton, Maryland, Her mother was a descendant of an old Eastern Shore family, and her father, born and raised in Pennsylvania, ran a nursery. Kerr's fondness for plants and for the applejack and peach brandy made from the extra fruit from her father's trees were to turn up continually in her writing, as were her childhood memories of the people and places of the Eastern Shore.

Kerr left home to attend Hood College in Frederick, Maryland, where she got her Bachelor of Arts degree in 1898; surprisingly enough, she didn't major in English, and claims to have had no interest in writing. She went on to get her Masters Degree at the University of Vermont in 1901, and in her first year there she write her first short story. It sold to a local magazine, so she wrote another. She left the University of Vermont during one of the school vacations to visit a girlfriend in Pittsburg, and happened to get a feature story published in the Pittsburgh Chronicle Telegraph. One of the editors was particularly interested in the story and asked the writer to come to his office, and shortly thereafter Kerr became Women's Editor of the paper. From that job she went to the Pittsburgh Gazette Times, but her career as a newspaper woman stopped at about the time she was married to John D. Underwood in 1904.

The couple lived in New England but they were separated after just four years of marriage. Kerr moved to an apartment in New York and resumed writing under her maiden name. She became editor of the Woman's Home Companion and continued selling her stories and serialized novels to other popular and women's magazines. In the course of her career Kerr sold over 100 stories to The Saturday Evening Post, and even more were published in Woman's Home Companion before, during, and after her period of service as editor. She had several of her books serialized in The Saturday Evening Post and had stories published in Women's Day, Vogue, and McCall's as late at the 1960's. She also co-wrote a play, Big Hearted Herbert, which ran successfully and was made into a movie in 1934, the same year it first appeared on stage.

An article in Current Biography said that "her novels were done with a sure professional touch, but lightly skimming the surface of life." The same article says that "she wrote to amuse, and she did it well." The obituary that appeared in The New York Times after she died of a heart attack at the age of 84 called her fiction, "light and amusing."

Sophie Kerr was as active socially as she was in the field of writing. She was a governor of the Wine and Food Society, which limited its activities to wine and food-tasting parties during the Second World War. She was known as a culinary expert and " a Hostess of serene charm and unhurried manner" who was "always impeccably dressed," according to her guests. She often invited friends to her elaborately decorated home in New York, which included a spiral stairway, antique furniture, a sunken patio, a glass dining room and an enormous study that took up the entire front of the house. Her home was filled with various objects which she collected during her extensive travels around the world. Although not much in the way of biographical material has survived, we can assume that her flair for writing pervaded everything else she did in life; one recipe for frying chicken that she wrote to a friend specifies that the ingredients be set "in a large yellow earthen bowl on a clean table in a sunlit kitchen."

As if she was not busy enough with her professional and private lives, Kerr was also a steadfast Republican. She was governor of the Women's National Republican Club and also served on the advisory committee of the Business Women's Republican Club. She was a member of Theta Sigma and the PEN club, a writer's association. In her free time Kerr polished her lingual skills by reading foreign works in the original French and Spanish.

Despite all of these accomplishments, Sophie Kerr seems not to have carved a place for herself among the great writers of the English language. She is remembered, however, for the annual prize awarded in her name at the College. She left just less than half of a million dollars to the school, and included a statement in her will that said in part, "one-half of the interest on the bequest is to be used annually as a cash prize to be known and designated as the 'Sophie Kerr Prize' to be awarded to the senior student, man or woman, at graduation, who shall have proved himself as having the best ability and promise for future fulfillment in the field of literary endeavor." The statement went on to say that the winner of the prize is to be selected by a committee consisting of the president of the College and the members of the English Department.

A magazine article that appeared soon after the bequest was announced said that "the size of the prize made possible by the unusual bequest promises to beckon the cream of would-be writers to the small Eastern Shore College town." Why did she make the bequest? Washington College was one of three schools,including Franklin and Marshall and the University of Vermont, which presented Kerr with honorary degrees, but the reason most likely lies in the fact the she never forgot her original home. Her short story collection The Sound Of Petticoats is about the Eastern Shore, and all of her writing was filled with place-names from the region in which she was born. She maintained her home in Denton even while she lived in New York, and would return to the land of her childhood after her transcontinental travels.

The Sophie Kerr Prize was first awarded in 1968 to Christian Clark Hodum, an English major from Ronkonkoma, New York, for a novel-in-progress. The prize was then worth approximately nine thousand dollars.

The next year the winner was Gil Bradford of Bogota, Columbia, and since then the award has been given at least twice to non-English majors, but usually to poets and authors. The prize reached a new height in publicity in 1978 when Art Bilodeau, who won the award for an unfinished novel entitled Ground Round, was interviewed by Circus and People magazines, as well as being contacted by publishing and television companies. Although the nature of the award makes it impossible to state its exact worth for any future date, it has been estimated that the value of the prize when it is awarded at commencement this May 25 will be approximatley $18,000.

At 11 a.m. on Februrary 8, 1965, funeral services were held for Sophie Kerr at St. James Episcopal Church at Madison Avenue and 71st Street in New York. She left behind hundreds of stories and nearly two dozen novels, a movie, a play, and what is considered to be the largest undergraduate writing prize in the United States today. Her prolificity and great energy earned her a wide audience during her lifetime, but she is quickly joining the unremembered of history; in all truth, if not for the Washington College bequest Sophie Kerr would probably exist as nothing other than a reference in library catalogs. Although she may have failed in the artist's quest for immortality, her generosity, may make it possible for an artistic career which might otherwise be forsaken to instead be fulfilled.

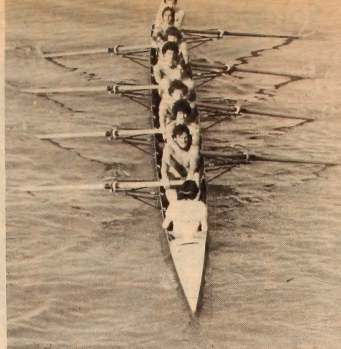
"...the unusual bequest promises to beckon the cream of would-be writers to the Eastern Shore

"Her novels were done with a sure professional touch, but lightly skimming the surface of life."

Crew swamps Lafayette

by FREEMAN DODSWORTH

Washington College oarsmen took the Chester river by storm last Saturday, sweeping a meet with Lafayette College of New Jersey. Following a week of beautiful spring weather, Mother Nature once again tried to wash up the season for the crew with heavy rain and low tides that threatened to keep them off the water.



But with the season virtually over, and only two regular races remaining on the schedule, weather was low on the list of priorities.

The first race found our varsity and junior varsity boats pitted against Lafayette's first boat. Despite the rain, the waters were calm and the tide slight, which made for ideal rowing conditions and reasonably fast times. After a good start both the varsity and junior varsity found themselves nearly a boat length ahead of the Lafayette crew. As the race continued, the varsity showed its strength opening the lead continuously. The finish showed Washington College in places one and two, with the varsity the victor at 6:30 and the junior varsity a very respectable 6:45. Lafayette's varsity came in a poor third nearly a minute later.

The next race on the schedule was between the second Lafayette boat and our junior varsity and freshmen. This race proved to more competitive than the first, with the largest time spread being less than thirty seconds. A combination of fatigue from the first race and a long wait for the second race made for a rocky start for the JV, but they pulled to a strong finish, 18 seconds ahead of Lafayette. The Freshmen rowed to a very respectable third after equipment problems gave them a poor start.

Washington College women found themselves up against somewhat stiffer competition. The U.S. Naval Academy produced a very strong boat that proved too much for our small women's program.

Coming off this weekend's race, the crew is 1-1 on the season. They are looking to make it a 2-1 next Saturday as they seek revenge against George Washington University, which handed them their last defeat. They will also be racing Georgetown University, their stiffest competition this year. The season will culminate on the weekend of May tenth when they go to Philadelphia to compete in the Dad Vail regatta, one of the largest in the world.

Dirty Work At the Crossroads

The good guys win — for a change

by PETE TURCHI
News Editor

Will Adam Oakhart marry Nellie Lovelace? Will the evil Numro Murgatroyd steal Mrs. Upson Asterbill's fortune by marrying her daughter Leonie? Will Mookie Maguggins come in time to untie Adam and defeat Numro, thereby protecting Little Nell's future?

The Drama Department's presentation of Dirty Work At The Crossroads was unlike most of the Department's offerings in many ways. For one thing, on at least one night there was a waiting list to get a seat. For another thing, the play was as simple as good guys and bad guys and heroes and villains.

Melodramas tend to share a single plot, so there is no need to elaborate on how Munro Murgatroyd attempts two marraiges to gain a fortune, only to be stopped ("Curses, foiled again") both times by his wife and sometimes-cohort, Ida Rhinegold. For those who missed one of the Drama Department's most entertaining productions in recent years, it may be necessary to add that good triumphs over evil, and when Munro (Ted Legates) takes his bows he is greeted with a well-deserved round of boos.

The play was presented in the basement of the Gibson Fine Arts Center, and although it seems as if the proscenium stage upstairs is being ignored, the intimate setting downstairs was certainly appropriate for this show. Whether Adam Oakhart (Bill Mortimer) was trying to convince Ida Rhinegold to find religion or Legates was planning one more sinister deed, the audience was successfully used as a confidante.

The set was bright and relatively simple, aided by the use of two ingenious props: the boat in which Ida makes two entrances, and the train tracks which become part of the final set. The pace of the show (approximately two-and-a-half hours long) kept it moving quickly enough for the most part, though the longer first act had a very few slow moments. The directing was imaginative, keeping in context with the lighthearted theme of the play.

Aside from the writing of the play, however, one of the most enjoyable aspects of the evening was the acting in the show. Legates was a thoroughly evil villain, and Mandy Fansler easily turned in her best job on the Washington stage to date as Ida. Chris Ellinghaus as Mookie Maguggins had one of the more difficult roles in the show with his hick accent, but nonetheless did a fine job. And as if it was in the script, Beth Church and Bill Mortimer, as Nellie and Adam, did excellently. Church was forced to play one of the shows straightest roles throughout the first act and was in sharp contrast to the other characters. Although Mortimer had more trouble keeping a straight face, his sarcastic delivery and uncharacteristic movements added a dimension to the play apart from what was written by the author, Bill Johnson.

The acting of the minors was also very good, with Cathy Carrier turning in a smooth performance (aided by an excellent accent) as a French seductress. High praise is also due Eric Sterman, who played the seemingly nonstop piano music that was integral to the show.

There is no questioning it, Dirty Work At The Cross-Roads is nothing more than an old time melodrama that is a guaranteed success to any capable company which performs it. Although the Drama Department is probably interested in producing more serious plays for Drama majors to work on, there can be no doubt that the cast and crowd alike enjoyed being able to just sit back and have fun for once. Who ever said the good guys couldn't win once in a while?

Happy Birthday, Georges

The Kent Quad Pipeline

Heating Under Repair

GINGER KURAPKA
Editor-in-chief

"It seems on the surface unpardonable that students should come back and find what looks like a swimming pool being built in the Kent quad," said Geoff Garinther, SGA vice president.

Construction on a steam line for Kent House has considerably disrupted the landscaping around Hodson Hall and the Kent quadrangle.

Kent House had the last remaining independent boiler on campus. After a blow-out last winter, "we were faced with either getting a new boiler or extending the existing steam line," said vice president of Finance Gene Hessey. The insurance inspector only allowed patching of the boiler for the remainder of the season.

Work on the project was begun so late in the summer because of an unexpected increase in costs to nearly twice the original estimate. "The project, based on original cost estimates was funded by the Hodson Trust in December," said Hessey. The repairs and replacements reserve fund will provide the additional money. Delays were caused when these funds had to be approved.

"Hopefully it will be completed before the end of the month," said Hessey. The crucial part is to get it completed before the heating season." The piping used for the construction had to be specially manufactured; and," said Hessey, "we were fortunate to get it when we did."

Cousineau to Teach Writing Workshop

Bill Mortimer
Assistant Editor

For the first time since the late 60's, English composition examinations were administered to freshmen during their orientation last week.

The examination, which was designed to test the freshmen's ability to write an essay, was not given in the same form as its predecessor. According to English department chairman Dr. Nancy Tatum, the exam was given in order to "let us see early who needs a little extra coaching to succeed in college works." From the results of the exam, students who show a need to learn the fundamentals of writing will be offered a non-credit writing course. It will not be a manditory class, nor will it apply to the distribution requirements.

Diane Cousineau, who holds a PhD in English and who taught English literature in Davis, California and Paris, France will instruct students who would like to improve their writing skills. Through the class Cousineau hopes "to get the students to enjoy writing, to feel at ease with words, to arrive at the point where writing is not a burden." Both Tatum and Cousineau see the writers workshop as extending during second semester so that supperclassmen could also benefit. Also, during the course of the first semester, faculty members can point out those freshmen who need extra help in writing essays. "By setting it up so that there is a facility for this on campus, we hope that students will use it" said Tatum.

Tatum sees the workshop as a "resource". The students who attend are capable of doing thework, but are in need of perfecting their skills at writing. The workshop will be held twice weekly and there will be two separate classes. Tatum sees the workshop as a viable means to lowering the attrition rate at the college. As well, she said; "it is possible to give help to those seniors struggling with their theses." through consultation with Dr. Cousineau.

Cousineau feels that "students should not feel penalized by being asked to take this course." She added that a good deal of students could benefit from it as only those who write constantly are good writers. "Most students are not trained in high school for the kind of writing they will do in college" she said.

The course is not remedial, nor is it a course in grammar. It is a writing workshop and there will be no outside readings. The majority of the course will consist of teaching students to "write, rewrite and edit" Cousineau said. "There are many stages to the writing process, which many students overlook. "It is her hope that students attending the workshop will begin to appreciate the "complexity of the writing process; of logic and coherence." Cousineau feels that to establish this appreciation, one can not simply dash off a writing assignment. "You have to Write a lot," she said, citing that a lot of what will be written will not neccessarily be good.

Both Tatum and Cousineau hope to keep the workshop small; twenty-five students or less for each of the two sessions. That is not to say that they do not want more people to show interest. Neither Tatum or Cousineau have objections to expanding the workshop to include more time, if need be. As well, Cousineau invites anyone who needs extra help to see her during her office hours. But, for a full understanding and learning process to take place, Cousineau hopes to "do a lot at an individual level. Each student's problems are unique", she said.

In the classroom situation, Cousineau will give some type of writing assignment. She feels that if a student should have a paper for another course, this would be the perfect situation in which to complete it. Most of all, she hopes that "the students should all think of themselves as writers in the company of writers."

There are some professors, Tatum noted, who feel that the workshop should be made compulsory. Tatum, however, feels that if it were made compulsory, it would create an "awkward situation. It would be the only compulsory course on campus." In any case, she feels that the workshop is "an opportunity."

Exam Given at Odd Hour

BILL MORTIMER
Assistant Editor

Orientation, frightening experience for many, was made even more so by a startling fact with which freshman were faced. On the day of their arrival the freshman class was required to take a two hour English Composition Exam —at 7:30 in the evening.

The timing, many felt, was bad. Dr. Nancy Tatum, Chairman of the English department said that it was "bad planning." The exam was not scheduled by the English department and, by the time Tatum became aware of the time and date on which the exam would be given, it was too late to change. In another year, she said "the essay will be rescheduled for a morning," perhaps the day after the students arrive. The essay requires energy and ability to concentrate and thus, said Tatum "demands people who are alert and fresh." It was neccessary to have the freshman take the exam because of the writers workshop which will be offered to freshman whose essay writing needs to be polished for college essays.

"Knowing we were setting up the workshop, we needed to know who would most profit from the help." Tatum said. She added that if it was let go until the midterm it would be "too late to get much done."

Dr Diane Cousineau, who will teach the voluntary workshop, also feels that the timing might have made the exam more difficult for some. However, she feels that "students who write best would not have been affected" by the inconvient hour.

The opinion on the part of the freshman class is generally the same. "It really wasn't that hard" said Terri Adamczyk, from Moorsetown, NJ, adding that "it was late and hot and everyone was nervous." But perhaps the most important fact as that it had been a busy day "I thought 7:30 was late, after unpacking, I was tired" Adamczyk said.

Jeanmarie Fegely from Morton, Pennsylvania felt the same way "I was really tired and when they told us, I was in a panic." I didn't feel I was ready to sit down and write a paper" she said. In another sense, though, Fegely feels it was good. "It was something we had to do. Afterwards I felt that I did okay," she said.

Both Adamczyk and Fegely felt that

A Fresh Start

At first glance, it wouldn't seem that the year is getting off to a great start. No progress is evident on either the Hill Dorms or the Student Center; some intagible work has been done, however, and perhaps the delay has been unavoidable. It's still hard to understand why objections from the Maryland Historical Society, against the renovation were not anticipated, and why complications with engineering designs were discovered so late. The Hill Dorms will eventually be renovated, and chances are we will have a Student Center for next year, if we can just hang on a little longer.

On the positive side, and there is one, the current housing situation is better than the slum conditions which had been feared. Another plus is that freshman SAT averages, those ever-important statistics, are up over last year.

And the Elm is still here. We're inexperienced editorial staff but we're enthusiastic. We'll do our best to let you know what's going on, and to keep up communication among student, faculty, and administration. We're ready to go. Hope you had a good summer and that you're ready to go, too.

the essay was not that difficult. The freshman were given a paragraph by Thoreau from Walden to read. From there, they had to explain the author's point of view and then to give their own opinion on the work.

Still being in a new environment on a busy day and then taking an English exam was a cause for nervousness. As Adamczyk reasoned, "I don't think they expected perfect essays."

Changes Bring "Phenomenal" Success

Orientation with a Twist

WENDY MURPHY
News Editor

Due to problems in scheduling and the decision to add several new activities, the Fall 1980 Orientation Program was noticeably changed from those of previous years.

The change in orientation began with the addition, of the English composition Examination. All new students were required to write an essay which would then be evaluated to determine each student's writing abilities. Dean of students Maureen Kelley said that it was held on the first night of orientation because they wanted to have it as soon as possible. In this way, the exams could be checked over by the time classes began. Kelley also mentioned that there would be a writing workshop held for some students who need to develop their writing skills.

Five contact hours were presented for the class, and covered such subjects as student life and study skills. One contact hour, entitled "Academic Life at Washington College," brought the students into contact with a few of the professors. Martin Kabat, Chairman of the Department of Humanities, Larry Clarke, Dean of the College, and Frank Creegan, Chairman of the Department of Chemistry were chosen to present the program. According to Dean Kelley and Dean Maxcy, these three were selected because they represent different approaches and "different diciplines" of teaching. Creegan has a scientific approach, Kabat has a broader look through humanities, and Clark spoke on the techniques of the four course areas.

At one group orientation meeting, the new students were given a tour of Chestertown. The purpose of this was to give them encouragement to "get off campus once in a while and see what is available," said Maxcy. He added that Chestertown "has depth, but one must seek it out. It's not like a big city with marquees to show it off." Maxcy said that some students only go into town when they need to buy something, such as stamps, and he hopes that more students will simply go for walks and notice what Chestertown has to offer.

Another attempt was made to acquaint the freshmen and transfers with their temporary "hometown." The freshmen were guests at a reception hosted by Chestertown Mayor Elmer E. Horsey and held in the court yard next to theKent County Court House. As well, several community members were on hand to speak to the students and welcome them to Chestertown. The students and some of the community leaders then returned to the college for an outdoor dinner. Mayor Horsey said that he wants the college students and the town residents to realize that the students are a part of the community.

The Student Government Association Banquet held Saturday evening added a formal touch to the orientation program. At this formal banquet SGA President Jay Young, and Vice-President Geoff Garinther were introduced to the students. In previous years, the dinner had been sponsored by the Alumni Association but this year it changed hands because the deans wanted to end the formal part of orientation with something put on by the students.

Dean Kelley said, "From a vantage point, the overall program has been phenomenally successful. It has been great for the class, which showed up for most of the activities."

Poetry Review Deadline

The closing date for the submission of manuscripts to the Cosmos Poetry Review by college students is November 5. Any student attending either junior or senior college is eligible to submit his verse. There is no limitation as to form or theme. Shorter works are preferred because of space limitations.

Each poem must be typed or printed on a separate sheet, and must bear the name and home address of the student, and the college address as well.

Manuscripts should be sent to the National Poetry Press, Box 218, Agoura, Calif. 91301.

Visual Arts Scholarship

Ten fellowships of $5,000 each will be offered this year to Maryland's visual artists. The grants are intended to support individual artistic innovation, while encouraging mature and emerging artists to pursue their career goals. So fact the Maryland State Arts Council has awarded a total of twenty-five $5,000 grants over the past four years to individuals in creative writing, music composition, film/video, and visual arts.

To apply for the fellowships, one must be a Maryland resident over eighteen years of age. Each applicant is required to submit slides and photographs representative of a body of recent work demonstrating a high level of accomplishment. A panel of out-of-state jurors will review the materials submitted and recommend individuals to receive the fellowships.

Those interested in applying for a visual arts fellowship should contact the Maryland State Arts Council, 15 W. Mulberry Street, Baltimore, Md. 21201—685-6740, to recieve the application form. Artists who are registered with MSAC's Visual Arts Slide Registry Program will automatically receive an application form. Applications must be completed and returned to the Council with supporting materials by December 5, 1980.

Problems Plague Hill Dorm Renovation

by VIRGINIA KURAPKA
Editor-in-Chief

"I'm terribly disappointed with the lack of progress on the Hill Dorms," said Jay Young, SGA president. "It seems to me there's been a tremendous lack of foresight," said Geoff Garinther, SGA vice president.

"The delay has been well worth it," said Gene Hessey, Vice-president for finance. A series of unforseeable objections to plans for the renovation of the Hill Dorms have forced the postponement of construction to this fall.

Because the buildings are part of the Chestertown Historical Trust, a building permit had to be passed by the historical society. A narrow vote approved the permit, but several modifications were stipulated. "They are esthetic conditions," said Hessey. "Things like duplicating the windows to conform to the original."

"When we received the engineer's drawings for the heating and electrical systems, we felt the project was overengineered," said Hessey. Subsequent cost-saving modifications had to be incorporated by the engineer.

The state fire marshall objected to the archetect's recommendation for wall coverings for the dorms. "That recommendation took time," said Hessey, "the fire marshall's objections were unanticipated."

Once all objections were overcome, and plans finalized, a date was set for bids to be taken. "We heard from three major contractors that another similar project was receiving bids on the same day, and that unless we changed our date, they would not bid," said Hessey. Bids will finally be taken September 25.

"If we get good bids, the dorms could be ready for next fall," said Hessey. He added, however, "because of delays which always seem to occur in construction," that deadline might not be met.

For the third time in three years, the college is again applying for a HUD grant. "The formula for allocating HUD finances has been changed," said Hessey, giving smaller institutions a better chance to receive the money. A HUD grant would be desirable because, "they're at 3 percent interest, which is impossible to get eisewhere," said Hessey.

Applications for additional state funding have been made. "We won't know until perhaps after the buildings are under construction," said Hessey, whether those funds will be forthcoming.

The Hill Dorms—Will their problems ever be solved?

"We've had to take a step-by-step building block approach" concluded Hessey. "Whatever the project costs will ultimately have to be borne by the students, so I hope they'll benefit from the delay."

Students are still, however, concerned with the apparent immobility of the project.

"There may be a morale problem for students with the lack of chapter rooms (as a meeting place), which is something the Student Center would have alleviated," said Garinther.

"It's demoralizing for students to come back and after having been displaced from their buildings so work could be done to find none has," said Young. "I'm still very optimistic about the Student Center."

Garinther concluded, "it may not be anybody's fault but because people were expecting these things, the administration owes students an explanation."

The Draft

Question: Did you register for the draft this summer?

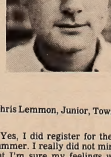
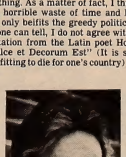
Photos and Reporting by Jim Graham



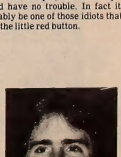
John Lescure, Freshman, Cheshire, CT.

Yes, I was one of the millions who registered for the draft. I am basically a conservative person and therefore, didn't take the radical approach of "dodging it." However, I do not believe in war, or that fighting will prove anything. As a matter of fact, I think it is a horrible waste of time and lives, and only beifits the greedy politicians. As one can tell, I do not agree with the quotation from the Latin poet Horace "Dulce et Decorum Est!" (It is sweet and fitting to die for one's country).



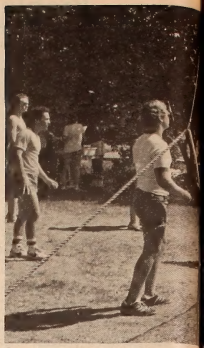
Peter Bogh Deerfield, Freshman, Rumson, NJ

Registering for the draft didn't bother me in the least. The form was short and simple, so that any idiot would have no trouble. In fact it will probably be one of those idiots that will push the little red button.



Chris Lemmon, Junior, Townson, MD

Yes, I did register for the draft this summer. I really did not mind doing it, but I'm sure my feelings will change severely if the draft goes through. If I absolutely must go to war then I'll go, but I'm not ashamed to admit the fact that I won't do the U.S. much good because I'll never shoot at another human being.



Tom Twomey, Sophomore, Norwich, CT

I did not register. Partly because I was away all summer; but also because I object to the principles involved. First, I believe having a reserve pool of soldiers increases the temptation on the part of our leaders to intervene, and, second, I feel this was simply a political move. If and when the time comes that America is threatened, I will go.

Three of the four faculty members whose contracts were reviewed by the Committee on Appointment and Tenure were granted their tenure, in a decision made by that committee last May.

According to Dean of the College Garry Clarke, Dr. John Baxter, chairman of the Physics department, Dr. Steven Cades, a member of the Sociology department, and Dr. Richard DeProspo of the English department were given tenure, while Dr. Howard Silver, a Political Science professor was not. While this decision will not affect the Political Science department this seMester, a replacement will have to be found for Silver for the 1981-82 school year.

The Committee on Appointment and Tenure, composed of Dean Clarke, President Joseph McLain and four faculty members, must weigh various factors in making decisions regarding tenure. "When a person's contract is being considered, various sources are put into play" said Clarke, Primarily, the person under review must submit information on his or her activities within the college community, as well as in the outside community. Clarke said that the Committee "solicits information from the Chairman of the person's department and from his coworkers within the department." Other sources which help to add insight are reports made by the librarian, the registrar, student deans, and from the students themselves. Acting as student representative is the Student Activities Board (SAB) which is composed of the SGA president and one student representing each department.

Geoff Garinther, Vice-president of the SGA and thus, president of the SAB, was surprised to learn that Silver was not granted tenure. "From what had been said at the last Political Science majors meeting, the students were happy with Silver", he said. Furthermore, he added, "The SAB recommended his tenure be renewed." Garinther said that he "wrote to tell President McLain that the students would be disappointed" with the Committee's decision not to rehire Silver after this school year.

Still, the SAB does have a vital part in the Committee's decision-making process. Clarke said however, "I think that each case is judged in its own way, everything is not weighed equally." He pointed out that, for example, a department chairman may know certain facts which the students do not, while in other instances, it may be students who have a deeper insight into a particular professor. Clarke did say the "the primary thing we are looking at is a statement in the faculty handbook." This asks, in general, if one professor knows his material, if the professor is active in productive scholarship and if the professor is an effective teacher.

The SAB's role in appointment and tenures, as Garinther sees it, is to meet the four deadlines for student reports which come up in the course of the year, when various professor contracts come up for consideration. Dean Clarke, who acts as a liaison between the SAB and the Committee on Appointment and Tenure, asks the SAB to "poll various students majoring in a department for whose professor is being reviewed" Garinther said. The SAB then submits a report of some form to the Committee. The way this report affects the committee's decision depends largely on the quality of the report itself, on the students who s submitted the report and on the quality of the SAB's work up to that time.

SAT's Up

by VIRGINIA KURAPKA
Editor-in-Chief

This year's freshmen class is evenly divided between men and women, adn aveage SAT scores are up from last year.

A total of 186 students enrolled in the freshman class. Slightly more than half are from Maryland. Others come from sixteen other states. Two-thirds are from public schools, and 71 percent of those students were ranked in the upper two-fifths of their class in high school.

The average verbal SAT score rose from 470 to 490. "That's significant," said President Joseph McLain, "That kind of jump means we've got something going." The math score remained relatively the same. "There is very little difference in the public and independent schools' SAT's," said Jody Dudderer of Admission.

Twenty-nine transfer students enrolled. Nearly half came from two-year schools. "The class looks very, very good," concluded McLain.

Claire Mowbray

Mowbray wins Sophie Kerr Prize

Washington College Reporter

Claire Elizabeth Mowbray of Westminster, Maryland was awarded the Sophie Kerr Prize in literature, the largest undergraduate monetary prize in the world at graduation last May. Miss Mowbray submitted for the competition a portfolio including short stories and essay written while a student. Some of her work was written and published abroad while she studied at Manchester College, Oxford, England during her junior year.

The Sophie Kerr Prize, valued at approximately $23,000 this year, is awarded to the graduating senior "having the best ability and promise for future fulfillment in the field of literary endeavor," according to the terms of the will of the late authoress Sophie Kerr Underwood, who specified that one-half the annual income from her bequest be awarded for the prize. The cash award was instituted in 1968 and is second in size only to the Nobel Prize in the field of World Literature.

The Sophie Kerr Committe, composed of the six members of the English department and the president of the College, felt Claire was deserving of the prize, not only for the work submitted in the portfolio, but for the quality of work done in English classes for three years.

Future plans for Miss Mowbray are uncertain. She plans to return to England this fall and perhaps work there before considering enrolling in graduate school. "I have no doubt that Claire will be successful in what she does," Dr. Tatum, chairman of the English department, said. "I am sure she will continue to work in the field of literature and writing in the future."

Life At College

The first Days of Freshmen

by WENDY MURPHY
News Editor

"I really liked the fact that right away we were introduced to people and the workings of the college" said Missy Booth, a freshman from Stoney Brook, New York.

She didn't like having the English Examination on the first day "because everyone had traveling, unpacking and other things on their minds." She added "It was a little too much."

When asked about the meeting with town leaders, Booth said "I thought that was really good. We got to see a little of the life downtown. We also got to meet people again."

She said that the formal dinner sponsored by the Student Government Association was "pleasant." She liked the "introduction of the student government" in which Jay Young, SGA President, and Geolf Garingher SGA Vice-President, spoke to the students.

Jeff Order, a freshman from Owings Mills, Maryland said "I think that during orientation you didn't get a chance for homesickness. You are living in a family situation in which everybody shares."

He felt that without the upperclassmen being at College during orientation, the freshmen got a chance to know themselves and to associate with themselves as a class. He said that when the upperclassmen did return, the new students were "ahead socially," and added "We had already made a lot of friendships."

Order also liked meeting with Chestertown Mayor Elmer Horsey. He explained "It gave us a chance to talk to town leaders so that we can get a better understanding of what is in Chestertown."

Both Missy Booth and Jeff Order liked the overall orientation program. Missy summed up her feelings when she said "It was good. We got a chance to come here without being thrust into things. We got a headstart."

Soccer Outlook Promising

JIM GRAHAM
Photography Editor

Ed Athey will be putting the final touches on his soccer squad this week in preparation for the regular season, which starts next week. Back this season are V. J Filliben, Mark Mullican, John Hopley and Ken Maher. These are the frontliners who lead the Shore-booters to an 11-5-2 season last year and with a year's experience under their belts expectations of their performances are high. Filliben made all-conference last year and Maher has all the tools to be a stand out this year, as do Mullican and Hopley. Look for Roger Vaughn to make a strong showing this year along with freshmen Ron Lauricella and Robby Gottfried, who had a strong game against the Alumni last weekend.

In the goal, Chris Kiefer, who was excellent last year, is back as is Glen Gillis. Kiefer is number one but Athey will probably try to give the big rangey sophomore as much experience in the nets as possible. Kiefer will have Dave Bate, Ben "The Bear" Tuckerman, and Curt Nass to protect him on defense and if John Lonquist's knee can mend the defense should be again very stingy with the oppositions' scorers.

Bill Bounds is back at halfback also. Bounder is a scrappy player who was always in the thick of things last year. Fred Daugh a transfer and Pat Guiduash, a freshman out of Wilmington should also add a big lift to what is beginning to shape up to be a very deep team for the Sho'men this year.

Add to the afore mentioned players Avery Woodworth, Tommy Vach (whose leg has been on the mend since last year when it was broken against Western Maryland) along with the rest of a strong supporting cast for the Atheymen and the Booters should be very strong this season.

Shore Notes: The team has an Exhibition tournament that began today at 1 and will continue tomorrow at 10:00 when WC plays Western Maryland, Washington and Lee plays American University at 11:30, and W.C. retakes the field at 1:00 against that same W & L team.

Women's Athletics Looking for Hard Workers

by JEFF ALDERSON

During the upcoming week, organizational meetings for women's tennis, softball and the lacross club will be held, while meetings for volleyball and crew were held this past week.

Volleyball season will begin this fall and it appears to be a rebuilding year for the team. All but four of the team's starters have graduated so that the team will have to use first year girls to start. Coach Penny Fall says that the team lacks the height of last year's team, but hope they make up for it with speed, aggressivenessss, and heart.

There was a good turn out of freshmen women for the organizational meeting Monday night. According to Miss Fall, volleyball is an excellent way for freshman women to get involved inschool activities. Fall notes that freshmen women involved in sports generally adjusting to college and learn to organize their time better, adding that, "all you need is the self discipline to make the time." Sophomore Laura Chase commented that the volleyball team is like a family with a feeling of oneness between the team members and the coaching staff. She recommends volleyball, not just to girls with team experience, but to anyone willing to work as a team.

The women's crew will have a new coach, John Wagner. Miss Fall is very optimistic about the team this year. Not only is she impressed with Wagner's coaching abilities, but the team is more experienced than volleyball since they only lost one varsity rowwer at graduation. Two year veteran rowwer, Ellen Beardsley,has returned from a year in England and many freshmen women have rowwing experience, so the team's outlook is very promising.

Crew is also a good way for women to get involved in school activities for many of the same reasons as volleyball. Sophomore Lori Cafiero added several different reasons for participating on the crew team. Cafiero says that crew is a different experience from other sports. "The river is so beautiful," she said, "With crew you have a chance to stay on the water. It's really a different experience. Crew definately added to college life."

Even with the availability of the five women's sports, (six, including cheerleading) many people wonder why there are not more. When asked, Fall said, "We are drawing on a population of around 300 women with less than one third interested in sports. When you divide this by 6 sports the population for each team is very small." Fall added, "With only 40-50 girls genuinely committed to sports, many girsl have to crossover to two or three sports." If there are any girls interested in forming a new team, Fall is willing to help. When the women were interested in volleyball, for instance, and proved they were committed with a concreate desire and genuine interest, a collegiate level team was formed with two years. This was also the case with, most recently, the lacross club. As more women cone to this college, more women's athletic teams will be organized.

Newlin: "Happy Flying"

Convocation Offically Opens 199th Year

By VIRGINIA KURAPKA
Editor-in-chief

Approximately 100 students and faculty members attended the formal opening of Washington College's 199th year of the annual Convocation September 16.

Dr. Joseph McLain, President of the College, opened the ceremony with the introduction of five new faculty members. Stephen Drewes, of the Drama Department, Joachim Scholz of the German Department, Susan Lee-Bechtold of the Chemistry Department, Gregory Thornton, a new librarian and visiting assistant professor of psychology Donald Leitner, were all present.

Wanda Rich, Jeanette Schafer and Deborah Gangulo performed the trio, "Ut flos, ut rosa," by Ctivelli. Kathleen Mills, head of the Music Department, accompanied them on the harpsichord.

Dean of the College Garry Clarke introduced Margaret Rudd Newlin, "Convocation poet, and speaker." Mrs. Newlin received an honorary Doctor of Literature last May at graduation. She taught English here for a time, married a colleague, and had two of her sons attend Washington College. Newlin is also a scholar in her own right, having published works on William Boake and W.B. Yeats, and volumes of poetry. One of these, The Snow Falls Upward was nominated for a National Book Award.

In his introduction at graduation, Clarke mentioned that Newlin had raised five golden shafted woodpeckers, also called flickers, in her home, and it was on that topic that she chose to speak. Her account of her experiences in raising these birds gave a poetical light to the process of leaving home.

"Being a teacher, being a parent and raising these birds has something in common," she said. "As being a student, being a child and being a young bird also has something in common."

Newlin told how she adopted the nest when their tree was to be chopped down. The trunk with their hole was propped in a little-used bedroom, and, "By unanimous human vote I was elected mother," she said.

At first the nestlings would not accept food. Hunger won out, however, and as they realized Newlin posed no danger they began to flutter around and perch on her. "I began to see and feel like a bird," she said. Bugs became more attractive, and cats more menacing. "I felt a sisterly interest in the cries of a starling."

The pecking order which had been established held true as the strongest fledgling was the first to fly away. Others were more timid and landed on the ground outside, to be whisked back to the safety of the house until they would fly further.

Newlin's birds disappeared for the winter, and she wondered if they would seek new territories and forget their human interlude. In the spring, however, "they had not forgotten." Since then, her home has become, "filled with flickers."

Newlin closed by wishing, "students and faculty alike, happy flying."

Day to take Leave

by CHRISTY HOLT

Robert Day, Associate Professor of English, will be taking a semester's leave of absence this spring. He has been invited to spend the semester as a writer in residence at the University of Iowa.

The University of Iowa has the oldest and one of the best writer's workshops in the country. Day feels "honored" by the invitation to participate in the program. During his semester at Iowa, Day will be teaching an advanced fiction writing workshop for graduate students.

Day's replacement for next semester has not been chosen yet. The English Department listed the vacancy with the Bureau of Associated Writing Services this week, and will begin considering applicants in a few days. Day's replacement will be chosen sometime in November.

Silver, Denied Tenure, Resigns

by VIRGINIA KURAPKA
Editor-in-chief

Dr. Howard Silver, Assistant Professor of Political Science, announced his resignation effective September 29 last Monday.

Silver, who was denied tenure last spring, has been granted a fellowship with the Institute for Educational Leadership. He will be working in the Office of Legislation of the Department of Education. "I'll be helping to formulate educational policy, to work with legislative liaison staffs in the White House to pass educational legislation, and also to fight against those who would abolish the Department of Education," he said.

Although his decision surprised students, Silver said it was not sudden. "It had become clear to me last year that the tenure decision was not going to go well...This program presents the opportunity for me to make the transition form academia to government."

The job of replacing Silver falls to Dr. Tai Sung An, chairman of the Political Science department. "It's almost next to impossible to find a replacement on such short notice," he said. Although a temporary replacement was sought at first, "no one expressed a desire to come on a temporary basis," said An, and applications for a permanent position are being accepted. "It's not like replacing a gas station attendant or an A&P check out girl," added An. Silver's Maryland General Assembly Internship program will be continued.

Concluded Silver, "I guess just teaching wasn't enough to keep me professionally stimulated."

Convocation Blues

Although next year's Bicentennial is receiving most of the emphasis, the current 199th year is almost, if not as important to the future of the school.

A lot of the attention will be paid to the year during the celebration next fall. Many of the groups to which the school will look for funds for its third century will be examining the school's performance in the immediate past, as well as in the more distant one. This year's publications will form the record upon which bicentennial publicity and media attention will be based.

The holes get bigger instead of smaller in the Kent Quad, Richmond House may fall down around the ears of its present residents. A Professor refused tenure last spring decides to leave with a week's notice. None of these things reflect well on a college about to enter its 300th year.

The one high spot last week was Margaret Newlin's speech at the Convocation. Her likening children leaving home to birds leaving the nest was conventional, but charming. We all profited from the interlude of her address. It's too bad that most of the rest of the proceedings on campus were made to seem even more depressing by contrast.

Drewes Joins Drama Department

By JEFF ALDERSON

"I want to combine an academic career with a professional career and need to be near New England where there is a large educational center," said Stephen Drewes, the new assistant professor of Drama. Drewes has managed to combine teaching drama here during the school year, with professional directing during the summer with an acting company near Boston.

Drewes comes to Washington College from Palatka, Florida where he taught drama at Florida School of the Arts. He has been involved in many different areas of drama, including acting, directing, costume and set design, as well as some technical work. Directing comedies is his specialty; however, he has done and plans to do all kinds of drama. He wrote his undergraduate thesis on the subject of design, and with this strong background in costume and set design, it appears that Drewes has much to offer our Drama department.

Sometime during the next few weeks, auditions will be held for a tragic-comedy "Kennedy's Children." This will be Drewes' directing debut at Washington College. Drewes hopes that his work with the play will create interest in his work at this school. "I tend to think of all my productions as professional," added Drewes. It also feels that his professional procedure reflects his professional background.

The professional background Drewes speaks of is impressive. He has acted in many plays, including Twelfth Night, Dracula, and Cyrano de Bergerac in which he received a standing ovation for his portrayal of Raganeau. Three of the plays he directed were named among the ten best of the year by the Boston Critics' Circle. These include; Guys ★ Dolls in 1975, She Stoops To Conquer in 1976, and Love's Labours Lost in 1977. His extensive directing career includes most recently A Flea in Her Ear this past summer at The Publick Theatre in Boston.

Drewes has led a very colorful life. Not only did he live next door to Janis Joplin, he also has come in contact with Alistair Cooke, Tommy Smothers, Tammy Grimes, and Jackson Brown (when Browne was only 16). Some of these he met professionally, others socially. "I've met some in some of the strangest places," he said. While in a bar one night, Drewes met and arm wrestled Oliver Reed (Reed won, by the way).

Some of highlights of Drewes' life include having breakfast with Earl Warren and sitting two rows from Noel Coward at the premier in London of a revival of Private Lives in 1976. He also attended the original, Party in the Park in 1966 at Golden Gate Park, San Francisco.

Most of Drewes' immediate family have been involved in the arts in San Francisco. His grandfather was one of the colounders of the San Francisco opera, his grandmother was president of the Junior League, and his aunt was the head of the San Francisco arts council. Drewes' father is a superior courts judge and his mother was nominated for a Pulitzer Prize in journalism one year ago. With his family background Drewes was born into the world of the arts. His brother is a curator for the California Academy of Sciences, while his sister is a professional painter.

Drewes' family has lived in California since before the gold rush. His great-great grandfather was a fortune hunter who struck it rich by finding emeralds in Peru. With the money he gained, he bought land in California.

Washington College has acquired a colorful addition to the staff with Stephen Drewes. With his qualifications in directing and teaching, he is a definite asset to the Drama department.

Hayward Reports to Faculty

by STEPHANIE PAUP

George Hayward, Vice-President ofDevelopment and Public Relations, reported on three topics to the faculty at their meeting last week.

Hayward informed them of the College's search for a replacement for Jay Vogel. Vogel resigned his post as head of the Department of Alumni Giving and Relations, to accept the position of Associate Director of Development at Colorado College.

Hayward next reported that the College has successfuly met the terms of the matching grant from the National Endowment for the Arts on schedule. The Grant began in the 1977-78 academic year and continued until last spring. Over the three year schedule the grant provided $300,000. The Grant was the 16th largest from the 140 awarded the first year it was offered.

Hayward further reported that great progress has been made in the campaign to increase the Third Century Fund by $10.2 million. The Third Century Fund handles gifts, grants and bequests to the College. Hayward feels "that there is an overall improvement since last year."

Library to Add to Collection

Miller Library

The faculty has designated $4,000 for special library purchases. The Library Committee has invited the faculty to submit proposals by October 20.

The library material to be purchased with the Special Projects Funds is to be either a major purchase suitable for undergraduate study and research, basic to a given field, the cost of which would absorb too much of the departmental allocation or purchase, interdisciplinary in nature, that might support a course, but would be of interest and use to many students.

Subscriptions to periodicals or to continuing series will not be considered.

In the past the Library collection has been strengthened and broadened by the Special Projects Program, and exciting additions are anticipated this year.

Mailbox Controversy

by COLLEEN C MILLER

"It's a pain in the butt," groaned one student. "I think it's an improvement over last year, when I had my mailbox broken into," said another student.

Washington College student returned this year to find that mailboxes in Hodson Hall had been moved to the basement of Bill Smith. New boxes which can only be opened from the front by keys had also been installed.

"One of the reasons we found it necessary to move the mailboxes is that the Hodson area could nt be kept under supervision," explained Vice President for Finance Gene Hessey. "The glass in th old boxes was being broken and mail was frequently reported missing. Also, the Hodson area was under consideration for renovation."

"We're very pleased with the new mailboxes," Hessey continued. "One major advantage the new boxes have is no glass and no combinations to get out of order. Formaerly boxes were loaded from the rear, which with the mailroom behind the boxes, made them very susceptible to peiferage if one gained access to the room. With these new boxes, mail is loaded from the front and there is no way to gain access to them except by keys. This makes the boxes much more secure."

"Vandalism was the main problem with the old boxes," siad Director of Central Services Tom Shreck. "The location is good for us because we can provide better security here. The mail is placed in the boxes where students have access to it between 11:00-4:30 Monday throughl Friday and between 8;30-10:00 and 11:00-4:00 on Saturday. It is also a convenient location for Central Services, as before we had to sort the mail here, then transport it to Hodson by truck."

Many student find the location and mailroom hours inconvenient. "The mailboxes are nice, but the room is too small," said Sophomore Peter Kaiser. "The room gets congested during certain hours of the day," said another student. "And as far as I'm concerned, the mailkey is just one more key we have to carry around. Before we could wander in on weekends to pick up our mail. Now the mailroom is locked up most of the weekend."

Keeping the mail area secure was one of the major reasons for moving it to Bill Smith, according to Vice President for Finance Hessey. "We didn't have many options for new areas. The proximity to Central Services is our reason for the new location, because personnel can supervise abuse to the boxes and prevent tampering with the mail. Also, the new location will expedite handling of mail, saving both money and time in transporting it."

"So far things have been okay though we've already had students lose keys. We suspect part of the security problem was that whn combinations were broken, students who couldn't get into their boxes elected to break the glass. The new boxes are very inexpensive, if you consider the time and labor cost involved to transport the mail to the old boxes and keep it secure."

"Personally, I hate the new location;" responded Sophomore Wendy Murphy. "I've been there and it's never open. I'll go down right before my 11:30 class and the room is locked. I'm not saying the mailroom should be back in Hodson Hall, but it's too small."

"I think it's an improvement over last year," said Kaiser. "Especially since last year I had my mailbox bashed in. You can sit down there and read your letters, as well as other people's letters."

"I haven't had any complaints," said Shreck. "Three days a week there's a tie up for ten to fifteen minutes, but after that everything clears up. Once students learn the system, it'll be much better for them."

The C&P Telephone company donated funds for the mailbos renovations. The old mailboxes were sold to an antique dealer.

Question: What do you think of the new location of the mailroom.

Roger Vaughan, Junior—No, it's (the mailroom) too small. I always get the same mail.

Julie Wheeler, Senior—I don't like it. It's too crowded, and I don't get to read my mail on the way to lunch.

Kathy Waye, Senior—I like the idea of the new boxes but I think the room is very crowded and that the mailroom hours should be increased.

Steve Martz, Senior—I think it's great, a little crowded. I like the idea of the keys.

Study Skills Seminar Offered

by VIRGINIA KURAPKA
Editor-in-Chief

A five-week study skills seminar is to be offered to all students this semester by Dr. Bonnie Michaelson.

The non-credit course will cover areas such as planning and preparing study time, speaking in class, reading skills, writing term papers, and using and taking exams. "I have heard from students, faculty and parents that the problem is that students don't know what goes into studying effectively," said Dean of the College Garry Clarke.

Hopefully the course will, "help those students who are lacking skills, not ability in general," said Michaelson, who is also a counseling psychologist for the college

Michaelson volunteered for the job last spring when Clarke asked for suggestions and recommendations for programs for the fall. She has read material and textbooks on study skills, but has had no formal graduate training in the area.

The program may be run again late in the semester. Organizational meetings were held this week.

Special concentrations are offered in national government, urban politics, criminal justice, foreign policy, economic policy, and American studies. Sophomores and juniors interested in participating in this program during the Spring, 1981 semester should contact Dr. Taylor, 6 Ferguson Hall, as soon as possible and not later than October 10.

Pre-season Tournament a Success

by HARRY McENROE
Sports Editor

The third annual Chester River Invitational Pre-season Soccer Tournament was held last weekend on Kibler Field. The Shoremen hosted three teams, American University, Washington and Lee, and Western Maryland

The tournament, whose primary purpose was to get the teams in shape, was successful, according to Coach Athey. Playing three games in two days, each squad was put in condition for the regular season.

In the opening contest on Friday the Shoremen faced a strong American University team and tied them, 1-1. V.J. Filliben scored the lone goal for the booters. Ranked ninth nationally in Division 1, American U. seemed over-rated as they only won one of their three games.

On Saturday morning the Shoremen were defeated by Western Maryland in the last minute, 2-1, as the Terrors' Scott Bogart scored his second goal of the contest. V.J. Filliben again scored for the Shoremen, with Bill Bounds assisting.

Later the same day the booters ended the tournament with a 2-0 shutout victory over W&L. The Generals lost all three of their games at Kibler. Freshman forward Rob Gottfried tallied both goals for the Shoremen. The host team finished with a 1-1-1 record. Western Maryland was the unofficial tournament champion with a 2-0-1 slate. The Shoremen are rated nineteenth nationally in Division III

Shoremen Open Regular Season With a Victory

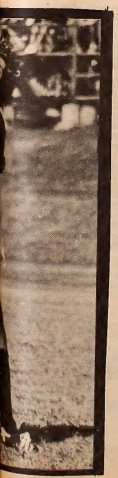
The Washington College Soccer team opened its regular season Wednesday by blanking a visiting Lebanon Valley squad, 3-0. Despite playing what Coach Athey termed a "lackadaisical" first half, the Shoremen took control in the second period and rolled to an easy victory.



Early in the contest the Shore booters played with a lack of intensity which Coach Athey fears may hurt the team in the future. Although there were several near-goals, the Shoremen failed to capitalize on their opportunities until the second half.

Freshman forward Rob Gottfried put the Shore eleven on the scoreboard midway through the second period with an unassisted goal. Although the defense, led by Ben Tuckerman, Curt Nass and Dave Bate, with Chris Kiefer in the goal, was never really tested, they stopped the "Flying Dutchmen" of Lebanon Valley continuously.

With eleven minutes to play, freshman halfback Ron Lauricella added another goal to the Shoremen effort off a fine feed from sophomore Mark Mullican. Mullican, showing no sign of a thigh injury which had kept him out of action for the past week, put the game out of reach with a goal following a corner kick from sophomore halfback Bill Bounds.

Shore Notes:

The Shoremen host York College tomorrow on Kibler Field. Game-time is 1:30. Senior fullback John Lonnquest is expected to return to the lineup, boosting an already strong defense.

Conn and Beardsley on Manchester

Two Senior Women Return From England

By BILL MORTIMER
Assistant Editor

Two senior women, Ellen Beardsley and Cathy Conn, have returned after a year of studying abroad at Manchester College in Oxford, England.

Selected to spend a year abroad in 1979 by the Manchester Committee, Beardsley pursued courses in both Philosophy and English and Conn studied English. The Manchester Committee, composed of Dr. Peter Tapke, chairman, Mr. Bennett Lamond, Dr. Robert Fallaw and Dean Garry Clarke selects two, three or four juniors to study at Manchester each year.

Different Study System

At Oxford, both Beardsley and Conn were forced into a new studying system. "It is not the same type of system as we have here" Beardsley said. Instead, there is a tutorial system whereby each student "meets with your tutor for one hour a week" she continued. At these meetings, the student is required to prepare an essay for each meeting. According to Conn "most of the tutors allowed you to make up your own topics" while some gave specific assignments. With the tutorial system, each student is working on an individual level with the professor. Further more, the student can only take one course for each semester, and there are three semesters which compose the school year.

Conn said that the tutorials "help your writing because you must write one." She added that, while tutors may assign a topic, they do not suggest references, "allowing you to be creative."

Beardsley said also that the essays show "how well you understand concepts, and how well you criticize them." The student, both noted, must be prepared to discuss and defend his essay. Beardsley said also that "your argument had to be strong."

The matter of adjustment to this type of program did take some time for both Beardsley and Conn. "I was apprehensive as to whether or not that type of program would suit me," Beardsley said. She found that she adjusted well, after learning to "organize myself." Conn, however, found that it was disappointing to be only able to take three courses. While no formal examinations were given, Conn said "it was like taking an exam every week" by writing the essay. But on the whole she found it to be a "great experience."

Beardsley, who will achieve a double major in Philosophy and English, took a tutorial and a half. Under this method, she had a philosophy tutorial every week and an English tutorial every other week. Throughout the year, she took Epistemology, the manuscripts of philosopher Emmanuel Kant and Aesthetics for philosophy. In English she had tutorials on English 17th Century Metaphysical Poets, Milton and finally, on Conrad and Lawrence.

Studying English, Conn took courses in English Romantics, in Victorian Literature and in Shakespeare. While writing essays on each of her tutorials, she found that the tutors "liked to have you connect fiction exactly with the author." To do this, she read over letters and biographies in order to relate ideas to the history of the author. She also studied a good deal of literary criticism on the authors of Romantic and Victorial works.

Overabundance of Culture

In addition to tutorials and preparation for them, lectures, plays and other educational experiencesweree offered. "There is a lot available" said Beardsley. Unfortunately I think now that I should have worked less and tried to get out and see some more shows." Conn added that "You can always expand; I'd go to lectures to learn outside of tutorials." The entire community, she feels, is an education. "Everywhere you go, you learn" she added.

Not only were vacations from Oxford relaxing, they were educational as well. Conn, for example, found that "when you live in England, you can understand their way of life, and thus, their way of literature." She stayed with people in the moor area where the Bronte sisters lived and where Emily Bronte wrote Wuthering Heights. From this, she not only learned where Bronte derived her fiction, but also gained a closer insight to the life which Wuthering Heights describes.

During the two semester breaks, both Beardsley and Conn were able to travel. Beardsley vacationed in Germany, France, Belgium, Italy and Austria. During the spring, she went for a month in Ireland on her bike, covering between eight and nine hundred miles. "I never had a flat" she said. In addition she "kissed the Blarney stone and saw three different costs of the continent." She also was to take weekend trips to various sections of England such as Dorset, Devon, Kingwall and the Lake District.

"Everywhere you go you learn"

Originally, Conn "planned to stay in England, but I found after it got cold that I wanted to get away." She traveled to Ireland and found it completely different. Over her spring break, Conn visited Europe.

At Oxford, Conn said, "there are a great deal of societies to join." She added, however, that most of them met on Wednesday, so it was necessary to join only a few. Of these offered, Conn joined the Architects Society in order to "go on trips as a tourist" to visit famous areas. As a member of the Sporting Club Conn went to a coursing meet, in which a fox is chased by greyhounds. This revealed something she had never before understood in a poem by Wordsworth, which mentions 'slipping the hound.'

Beardsley, who has rowed with Washington College for two years, continued her interest in crew in England. There, she rowed with the Corpus Christi College. This, she said, "was just tremendous." Not only did she enjoy the involvement with the sport, but also she found that since "the Manchester College community was so small, it was neccessary to get out and associate with people at different colleges."

Conn, as well, joined crew, at a different school, Linacre College. Unlike Beardsley, Conn had no previous crew experience. "I was going to be the cox for a while, but it was too scary, especially with the fog." she said. She enjoyed her experience as an oarswomen, and will continue rowing with the women's crew at Washington College, like Beardsley, Conn liked the fact that, through crew, she Was able to meet others from other colleges.

English "Interesting"

English society proved to be interesting to Beardsley and Conn. "The English people are super" said Beardsley, adding that while traveling they were always willing to "take you in and talk." Conn added that "the Englishmen really like Americans—England is physically smaller than America, the English tend to "think smaller" said Conn. Shopping centers, cars and stores all tend to be small.

Both Beardsley and Conn noted some of the same things about the English and their culture. The English are aware of both their educational system and their history. Conn said that "they have a higher level of understanding because of their exposure to history." Beardsley said that she found the English very much "aware of the historical tradition ofEngland how they seem to operate off of their awareness of that tradition."

Both students noted that the English system of education is much more thorough than that of America. "Most of the kids get (a great amount) of education in their equivalent of secondary school." Conn said that "I think their private schools are on the level of our colleges." She added that there were "kids translating Latin."

"There are alot of Americans over there, usually graduates" said Conn. They, she continued, are the ones who went to lectures a lot. As well, Conn found that "they offer a lot more than I thought they did; they can usually find a tutor for you from outside the College."

The year at Oxford helped "very much" said Beardsley. "I think it made me more aggressive as a student, more willing to formulate opinions and defend them." Through essays, both Beardsley and Conn developed better writing and speaking skills. "After all," said Beardsley "we wrote so much that if it didn't get easier, we would be in trouble."

Conn concluded "If I was going to give any advice, it would be to get your distribution over with before you go."

German Department Adds Scholz

By ANYA LIPNICK

"I have always lived in large cities and I'm pleasantly surprised with small town life" commented Joachim Scholz, the new German Professor at Washington College.

Nearly eleven years ago, leaving family and friends behind, he ventured from Germany to the United States to pursue his studies a American University. He graduated form the University of Chicago with his M.A. and PhD., in German.

Following graduation Scholztaught a year in Munich. He traveled back to the United States and taught another year at Tulane University in New Orleans, as a Thellon Fellow.

When asked why he chose Washington College, his response was, "having studied at a large university I find that teaching at a smaller college is more satisfying. You become aquainted with your students and their needs."

Scholz believes that the US has a more relaxed social atmosphere than Germany. So far, he enjoys the college, faculty, students and his new-found home in Chestertown.

Manhattan: The City in Black and White

by WILL CAMP

Unless you've been in a closet for a year, you've heard something about Manhattan. At the time of its release, nearly a year ago, Woody Allen was hailed in dramatic pastels on the cover of Time magazine. He was said, in the review of the day, to have come of age as a writer, film director and actor. Emotional security, the reviewers said, had led Allen into a craft that was unmatched by any of his American contemporaries. Even Ed Koch, the mayor of New York, liked the movie. Filmed in black and white, the City of Dirt and Decay looked good, better than good; the city looked worthy of being visited. Ah yes, the mayor and the tourist bureau loved it.

Serious stuff. Reading all this praise before the movie even moved out of New York for general release, I saw it for the first time with a critical burden on my back. People who were supposed to know about such things said this movie was good. How was I supposed to think? I'm prone to resist such advice. I considered Woody Allen my favorite moviemaker and star, yet he was now being compared with Charlie Chaplin and Ingmar Bergman, his two major influences. I liked the movie anyway. So much I went to see it a second time, and last Friday, thanks to Marty Kabat's film series, I saw it a third time.

Not many movies can stand up to a third viewing. Apocalypse Now I finally understood after the third viewing, but I twisted and turned while seeing it. Kramer vs. Kramer's Academy Award victory as Best Picture impressed me; those Hollywood people, ignoring Manhattan, insisted that this was a better movie. But seeing it once disappointed me, seeing it the second time, for I thought I might be hallucinating, annoyed me that I had been stupid enough to pay to see it a second time. No movie but Manhattan has been worthy of three sittings, not even Annie Hall, Allen's previous movie, which did recieve an Academy Award.

All right, all right, the story: Isaac Davis, an unemployed sitcom writer, finds himself stranded on Manhattan with two and a half neurotic people, one healthily adjusted lesbian (his former wife) and one beautiful and normal teenage girl. The movie deals with Isaac's (Woody himself) relationship with these people. It is a relationship mainly in nonparticipation. He tells Tracy, the teenager who loves him (Mariel Hemingway) that she shouldn't get too involved, that she should date boys named Billy, Biff and Scooter. He watches as his friend's (Michael Murphy) marriage , once healthy, collapses, because of his involvement with a woman who writes novelizations of movies (Dianne Keaton). The one time that Isaac does get involved is in his short affair with Mary-the-novelizer, which further disenchants him and ultimately turns him back to Tracy. While all this is going on Isaac's former wife is writing a biography about watching Isaac's self-absorbtion and "preoccupation with death" while she converted to lesbianism.

The Bad performances: Dianne Keaton and Michael Murphy as the two neurotics who end up together, in self-concious, extramarital bliss. Keaton got lucky in getting involved years back with Woody. He's helped her get exposure, He can't, unfortunately, help her act. Michael Murphy knows no other technique than the whine. He whines throughout the movie, with the expression of someone who has just eaten a bad piece of cheese, just as he did through An Unmarried Woman.

The Good performances: Mariel Hemingway, while being yet an untrained actress who has a difficult time sustaining character depth, shows us in short pauses, be it single expressions or lines; a delightful aptitude. She, unlike Murphy or Keaton; doesn't strain to get an effect. Meryl Streep is underused. She's good, but just didn't get a chance to use anything in this movie. Woody Allen has attained the skillful maturity that Chaplin did later in his career. He's always had no trouble convincing anyone that he could act, but in this movie it is the detail that proves him worthy. The final scene, in which Tracy convinces Isaac that six months is not too long a time to wait for her and that it would all be worth it, is mapped out exactly as the end of City Lights. We see only Allen's vulnerable face, from behind Mariel's head. The final look that final change of expression from wide-eyed, unsure boy to a confident man is pure, clean craft.

Matthews To Try New Wrinkle

Lacrosse Hopeful for New Season

reprinted from the Kent County News

Bryan Matthews, head Washington College lacrosse coach, will try a new wrinkle this fall.

He is primarily concerned with freshmen and sophomores. With a squad that has predominately that mixture (65%) that is the place to look.

Matthews, an All-American goalie here (1974-75) is coming off two losing seasons.

Washington College isn't use to losing ...not in lacrosse!

Last year the Shoremen struggled to a 4-7 final. A 13-12 overtime setback to St. Lawrence in the fourth game was pivotal. Washington blew a confortable lead and never regained momentum ... in the game or in the season.

Measles on campus scrapped games with Loyoia and Towson. The Shoremen got past Lehigh and F&M to manage a 4-3 record at midseason, but ran into tough UMBC and W&L late. Despite outstanding efforts against both clubs, Washington College went into a four-game losing tailspin bowing also to Delaware and Ithaca in the first round of the NCAA playoffs—all by a grand total of six goals.

Outstanding returning players include Paul Hooper, Jeff Kauffman and Dick Grieves.

Graduation took All-Americans Leckie Haller, Bill Hamill and Bill Herring, also Tim Hollywood, Jim Bradley and Tim Norris.

Academic trouble swept freshman goaltender Chris Anglim, defensemen Paul Castilano, and sophomore defensemen Ray Cameron. Matthews is hopeful all will return next semester.

Freshman crease attackman Chris Cox, who scored 12 goals, has transferred.

On a positive note Jon Green, who showed promise here in 1978 and 1979, is back in school, along with Trap McCaulley, who saw limited action as an attackman two years ago. Kip Sparrow, who dropped out as a freshman because of academics, has also returned. Joe Haschen, a 1978 squad member, is also talking about coming back in school.

This fall Matthews lined up two scrimmages, both at home. University of Maryland will be here Friday, September 26. Only freshmen and sophomores will play. The alumni will test the varsity on Homecoming Saturday, October 18.

This year's freshman crop "looks a little deeper in quality," says Matthews.

From Baltimore come three from St. Paul's School—a good sign. Hopefully, there is a Chalfant in the group. The three are attackman Craig Boynton (good lacrosse name), defenseman Marty Smith and goaltender Scott Vogel.

From Matthew's old school where Carl Ortman now coaches arrives midfielder Peter Hawley, Towson High School, long a W.C. contributor has sent attackman Shawn Brooks and midfielder John Darlington. From Boys' Latin nd Cocah Bob Shriver is defenseman Franz Fleishman.

The "island"—Long Island, New York—is the home of three middies and an attackman. The midfielders are Scott Brewster of Manhasset, Chris Duran of North Shore and face-off man Peter Stanton from Smithtown West. The attackman is Kevin Kiely of W.T. Clark.

Defenseman Bob Tutela, an all-star, is coming from New Jersey and Hanover Park.

Down in Virginia, Matthews gains Daniel McNeese of Blue Ridge School (Jesse Bacon and Jon Green's alma maters).

Matthews lost midfielder Shawn Fox of Cortland to Hobart at the last minute, but gained a bonus in the entrance of midfielder Henry Wittich from Gilman School.

This season, Matthews says Peter Jenkins will stay at home on attack. Dick Grieves is probably slated to play midfield. Defense, last year's strong suit, is this year's big question mark. Only Frank Filice, Kevin O'Connor and Tim Matthews are back in the fold. With Anglim not in school, Bruce Winand is top goaltender, but he will get heat from sophomore Jim O'Neil and freshman Vogel. At midfield the Shoremen also have Ben Tuckerman, Bob White, Tom Adams, J.C. Cunningham, Joe Cornerly, Mike Mariano, Shawn Harmon and Ed Nordberg returning.

Washington College has the numbers, but can they take the ball to the cooker (the goal)?

Taylor,Premo, An Take Silver's Courses

by VIRGINIA KURAPKA
Editor-in-Chief

The Political Science department will remain one man short, at least until January, following Dr. Howard Silver's sudden resignation last week.

Replacement Not Yet Found

A satisfactory temporary replacement could not be found, so Drs. Taylor, Premo and An will take over Silver's three courses. "We have one candidate who sounds very good," said An, "but, he's not available until January." He will be coming to the campus in the next few weeks for an interview, and will give a lecture.

Remaining Staff will Fill In

Premo will teach the Scientific Study of Politics, Taylor will take over American Political Parties, Public Opinion and Voting Behavior, and An will take on the Modern Government course. For this semester, the Annapolis General Assembly internship program will be run by An. The new member of the department will take it over for next semester.

An concluded, "It's a sacrifice, we're doing it for the students."

Richmond House's Fate —Still Undecided

by WENDY MURPHY
News Editor

"We cannot house students there safely," said Gene Hessey Vice President for Finance, of Richmond House.

Richmond House's problems are many and well-known. The kitchen ceiling which fell in last August, the second floor bedroom ceiling which fell in last year, the deteriorating porch, and the termites who seem to have made themselves at home are only a few of the building's m.aintenance problems.

According to Fred W. Dumschott in his recently published book, Washingto;! College "The Richmond Property was acquired in 1948. The acquisition consisted of a house and several acres of land. The house was converted into apartments which were made available to members of the faculty"

A proposal for the use of Richmond House was presented a few years after that by David Roach, then President of the Writer's Union. The proposal states "We propose the Richmond House be used as a 'writing house,' providing living quarters for six students who are actively practicing creative writing, and providing facilities for the Writer's Union, the Associated Writing Program headquarters, and the office of the professor of Creative Writing." It further states "the Writer's Union is one of the largest and most active student organizations on campus. We are in need of a place from which, to operate, a place we can think of as our own. We think we have a good idea, one that involves the students in precis, precisely the kind of project that a college should involve them in the creating of an intellectual world."

The Writers' Union was granted permission to use the house, but, after having spent about ten years there, they may have to move.

The administration reports that Richmond House will be used for the balance of this school year but there are no specific plans for what will happen to it then. The building may either be sold, renovated, dem, demolished, or left standing in its present condition, but it will not be used for housing. The final decision rests in the hands of the Board of Visitors and Governors and although it has been discussed on several occasions, nothing has been resolved.

According to Hessey, "Ti;e thing of it is that as Richmond House stande now, it fits the fire codes for when it was built. But, the minute we begin renovation on it, it must fit the presentfire safety codes for the housing of college students." He added that if the house is renovated, it would need to have fire retardent walls, fire-rated doors at each level of the house, a sprinkler system, and an enclosed metal or cement staircase installed in order to fit the fire codes.. Wooden frame houses are not allowed, by present law, to be used for college housing. This same principle of renovation which applies to Richmond House also applies to Spanish House and Little House.

The renovation and repair costs form the backdrop of the picture of Richmond House's future. The administration reports that no money has been budgeted, nor is any money being sought for a major renovation, but money is provided to insure that the plumbing and electrical systems are functionable.

"The Hill Dorms, the new steam line, and the Student Center carry a higher priority that the Writer's Uniton which concerns a small interest group of students." said Hessey. He added, "The problem line is money. If unlimited construction money was available, maybe we could have four or five things going. As it stands now, we have limited funds, and the Hill Dorms are our main problem. My personal feelings are that there are so many things wrong with Richmond House that it is just impossible to do a renovation."

Healso said "Richmond House is the preferred option of those who deve loped and participate in the creative writing program. They feel a need for their own little school and like the isolation that Richmond House provides. They would not like being situated in the middle of the campus. When you search for a suitable relocation, you seriously reduce the options."

Hessey stressed that there is no long-term commitment for the future to use the building and, "in its present condition, it cannot be considered a permanent home for the program."

He said, "My impression is that the Writer's Union has a great deal of support; Washington College would not be doing a way with it. I am sure that Richmond House could be used by the union without the students actually living there, but I don't know that it could be brought up to standards suitable for student housing. The basic structure is wrong. We cannot do anything with the existing building. We will simply see what available space we have for those students and approximate what it would cost to replace them or better bring it up to standards. Then, it is up to the Board of Visitors and Governors."

Ups, And Downs of Enrollment

by BILL MORTIMER
Assistant Editor

"Despite the prospect of a sharp drop in the number of 18-year-olds in the population, college enrollment could increase by as much as 3.5 per cent by the end of the decade, a study by the American Council on Education concludes."

From the Chronicle of Higher Education, April 21, 1980, Vol.XX, No.8

Whether or not these statistics will prove true for Washington College, only the future will tell. The real affect of the decline in the birth rate will not show jts full force untilthe year 1990. However, for 1980, enrollment at Washington College is down by thirty-four people over last year's total.

According to Registrar Ermon Foster, there are "664 full time undergraduates." Of these, 182 are freshmen, composed of 91 males and 91 females. Foster noted that "the 664 represents the total full time student body, that is a total head count of students in the continuing education program and the more able high school students who are permitted to take one college level course. Foster also said that "Added to that will be Graduate students. I won't know the total enrollment there until Friday" when Graduate school registration ends.

Foster noted that "there is a decrease, last year we had a total of 698. We are down 34 people in the full time enrollment." President of the College Joseph McLain rationalized this loss of students by saying "this year, the number of freshmen is approximately the same. Our enrollment is down not because of the size of the freshman class, but because thirty-three upperclassmen did not tell us that they did not plan on returning."

In the future, McLain feels that Washington College will not be hurt by the declining population of 18-year-olds. The main factor, as McLain sees it, is not so much the decline in population as it is the inappropriate education given at public high schools. "The big thing is not the demographics. Rather, a dwindling pool of students will have the academic promise to have a realistic go at Washington College" he said. Even with the decrease in students, McLain believes that "we will be able to enroll our classes of approximately 200", providing that the high schools increase their academic standards.

Jody Dudderar, of the Admissions department, provided almost the same figures for this years freshman class as Foster and McLain. "I believe the final total is 186, this may be different because we judge by the number of freshman who actually enrolled." She added that several freshman dropped out before registration. Dudderar, however, gave a higher estimate of last years class, saying that "we had 203" freshmen.

"It is a well known fact that the number of 18-year-olds has been dropping" Dudderar said. As a solution, the Admissions office will increase their recruiting efforts, their student search and high school visitation, and also employ a more personal touch, Dudderar hopes "to get students on campus and get them to reply if qualified."

The slight difference in size of the freshmen class is due to the number of applications recieved by the college. "We had fewer applications this year" Dudderar said. "Our acceptance rate, seventy-two per cent, was the same as last year, and our actual percentage of acceptances was the same", the only difference was that fewer applications were received.

With stepped up recruiting techniques, which, according to The Chronicle of Higher Education include "recruiting of members of minority and lower-income groups, women in their 30's and early 30's and men over 35...(and by) competing more strongly with industry in proving courses for employees" a possible loss of 797,000 students by 1990 could turn into an increase in enrollment of 300,000 students nation-wide. Presently, at Washington College, the problem could not only be getting more applications for next years class, but also to succeed in keeping some students at the college.

It looks like the Buildings and Grounds committee of the Board of Visitors and Governors, which meets this week, will take some kind of action concerning the Student Center. The need for more student facilities becomes even more pressing as summer ends and we all have to move indoors. Even if no major renovations are made this year, there ought to be some way to use the former mail and T.V. room outside the Coffee House. There may be problems doing this, but the possibility on a short-term basis should be considered. Even a paint job and lounge chairs would be something. SGA President Jay Young should be commended for his persistance in urging a project so obviously in the best interest of the student body. Jay's dedication is surprising, considering the disinterest of students toward the SGA. Somerset was so apathetic that it didn't even bother to elect a senator last week. It's interesting and frightening, to speculate on what kind of catastrophe it would take to make students here care.

Jim Graham is an exception. His was the only application for Pegasus editor last year, and one of only two recieved this year; he cared enough to be persistant and deserved the editorship the Board of Publications awarded him last Tuesday. He deserves our congratulations and the support of all students, especially seniors, in his work on the yearbook over the coming months.

Party Honors Dean's List

by BILL MORTIMER
Assistant Editor

Barring rain, the traditional Dean's List Party will be held this evening on the lawn overlooking the Chester River at Kentmere, home of Dean and Mrs. Garry Clarke.

Even if it does rain, the cocktail party honoring those students who, in the last semester, achieved "academic excellence" will be held. "We're going to try to have it outside in the yard," Clarke said, "it gets crowded in the house." He added that "last year, five minutes before the party was to start, it was raining buckets."

Preparing for the party is no small thing. Last semster, 194 students achieved a 3.50 avarage or above, making them eligible for the Dean's List, and thus, an invitation to cocktails with the Dean at his home. "We usually figure that by the time you invite all the students on the Dean's List, teachers and their wives, there are approximately 200" people invited, said Clarke. Seniors who graduated in May and were on the Dean's List are also invited.

Over the past twelve years, the concept of honoring Dean's List achievers has gone through some changes. "Many years ago when there were fewer students at the college, there was a thing called the Dean's List Dinner" said Clarke. Soon, however, as more people earned Dean's List honors, the entire thing "fell into limbo." Eventually, it was reinstituted as a party held in Hysson Lounge or the Reid Hall basement. When Clarke came into office he and Mrs. Clarke "thought it would be a nice thing to hold in our house."

The entire preparation for the party is done by Clarke, his wife, and Deans of Students Ed Maxcy and Maureen Kelley. "We do all the cooking," Clarke said. He added that on the day of the party, Dining Hall employees come to help. "We all get together and plan the whole thing, and then split the responsibilities up among ourselves" he said.

Clarke feels that while it is a lot of work, it is worth the effort. "The students have been appreciative...people seem to enjoy it. I think that is important." he said. The social atmosphere is a change, allowing faculty and students to get together and talk on a different level.

Clarke concluded that the preparations are going smoothly. "After awhile, you get pretty good at estimating what will be used" he said.

Republicans Attend Rally

by Glen Beebe

As the two presidential candidates were debating in the Baltimore Convention Center, Glen Beebe, Barry Campbell, Dave Gorman, Alex Hodge, Joe Holt, James Larrimore '80, Helen Lewis, Kevin Mahoney, and Cathy Mcguire were attending a rally and reception for the Governor and Mrs. Reagan.

The event started at 8:00 P.M. in the Baltimore Hilton with a cash bar and a seventeen piece band. Congressman Bob Bauman and Mayor Kelly of Ocean City greeted guests. The rally and reception were crowded not only by senior party members but also many College Republicans from around the state, as Congressman Bauman pointed out in his address. He said that he hoped the White House was taking notice that the youth was behind the Republican candidate. Bauman mentioned several of these youth groups, the first being the students from Washington College.

As the time drew near for the debates, the large crowd was directed to the large screen monitors provided for viewing the debates. During the debates, a contest arose between the Reagan and Anderson supporters (who were in the next room). When each side thought their candidate had scored a point, they would raise a cheer. Each side tried to out-cheer the other, resulting in much noise.

As the historical Presidential debate closed, the tension in the Reagan/Bush camp grew, for shortly Governor and Mrs. Reagan would be addressing the rally. It was the culmination of weeks of work between the senior party members, the College Republicans, and the Reagan Bush campaign. As he entered the hall people started shouting "Reagan" and "Number One." Governor Reagan and his wife, Nancy, were visably pleased by such an emotional welcome. He informed the crowd that he was pleased with the debate and looked forward to victory in November. The Governor's stay was shortened due to another engagement. However, we all agreed that this had been a night to remember and, with luck, an historic one as well.

SGA Elections Held Tuesday

by BILL MORTIMER
Assistant Editor

Elections for Student Government Senators were held Tuesday night, with all but one post filled.

Jay Young, president of the Student Government Association said "To my knowledge, the only problem we had was with Somerset (since) no one ran "for the one office alloted to that dormitory. A re-election will be held for Somerset when a candidate, or candidates is found.

Liz Edwardsen and Arlene Lee were chosen to represent Reid Hall. For Caroline House, Walter Forsker and Kevin Mahoney won votes and Kathy McGuire will represent the adjoining Queen Anne dormitory. Residents of Minta Martin chose Missy Dix, CeCe Grady and Sue Ericsson.

Wicomico will be represented by Harry McEnroe and Worcester by Tom Twomey. Kent House and Spanish House residents chose Doug Brown and Ralph Laws as their SGA representatives.

The New Dorms complex voted Donald Sutherland from Cecil House and Mark Simpson of Dorchester House as their Senators. Talbot House was not represented by a candidate.

"I'm pleased with the outcome" said Young. "I think we have some interesting, interested people."

Animal Crackers Leave Their Crumbs

by Colleen C. Miller

Crude. Rude. Socially unacceptable. And just plain fun. Baltimore's hottest ensemble "Animal Crackers" made a debut performance at Washington College last Saturday night and brought the house down.

There was nothing we could do. From the opening's little chorus line of "happy feet" to a hilarious closing, the action was swift and brutal. Perhaps a little too brutal.

Shades of Monty Python, Second City, and Saturday Night Live. With the nationally televised Saturday Night in its dying throes, some of us could have sworn we saw the ghosts of Chevy Chase, John Belushi, and Gilda Radner floating in the background.

Ah, "there's the rub." These people can dance. They can mime, sing, and act, even if it is the "Midol Melody." Trouper Jeff Marder harrased the audience with professional flair, and John Kassir's rendition of the Oz experience in "Oz Again" was wonderful. But why do they limit themselves to sexual innvendos, gags which grow stale after a while? "Animal Crackers" is one comedy act whose potential demands they expand their material to something a little less redundant.

Public auditions in Baltimore two years ago unearthed the likes of Linda Favila, Marie Marciano, John Kassir, Jerry Maglio, Jeff Marder, and Larry Schwartz. Students from Towson State University and the University of Maryland, Baltimore Campus, Animal Crakers, put together an improvisational act consisting of college life skits, lampoonish commercianls, and some of the wackiest characters this side of the Mason-Dixon line.

You know these characters: they're your mother's bridge partners, the kids with the myopic fish, your little brother. Typical off beat characters we all know. Animal Crackers has the uncanny gift of zeroing in on thosefunky topics we cringe at: prophylactics, dead people, hair transplants. But this is exactly what we need to see — ordinary things in an unusual, comic light.

Despite what seemed more comedians in the audience than on the stage, the Crakers held their ground with acting which was consistently competent. Some scenes slacked off, but these were usually the longer onew where humor was most difficult to sustain. Jeff Marder's solos were excellent too, and as master of ceremonies he kept us patient and interested during prop changes.

But this is no amateur circus act. The troupe opened in Baltimore to rave reviews and uproarious laughter. This summer at Best of Crackers show at the Bolton Hill Dinner Theatre was so packe that 50-200 people were turned away at the door. Marc Nasdor of the Hopkins News-Letter called Animal Crackers "the finest crew of motley scumbags" to hit this area in a long time.

Animal Crackers is under no restriction from the Federal Communications Commission. Perhaps this is why Kathy Kafer of the Baltimore News American wrote "When in doubt, the troupe resorts to sex or smut or drugs for a laugh." This troupe is too good to have to "resort" to anything.

Changes in material would be a good move. All material is scripted by Animal Crackers, who note that "all the sketches have been molded by the entire ensemble; so if you want to pick a fight, it will have to be with all of us."

Boxing gloves anyone?

This Week's Movie

Produceu and directed by Werner Herzog and starring Klaus Kinski, Isabelle Adjani and Bruno Ganz. In this literate, faithful and unusually beautiful adaptation of Bram Stoker's classic novel Dracula, Jonathan Harker visits the mysterious Count Dracula on business, leaving his exquisite, loving wife Lucy, alone while he journeys to the Count's remote castle. There the Count espies a picture of Harker's wife and becomes obsessed with finding her; abandoning a bitten, delirious Harker at the castle, Dracula spreads plague and death as he searches for Lucy. Klaus Kinski etches a poignant portrayal of the deadly, driven vampire, almost pathetic in his compulsive need; Isabelle Adjani perfectly delineates the virtuous wife who is willing to sacrifice herself for the greater good. Internationally acclaimed director Werner Herzog (AGUIRRE, THE WRATH OF GOD), has created a mesmerizing cinematic version of shadowy, chilling death.

William James Forum Speakers

by CHRISTY HOLT

Last week, the William James Forum sponsored its first speaker of the year. William Colby, former director of the CIA spoke on the topic, "The Intelligence Challenge of Eighties." The forum also co-sponsored Senator Biden of Delaware who spoke this week.

The forum, which originated eighteen years ago, was named for the famous American philosopher, William James. The interests of William James were many and varied. They included painting, exploring, medicine, psychology, and philosophy. Because the forum is named for a person of such diverse-interests, it presents a wide range of speakers. Past speakers include Ichagl Collins, Astronaut and Assistant Secretary of State; Betty Friedan, feminist leader; L. Patrick Gray, Acting Director of the FBI; Lawrence Cardinal Sheehan, former Archbishop of Baltimore; George F. Will, columnist and television commentator; and two US Senators from Maryland, Charles McMathias and Paul Sarbones.

The bulk of the funding for the forum comes from the SGA, and occasionally the lecture committee supplements the fund. Because Washington College is located near major cities; the forum has been able to entice many talented speakers without spending enormous sums of money.

The next scheduled speaker is Dr. Bruce Partridge, Professor of Astronomy at HaVerford College. Partridge is a Rhodes Scholar and received his PhD from Oxford University. He will be speaking on October 21, on "The Beginning and the End of the Universe."

Shoremen Unbeaten

by HARRY McENROE
Sports Editor

The Washington College soccer team extended its unbeaten string to three games with victory over York College and Upsala College this week.

On Saturday the Shoremen blanked the York squad 2-0 as the defense achieved its third consecutive shut-out. Senior goalie Chris Kiefer had six saves, while the defense, led by fullback Ben Tuckerman, allowed only eleven shots. The booters scoring was led by sophomore Mark Mullican and freshman Rob Gottfried. Each tallied a goal and an assist.

The Shoremen trounced a visiting Upsala team Wednesday at Kibler Field, 4-1. The Vikings applied pressure early. In the first two minutes goalie Chris Kiefer had to make two saves. However, the Shoremen regrouped and forward Rob Gottfried scored only four minutes into the contest. Upsala answered moments later with a goal which knotted the game at 1-1.

The booters went ahead to stay when V.J. Filliben scored following a great cross-field pass from halfback Bill Bounds. The exciting first half ended at 3-1, after Rob Gottfried added another goal to the Shore effort.

A lackluster second half was capped by a goal from sophomore forward Mark Mullican. Once again, the defense was outstanding, allowing only the one first half goal by the Vikings. The loss dropped Upsala's record to 0-2-1.

SHORE NOTES:

The team travels to Williamsburg, Virginia this weekend to participate in the College of William and Mary Tournament. TheShoremen will face two other Division I universities, along with the host school. On Wednesday, October 1, the booters will meet Navy at Annapolis. Next home game is October 7, versus Ursinus.

Women's Athletics ★ Underway ★

by JEFF ALDERSON

Women's athletics starts this school year with a volleyball game Friday night. Coach Penny Fall is optimistic about the team and states that the squad has developed the heart and drive she had hoped for earlier this year. "The girls are working hard and have a good attitude, so far." she remarked.

Three other sports, lacrosse, softball, and tennis, have had organizational meetings. The lacrosse club meeting went very well, with thirty to forty girls attending, while softball and tennis had very disappointing showings. Fall hopes that the poor attendance was because these are out-of-season sports and more girls may be interested in the spring. If anyone is interested, please inform Miss Fall as soon as possible that the athletic department can have the names of people to notify for meetings or practices.

Fall would also like to point out that attending these meetings is in no way a commitment for the spring. Any woman who may have any motive to participate in any sport is encouraged to sign up as soon as possible. Fall will be giving group lessons in the spring to those women signed up for a team.

Sometime this week, rosters will be put in the girl's dorms for intramural volleyball. Anyone interested should sign up by living unit; sorority, dorm, or floor. Fall hopes everyone will participate.

The opportunity to be a part of women's sports is still very much open. Anyone wishing to be part of a team should sign up as soon as possible with Miss Fall or the any member of women's athletic department.

The time and place of the organizational meeting for the Washington College cheerleaders will be announced at a later date.

Academic Council Begins

by BILL MORTIMER
Assistant Editor

The Academic Council held its first meeting for the Fall 1980 semester on September 22nd.

According to Dean Garry Clarke, chairman of the Council, the purpose of the Academic Council is to discuss "anything that relates to the academic program." From suggestions made by the Council, the faculty makes the final decision, as to whether or not school policy will be changed. Fourteen people, seven faculty members, six students and Clarke compose the Council. The faculty members are Dr. Edwin Gwynn, chairman of the Biology department, Dr. Thomas Pabon, chairman of the Foreign language department, Dr. John Taylor of the Political Science department, Dr. Robert Fallow of the History and American Studies departments, Dr. John Conkling of the Chemistry department, Timothy Maloney, chairman of the Drama Department and Head Librarian Betty Wasson. Jay Young, Charles Warfield, Glen Beebe, David Altvater, Linda Maddox and Geoff Garinther represent their respective major fields on the Council.

"At the first meeting the Council "considered two problems with the idea of graduating with honors," said Clarke. The problem, he said is that "in the past, if you had a D on your record, you could not graduate with honors," even if the D does not figure significantly.

In general, the council plans to "tie up a lot of loose ends from last year" according the Geoff Garinther. Mainly, Garinther feels the Council will be discussing possible revisions in the distribution requirements. Garinther said, "Instead of having three of four areas required, we will discuss the possibility of having students required to take four of four courses." That is not, Garinther added, to make students take more courses, but to have them take courses from a wider range.

Clarke said "we are taking things we talked about past last year and putting them into a package for the faculty to vote on." These will be curricular matters having to do with the distribution system, Math and English competency tests, and the course credit system; "A general look at the system" concluded Clarke.

In The Matter of Enrollment

by BILL MORTIMER
Assistant Editor

Registration of full time students for the fall 1980 semester is the lowest at the College for at least a decade.

The drop is surprising, considering the fact that most statisticians predicted an increase in enrollment over the last years, The Christian Science Monitor news service reported that "enrollments for the 1980-1981 school year may equal or exceed 19791980." The decline can not yet be blamed on the dwindling number of 18-year-olds because as The Christian Science Monitor reports "the number of 18-year-olds begins falling this year". In fact, an article in the May 12, 1980 edition of The Chronicle of Higher Education stated that "this year's freshman class at U.S. colleges and universities is nearly 5 per cent larger than that of a year ago the biggest one-year increase since 1975."

Not since 1975, then, has Washington College fit into the current statistics. Enrollment at the college in that year was the highest it has been for the past decade, with 772 full time undergraduate students. At either end of this midpoint there is a wide spectrum of change in enrollment. The decade started low, with only three students over the current figure for 1980 of 664 full time students. In 1971 enrollment jumped by almost one hundred students to 759. The next two years saw a slight decrease and, by 1974; enrollment picked up to peak in 1975. Dropping the next year to 689, enrollment began to pick up and, in 1978, reached 733 students. Last year enrollment dropped and this year, the trend seems to have continued.

The solutions could well be resolved by the Admission Department's proposal to upgrade recruiting techniques. But if the trend should continue, the college could be in danger. According to The Chronicle of Higher Education, "enrollment in private, four-year colleges will drop from 2,328,000 in 1981 to 2,137,000 in 1978." It further states that "the institutions most dependant on fulltime students in that age group have been the private, liberal-arts colleges with enrollments under 1,000," a definition which fits Washington College perfectly.

Of course, the college does have certain factors working on its behalf which will aid it during the decline. With a solid two hundred year old history, and a strong reputation in its wake, the college, though small can pull its weight. During the 60's and 70;s when there was a rapid growth for higher education in general, 77 colleges, almost half of which were small, private schools, were unable to survive the growing competition. Washington College was.

But, the present will be more difficult. Not only will the school be more actively soliciting high school seniors as candidates for enrollment, but also the number of those seniors will be smaller. To survive, it will be necessary to increase enrollment.

editorial

In a world, country, and school which seem at times to be run with only the utmost inefficiency and incompetence, it is heartening, nay, amazing, to find an exception amidst such mediocrity. And it is sad and all too predictable that only the apathy of the students prevents that operation from running at its most efficient level.

Not only by comparison with other schools but also simply on its own merits, the Washington College Food Service is superior. At what other school would students find steak every Saturday night, a decorating contest with a cash prize, and, most of all, as much consideration given to students' nutritional interests as to college finances? Dave Knowles is not only receptive to student input, he actively seeks it, be it positive or negative.

And yet, he's crippled by alack of student feedback that he seems so masochistically to want. About all that he hears is that we should get steak more often, or that it is too tough, over-cooked, or small. Try cooking 500 steaks and have them all turn out medium rare.

Instead of hiring an outside decorator to redo the dining room we use every day, Knowles has come to the students, and even offered to pay them for their decorating ideas. There has been little response. This lack indicates either that no student has an idea, or that no one has cared even to think about it. Thank heavens we don't have the food service that we deserve.

Letters to the Editor

In Case of Dorm Repairs

I am writing as a matter of public service. As you are doubtlessly aware, there are certain problems with current dormitory facilities. These problems need redress. To redress these problems, the SGA has a Residence Committee. I have been selected to act as Assistant Chairman of this committee. It is the function of the Resident Committee to present student grievences and suggestions before the Assistant Student Dean, the Student Dean, and the Chief of Maintainence Department. If any student has a complaint or suggestion about general dorm facilities, they should get in touch with me. As a member of the SGA, I am proud to state that it is an organization that wants to improve campus life for all students. Together, we canmake a significant difference for the better' And what better place to start with than the dorm facilities which we use everyday?

Sincerely Yours,
Senator Walter Foraker

Soccer Publicity Ignored

As a varsity soccer player for three years at Washington College, I have found it increasingly frustrating to play home games at Kibler field with virtually empty stands. The student body's interest (or lack of) may be a major cause, but I cannot overlook publicity as a factor. I do not think that the coaches and/or members of any sport should have to "blow their own horn." But if they do why does W.C. employ a "sports information director" whose job it is (by definition) to inform the studenh body of upcoming sports events. In confronting our Sports Information Director with the problem of fan attendance, she responded, (and I quote), "I used to publish soccer pamphlets and schedules, but it was a waste of time."

Is this the attitude a sports information director should have? And whom is she informing of what? A soccer team which is ranked 18th in the nation (Division III) should not be "a waste of time."

My feelings are that I (or any other member of a team) should not have to spend time producing posters, etc., to promote a team. I'm a student, not a Sports Information Director paid by the college. In the future, I think W.C. should be more sensitive, timely and active in regard to members of the community.

Scandinavian Seminar

Scandinavian Seminar is now accepting applications for its 1981-1982 academic year abroad in Denmark, Finlan, Norway or Sweden. This unique learning experience is designed for college students, graduates and other adults who want to study in a Scandinavian country, becoming part of another culture and learning its language.

After orientation and a 5-week intesive language course, often followed by a family stay, students are placed individually at Scandinavian folk schools or other specialized institutions, where they live and study with Scandinavians of diverse backgrounds. The folk schools are small, residental educational communities intended mainly for young adults. Both historically and socially, these schools have played an important part in the development of the Scandinavian countries. Midway through the folk school year, all the Seminar students and staff meet in the mountains of Norway to discuss the year's studies and experiences.

Because the Scandinavian countries are small, open and accessible, the year provides an unusual opportunity for the student to explore his or her particular field of interest by doing an independent study project. On the basis of a detailed written evaluation of their work, most college students receive full or partial academic credit for their year.

The fee, covering tuition, room, board and all course-connected travels in Scandinavia, is $5,400. Interest-free loans are granted on the basis of need, as are a few partial scholarships.

For further information, please write to: Scandinavian Seminar, 100 East 85th Street, New York, NY 10028.

byCHRISTY HOLT

The distribution of the Pegasus will be a little later than usual this year. The delay is due to the fact that the four page commencement section was lost in the mail over the summer. The pages have now been redone and sent to the publisher via certified mail. The Pegasus should be delivered in late October.

McLain Writes First Pyrotechnics Book

Dr. Joseph H. McLain, president of Washington College has entered the literary world with the publication of his first book Pyrotechnics.

Pyrotechnics by definition, "is the art of making fireworks." McLain treats this field in greater depth in his book. The techniques for making fireworks have been passed on through the centuries from father to son, until recently. Even now there are few articles written in this field of Chemistry. Lighting a match is one form of pyrotechnics used in everyday life. The compound used to create the flame is one example of pyrotechnics.

McLain first became interested in the sciences when he received a chemistry set at the age of twelve. He spent many hours mixing and concocting various chemicals. In later years while a student at Washington College he devoted his time to chemistry. After graduating he went to Johns Hopkins University where he was to take Chemical Engineering, but after persuasion by the president of the College he majored in Chemistry. He received his associate professorship in Chemistry. After graduating he came back and began teaching at Washington College.

During World War II, he served as a munitions development engineer in the pyrotechnics division at the army chemical center.

For the past fifteen years McLain has been compiling bits of information for his book. "For a while it was just bricks and copies were printed. Already eighteen hundred have been sold. Most were sold in this country but other countries, including the Soviet Union, have purchased copies.

McLain is pleased with the results of his book. "I have tried and am still trying to make a science our of what was and still is primarily an art," he stated in his book.

Lee-Bechtold Added to Chemistry Staff

by ANYA LIPNICK

Dr. Susan Lee-Bechtold , of Columbia, Maryland, has joined the faculty in the Chemistry Department.

When her husband became consulting engineer for a Baltimore firm, they moved south from Boston. Lee-Bechtold looked into a number of professorships before deciding on Washington College. The three and a half hour drive per day doesn't seem to bother her. Washington College seems to suit her well. "I like the idea of a small classroom because the professors are more accessible for help when a student needs it. The students and faculty form a unit from this one-to-one relationship" she commented.

Lee-Bechtold did her undergraduate work at the University of Michigan, and recieved her PhD in chemistry from the University of Vermont. She did five years of research in the feild of physical chemistry.

Before teaching in Chestertown she taught for two and a half years at Boston University. The chemistry classes she taught were as large as five hundred students. In teaching such large classes she felt out of contact with her students.

Presently she can be found in Dunning Hall working and trying to organize her schedule in her new surroundings. As she said, "The first year is always hard."

Gray Writes Energy Notebook

by SUE JAMES
Fine Arts Editor

Suzanne Gray, a senior Political Science major, spent this past summer working in downtown Baltimore at the Maryland Energy Office. Her job: writing The Maryland Energy Notebook.

Designed to "help the citizens of Maryland save time and money," Gray's 279-page Maryland Energy Notebook(MEN) is going to the press some time in November. The 2,500 copies of MEN will then be distributed to League of Women Voters offices, elected officials' offices, county offices, libraries, the President's Clearing House, and state energy offices across the country.

Gray has been working for the Maryland Energy Office for the past year. Last fall, while attending classes at Towson State University, Gray was a residential information officer for MEO. She gave lectures to community groups on energy conserVation, and MEO's activities around the state.

Suzanne is far from being unfamiliar with the aspects of energy conservation.

This past summer, Gray was asked to write the The Maryland Energy Notebook by her program manager, Rick Boucher. Since the notebook was included in the state's energy plan for 1980, and because its objective was to help the public on a wide scale, Gray accepted the task.

Researching material receiVed from the federal and state governments, and writing letters to foundations and organizations, were the major responsibilities of her position. This material dealt with energy conservation and renewable resources, i.e., solar, wood, wind, and water.

"Because I was aware of the financial problems involved in conservation, I researched private foundations and the grants available from the private sector."

Gray believes that there does exist enough financial aid to support an energy conservation program, and the renewable resources project, but the only catch is to find it.

She discovered, in the process of writing the MEN, that many organizations are at large that provide technical assistance and resource materials to the general public. Gray cites the Institute for Local Self-Reliance as one of the many groups involved in helping those persons interested in conserving energy.

"The Federal government has a multitude of programs available," Gray states, "but I preferred the private because they're less publicized although Federal programs are included too, of course."

Suzanne Gray experienced one problem during the course of drafting the final copy of The Maryland Energy Notebook, This was a type-setting difficulty of an expensive nature. In order to have the MEN type-set, it would cost the Maryland Energy Office $24,000. The only other alternatiVe was to haVe it photo-copied; so Suzanne's secretary had to retype for 179-pages of the notebook for larger margins.

Gray finished working on the MEN Friday, September 5 after writing the title page. It's now locked up in the Maryland Energy Office's safe.

Sargeant Studied in Alabama

by WENDY MURPHY
News Editor

Senior biology major Sue Sargeant was one of eleven students from around the country selected to attend the University of Alabama for undergraduate research this summer.

Approximately one hundred and fifty students applied for the chance to work with graduate students to gain exposure to scientific research. Each student chose to work in one of five departments. Sargeant chose the pharmacology department.

Her work consisted of studying the relationship of the molecular structure of drugs to the effect that drug has on small animals. She said, "We used analogs of known drugs and changed the structures. Then, we tested these to determine if the derivatives were better than the known drugs. We would see if the derived drug was longer lasting, more toxic, etc."

Sargeant said that her summer work will help her with her research project which deals with the effect of aspirin in the clotting of blood in mice.

Seventy-five people have registered for the non-credit courses. There is no age or education requirement. Length of courses range from five to ten weeks, and there is also a weekend workshop. They are on varied and contemporary topics.

Classes with fewer than ten people registering were cancelled. Of the courses offered, Hoon said that "the most popular by far is the 'Aerobic Dance'". This course, taught by Ms. Karen Smith, has students aged twenty to seventy years of age.

Other courses for this fall term include "American Music" taught by Dean Clarke, "Controlling Inflation and Recession: The why and how of Government Economic Policy" taught by Dr. Michael Malone, "Biblical History" taught by Mr. James Archibald, "State Planning and Taxation" taught by Mr. John Farrell, "United States and Conflict in the Middle East" taught by Dr. Cobert Fallaw, "Hatha Yoga" also taught by Ms. Karen Smith and the "Writer's Weekend" taught jointly by Mr. Day and Ms. Mary Wyatt.

The "Writer's Weekend" is not scheduled until the end of October and it will be publicized shortly. Hoon stressed the "Writer's Weekend" is devoted to creative writing. Students may take the courses offered by PACE as well as participate in the "Writer's Weekend", but student rates do not apply. The "Writer's Weekend" has an unlimited enrollment.

Premo Writing on Columbian Politics

by GINNY KAMMER

Dr. Daniel Premo, Associate Professor of Political Science and History is currently at work on a book dealing with contemporary Columbian politics.

The projected publication date from Premo's book is late 1981. Premo said, "I anticipate it will take me the better part of a year to do the research and complete the writing."

Premo is writing his work for the Hoover Institution on War, Revolution and Peace, which describes itself as "an interdisciplinary research center for advanced study on domestic and international affairs in the twentieth century." It was founded at Stanford University in 1919 by the late President Herbert Hoover. Premo's book is part of a series on Latin America that the Hoover Institution on War, Revolution and Peace is publishing. Premo added that "it has resulted in some indecision on the part of the editor of the series as to which countries would be most suitable for publication at this time."

Premo is pleased about the series' In an interview with TheElm last February he stated that the series is "filling a void" in the realm of Latin American history. Premo's interest in the series stems from more then 20 years of research concerning Latin America, especially Columbia.

The Hoover Institution on War, Revolution and Peace is well known for its Yearbook on International Communist Affairs.Various contributors write for this annual publication. Premo has contributed profiles on Peru and Guatemala, as well as Columbia in the past.

Board to Decide on Bid

by GINGER KURAPKA
Editor-In-Chief

Bids taken last week for renovation of the Hill House have caused the estimate by almost $100,000. 'The low bid of 1.15 million dollars did not include $75,000 for the architect's fee.

"We've instructed the architect to get a breakdown of the bid," said Vice President for Finance Gene Hessey, "to see if we can bring it in under the estimate," by cutting it. The Board of Visitors and Governors should then decide at their meeting on Saturday whether or not the adjusted bid is acceptable. The contract would then be awarded if the decision is favorable.

The German Undead

by HARTMUT KAMP AND AURELIA D. SMITH

During the era of the silent movies, Germany produced a number of film classics, among them F.W. Nurnaus "Nasferatu" which served as an inspiration for Herzog's Nosferatu the Vampyre" (1978). The Nazis used the cinema to spread their propoganda; after the war, B-and C-movies involving good-hearted mountain dwellers and their cows prevailed. Herzog tries to go back to the great tradition of the silent movie, but can't quite recreate the quality of the original "Nosferatu", although many scenes seem to be literally copied.

The fate which befalls the characters in the movie is quite ordinary: Jonathan Harker, who works for a real estate agency, is sent to Count Dracula to sell him a house in a German town. When the vampire sees the picture of Harker's beautiful wife, Lucy, he immediately consents to buy the house and leaves his estate in a hurry, taking nothing but the obligatory black coffins filled with grave soil and several plague stricken rats. The crew of the ship on which he is being transported as certified sod for biological experiments' dies of the plague. The ghost ship lands in the German town and spreads the disease. Harker, who had hurried homeward, has come too late. The town can be saved only if a woman of 'pure heart' detains the vampire until the first cock's crow; the light of day will kill the monster. Harker's wife Lucy undertakes the sacrifice. But all's in vain: her husband turns into a new vampire, whereby Herzog strikes a more spine-chilling note than Murnau, who ends his movie happily with the monster dead, and rats sold to the Psych labs.

Herzog's new Dracula is shown not as the incarnation of evil, nor as a faintly disgusting and utterly terrifying shadow of the night. As a matter of fact, he comes off as a somewhat tragic figure who inspires sentiment with his sincere wish for peace and quiet, and his bloodthirstiness, which is shown not unlike a daily nicotine fit.

The contrast of good vs. evil in Herzog's epic expressed through the use of brilliant versus sombre colors does not create the atmosphere of imminent danger and evil as convincingly as Murnau's use of black and white contrasts. The same is true of Herzog's characters, who are pale by comparison with the original, except for Lucy, who flourishes when she submits to Dracula's bite, fulfilling the poor monster's desire for human closeness by spending a night of deadly and sensual bloodsucking with the undead.

Auditions Upcoming for "Kennedy's Children"

by JEFF ALDERSON

The Washington College Drama Department has announced that auditions will be held on October 13 and 14 for the second major production of the fall semester, Kennedy's Children, by Robert Patrick. Auditions will be held in the Studio Theatre in the basement of Tawes at 7:00 p.m. Scripts are available on closed reserve in the library.

Kennedy's Children opened November 3, 1975 at the John Golden Theatre in New York City. It is set in an American bar approximately ten years after the assasination of President Kennedy, and concerns the effect of the assassination, and of the following decade, on the lives of five characters. These include an embittered political activist, an unsuccessful off-Broadway actor, and a veteran of the Vietnamese War. There are, in all, six characters - three men and three women.

The production's director, Assistant Professor Stephen Drewes of the Drama Department, describes the play as a "tragic-comedy." "It is at the same time funny, moving, and controversial. This play is particularly meaningful to me," states Drewes, "because the decade which this script explores was tremendously important politically and socially in this country. It is also a time which I remember very vividly, and I can relate to every character in the play in one way or another."

Drewes is hoping for a large turnout at auditions. "All are welcome," he says. "Experience is unnecessary." When asked for advice for the novice auditioner, Drewes said, "First of all, just relax. The more you enjoy the audition, the more the director will. Secondly, there's no need to feel intimidated by a lot of people trying out. And remember that the only way to discover whether or not you enjoy and have a talent for performing is to jump right in and do it."

The play will be in rehearsal five nights a week from October 15 through November 19, and will run from November 20 through November 23. "The fact that the play will be in production on the anniversary of President Kennedy's assasination," states Drewes, "is entirely coincidental."

This Week's Movie

JORGE AMADO'S

DONA FLOR and her two husbands

Directed by BRUNO BARRETO Starring Sonia Braga, Jose Wilker and Mauro Mendonca. Music by Chico Buarque.

A CARNAVAL/NEW YORKER FILMS RELEASE

Directed by Bruno Barreto with Sonia Braga. This is an intoxicating carnival of a movie, full of bright colors, noisy parties, home cooking, balmy Bahia atmosphere, pulsing Brazilian music, and stemy softcore sex. The story, a kind of up-dated ribald folktale based on Jorge Amado's novel, concerns a young widow whose first husband is seen dropping dead of dissipation when the film begins. In flashback, we learn that he gambled incessantly, whore-mongered, downed rum by the quart, beat his wife, stole her money—and was dynamite in bed. Remarrying, Dona Flor gets the respectable, considerate husband she's always yearned for, but, much to her horror, she finds her neglected libido calling husband #1 back from the grave in all his priapic splendor. As Dona Flor, Sonia Braga combines a sensual physique with an exciting screen presence that several critics found unmatched since the early days of Sophia Loren. The heady hedonism and blithe spirits of Dona Flor have made it the most successful film in Brazilian history, both at home; where it outgrossed Jaws and Star Wars combined, and abroad, where it is eclipsing the track record set by Black Orpheus. Gary Arnold of the Washington Post says, "A classic erotic comedy . . . Barreto can express lust with class, and it's an exhilarating, civilized gift."

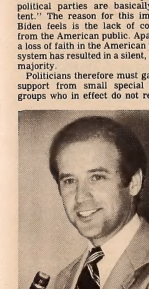
Biden Lectures



by JEAN FEGELY

Senator Joseph Biden, a democrat from Delaware, delivered a speech here September 23 as part of the William James Forum lecture series.

Biden, who commutes daily from his home state to Washington, arrived in Chestertown after attending an important conference concerning the situation in Iran and Iraq. Chairman of various Senate committees, including the Foreign Relations committee, Biden feels that the American political system is about to experience several changes in the next decade.

Biden stated, "We are at a point where we are faced with a paralysis, political parties are basically impotent." The reason for this impotence Biden feels is the lack of concensus from the American public. Apathy and a loss of faith in the American political system has resulted in a silent, inactive majority.

Politicians therefore must gain their support from small special interest groups who in effect do not represent public opinion in general. Senator Biden feels that the decisions that are made in the next four years will have a tremendous impact on the country for the next twenty years. "The decisions will be irreversible, the pendulum must swing the other way: there is nothing else to do," stated Biden. As the American people realize that major decisions must be made dealing with national as well as economic security, Biden sees a change coming. Moral majority groups may spring up and become a major new force in politics. People want to return to the basics and become more active in government decisions. Biden said, "there aren't any more political heroes. Politicians used to be able to say "Trust me" to the public, but that doesn't exist anymore."

A need for a sense of political discipline within the system is indespensible, accordingly. Senator Biden noted that the need for a change in the 1980's will promote party unity and more public involvement in government.

Ex-CIA Director Speaks at Forum

by JEFF HUFFINES

William Colby, former director of the CIA from 1975 to 1976, kicked off the William James Forum September 18 with a state-of-the-art report entitled "The Intelligence Challenge of the Eighties." Received by a docile audience, of 200 or more people, Colby traced the history of western intelligence operations, the evolution of American intelligence, and the challenge of American intelligence both within the parameters of the Constitution and the world at large.

Colby compared the "clinical, stiletto, and blond" of the James Bond spy with today's modern intelligence. "The key element of modern intelligence," said Colby, "is a core of scholars from every branch of science and art." This scholarship coupled with technology and the American constitution has, according to Colby, "revolutionized American intelligence operations."

The destruction of Pearl Harbor propmted the U.S. government to create the CIA as a means of gathering all existing intelligence information under one roof. The post-World War I, the world was to be "safe for democracy", but in an age of the totalitarian threat, the CIA is instructed to be "proactive" to Colby, "more ruthless, if necessary, than its adversaries around the world."

Simply speaking, the spy essentially operated outside the law. "The agency," explained Colby, "was forced to make up its own rules as it went along and made many mistakes". These mistakes, believed Colby, made up for themselves through the "swinging of the pendulum." For example, the U-2 crash over Russia in 1960 "paid for itself" with the Cuban missile crisis in much the same way that the Vietnam and Watergate traumas are now paying for themselves with the pending CIA legislation in Congress. "Vietnam and Watergate," said Colby, "taught us that no element of the American government is outside of the American Constitutional system."

During Colby's term of office in 1973, every case that went over the line through the years was collected into a "little bundle" and put into a safe." Not indicative of correcting mistakes and quietly putting them into effect," said Colby, "we created this great uproar for about 2 years." Colby believed this hurt the U.S. by both frightening the confidence of our allies and supplying ammunition to our enemies.

"What are the flash points of the future?" asked Colby. First and foremost is Russia. Simply speaking, Colby explained that there are two breeds of animal at the Kremlin' There are the "imperial-minded soviets" intent upon the idealogical conversion of the world versus those who are willing to compromise through the SALT process. According to Colby, what the U.S. must worry about are the imperial, national and idealogical pretensions of the USSR. "The most dangerous weapon used by the Soviet Union against the U.S. is not...nuclear weapons," warned Colby, "but has been an unarmed transport aircraft full of Cubans spread around Africa, the Middle East, and Central America with considerable effect." The other up and coming superpowers to concern ourselves with, according to Colby, are Communist China, intent upon modernizing itself by the end of the century; and Brazil.

"We must talk about the problems of not only today," said Colby, "but of problems 5 and 10 years down the road so that we can sit down and talk about the kinds of programs that can get at the causes of these otherwise devastating problems." In South Africa there is the potential for racial prejudice to infect the rest of the continent and international institutions. In the Middle East, the backlash against modernization, so evident in Iran, threatens to spread among the Arabic principalities. In Central America there is the "polarization between brutal dictators on the one side and ruthless terrorists on the other." There is also the invasion of Latin American immigrants to the U.S. in search of better jobs without the protection of the law. "We must go into those societies," said Colby, "and deal, not with just an oligarchy interested in protecting its position, but with some new leadership that wants to spread the economic base of those countries."

The increasing gap between Third World poverty and industrial affluence is, according to Colby, "a major challenge as we look out into the world of the eighties." Population increases, mass starvation, debt servicing, high energy costs and wasted potential aggravates the already desperate situation.

As a result, the leaders of the Third World, "look around for some weapons they can use to get what they consider a more equitable distribution of the world's wealth." These weapons include economic cartels and embargos, a call for a new international economic order; political demagogue and violence. The proliferation of nuclear, biological and chemical warfare agents is, said Colby, "one of the most novel problems that this new generation is going to be certain to face."

Coupled with this economic gap is the festering 'stagflation' afflicting the industrialized nations. Colby asked, "Are we going to split the developed economies of the world where we weaken ourselves and each other, or are we going to understand the nature of this economic problem together?" Despite the siren song of protectionism,' Colby believes that existing international institutions can solve these economic problems as long as the nations cooperate.

The challenge to American intelligence then, according to Colby, is to understand these forces operating throughout the world. "We are talking about information made available to our people," said Colby, "perhaps not the secret source from which it comes, but the analysis so that we all concern ourselves with the problems."

Crosby Returns from Spanish Semester

by JEFF ALDERSON

Senior Spanish major Shannon Crosby spent last semester at the International Institute of Madrid.

"When I first left for Spain I was a History major," Crosby stated. After Shannon returned to the U.S. in August, Dr. Nate Smith of the History Department suggested that she consider majoring in Spanish. Crosby thought about it and concluded, "I don't want to lose the foundation in the language I obtained while in Span so I'll build on that foundation and major in Spanish." She had chosen a History major as a stepping stone into law but decided that a major is not the most important aspect of entering law school.

In Spain, Crosby lived with a family in which no one knew any English. She had originally planned to eat only two meals a day, breakfast and dinner, but after discovering that breakfast consisted of coffee only and dinner was eaten at 10:00 p.m. she soon changed her ways.

The people she encountered, especially the older people were basically very friendly, helpful and patient. The only qualm she holds against the Spanish people was the male attitude. "The men are very chauvinistic, especially the middle to lower class," Shannon commented. "This, coupled with the unfortunate reputation that American girls have, can make life very difficult if you're not used to it."

The International Institute in Madrid, which Crosby attended, houses many American programs from large universities, including the one from NYU through which she was accepted. While there, Crosby took four courses: Spanish Composition, History of Modern Spain, Literature of 20th Century Spanish novel, and Art in the Prado Museum. All of her professors were Spanish and only her compositon teacher spoke English. "Unfortunately most of the students were American," she remarked. "It was difficult to meet people my own age who spoke only Spanish and would force me to speak it. If you're not surrounded by people like this you can't learn it."

"I immediately want to say that their educational system is much more difficult than ours," Crosby said. She found it much more rigorous and restrictive than the American system and it appeared to her to be more time consuming. The university system in Spain is five years long and they have no grading system comparable to the US. "You either pass all and if you fail you keep going back until you pass," Shannon stated.

Since she only had classes on Mondays and Wednesdays, Crosby had time to travel around Spain. She visited the towns of Toledo, Cuenca, and San Sebastion. Everything outside particularly impressed her. During spring break she went on a motorcycle camping trip from Madrid to Portugal, down the coast, to southern Spain, and back to Madrid. She also had a chance to take a train to the Pyrenees.

When school finished in May, Shannon went to stay with another exchange student from Washington College, Holli Young, in Paris. After a few weeks they left for Belgium for a month.

The things that impressed Crosby during her stay in Spain included styles, education, and the history. She felt that the history seemed to be reflected in everyday life.

Of everything she encountered in Spain, Crosby most liked the people of the north. She was impressed by their openness and their generosity with time and possessions. "If you were sitting at a table with five or six people and someone lit a cigarette, he wouldn't do so without first offering a cigarette to everyone present. They shared everything," she commented, "They were very proper and well mannered."

"It was such a personal experience," she said, "I must have gotten something out of it because I hope, come May, that I'll be going back for a year."

Members of the men's and women's crew worked at dredging around the dock

Battle with the Chester River

Crew Left High And Dry

by HOLLI T. MATHISON

At 4:00 pm it was balmy and the breeze was cool. A perfect day for the crew to get on the Chester River.

Except there was no water. "No water!" is an all too familiar phrase to the crew and unfortunately, it happens all too often. It is not that the river dries up, only the crew's dock. At low tide the dock is encased in thick mud, making the channel inaccessible.

There are two ways of relieving the crew's plight, dredge a pathway from the dock to deeper water, or extend the floating dock. Five years ago the school was given an estimate of $22,000 to dredge the path. The figure has nearly tripled since then. A floating dock extension is also expensive; and each remedy would be frustrated by the red tape of acquiring the proper warrents from the government.

So on Monday it looked like the crew would not get rowing until the tide cycle changed. And with a race coming up this Saturdayeach day lost on the river was crucial.

But the crew coaches, Eric Stoll and John Wagner, had an idea. They brought about ten plastic buckets down to the dock and, with enthusiastic smiles, jumped thigh deep into the mud.

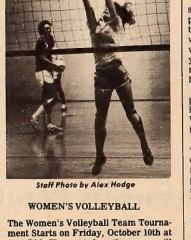
The crew caught on, and three oarmen sloshed into the mud after their coaches. They lifted armloads of mud into the buckets. The rest of the crew carried the full buckets up the dock and emptied them on the bank. The process continued for two hours, until a path had been cleared.

What is to keep the mud from sliding back into the new path? "Nothing, as far as I know," said John Wagner as he climbed out of the mud. "This is an experiment. But we had to try something." "If this holds for a while," Eric Stoll announced, "we may make Dredge Day an annual event."

Disappointing Week for Shoremen

by HARRY McENROE
Sports Editor

The Washington College Soccer team suffered through a disappointing week. The Shoremen absorbed twin 3-0 setbacks in the College of William and Mary tournament over the weekend and were defeated Wednesday by the Naval Academy squad, 3-1 in Annapolis.



In all three games, however, the booters faced top-notch competition. In fact, the Shoremen have now played three of the top five ranked Division I teams in the Middle Atlantic region.

In last weekend's tourney the Shoremen met the host school and eventual champions, William and Mary, in the opening game. The long drive to Williamsburg may have had an effect on the booters, as they were out-played the entire game. Without a stellar goaltending effort by senior All-American candidate Chris Kiefer, the spread could have been worse than the 3-0 final.

In the consolation game of Sunday the Shoremen lost to a strong University of West Virginia squad, 3-0. The booters played much better in this contest, but penalties plagued them as the Miners managed to score two goals on free shots. Though the Shoremen could not produce an upset in the tournament, the early season experience against first rate competition will undoubtedly help the team in its quest for the MAC crown.

In Wednesday's battle in Annapolis the Shoremen were dominated by a physical Nac-vy squad. The Midshipmen scored two unanswered goals in the first half and added another midway through the second before the booters managed to put one on the scoreboard. Senior John Lonnquest scored the lone Shore goal on a penalty kick late in the contest.

A lack of offensive firepower has damaged the team's effort in recent games. A defensive player, in fact, scored the single goal in the last game. The Shoremen must get it together since tomorrow conference play begins with a game at Swarthmore.

WOMEN'S VOLLEYBALL

The Women's Volleyball Team Tournament Starts on Friday, October 10th at 6:30 P.M. The next day, the game will begin at 10:00 AM, both games held in the Gymnasium. On Tuesday, the Team will meet with Loyola and Cecil Community College at 7:00 P.M.

Cross Country

by ED NORDBERG

Men's cross country, a once forgotten sport on the Washington College campus, has undergone a resurgence due to the amazing performance of hard-working senior Ken Merz. Merz has won five out of the first six meets this year, boosting the harriers' record to a respectable 3-3, the best start the team has had for quite some time.

"Ken continues to be a pleasant surprise," said coach Don Chatellier. "He has helped resurrect the program. We're receiving strong performances from others on the team as well."

As in the past, cross country had a very small turnout. The team consists of only six full-time runners. This makes it very difficult for them to compete with other conference schools, such as Widener, with squads of twenty-five or more.

Despite its small size, this year's team has great potential. Jeff Luoas, with two years' experience behind him, has run a consistent second throughout the early part of the season. Senior Bernie Kelley, a newcomer to the sport, ran a surprising third in last week's invitational meet in Fredericksburg, Virginia. Peter Cameron, the most valuable runner last season, has been hampered by various leg troubles so far, but should be an invaluable asset down the stretch. Talented freshman Dan Bakley and a much-improved Kevin Kemke round out the squad.

The harriers just may be the most dedicated athletes on campus. They run six to eight miles a day, seven days a week to prepare for their 8000 meter races. Their last home meet is next Wednesday, October 18, against Delaware State. With six meets remaining, the runners could conceivably finish their season with a 6-6 mark. This achievement would be a minor miracle considering the size and limited support of the team.

Brohan Company Gets Bid

Hill Dorms Contract To Be Awarded

by VIRGINIA KURAPKA
Editor-in-Chief

In a unanimous decision last week, the Board of Visitors and Governors agreed to award the contract for the renovation of the Hill Dorms to the Charles E. Brohan company, for $940,000, or such low figure as the architect can further negociate.

The original bid of 1.15 million dollars was shaved by $75,000 to bring it in under the estimate. A storm drain system which would have emptied on to the fire lane has been eliminated and the wall thickness increased. Windows with a northern exposure which were to have been bricked up for asthetic as well as energy-cost saving reasons will probably be replaced with insulated double-pane storm windows. The school may put the finishing plumbing fixtures and have the maintenance department install them to avoid using contracted labor.

Any additional cuts will probably be made this week, according to Vice-President for Finance Gene Hessey. Once the contract has been officially awarded, delivery of materials will be the main determinant of when the construction will start. The Board imposed a completion deadline of Fall 1981, with liquidated damages as the penalty for non-completion. The contractor would have to pay for each day beyond the deadline that the job was not completed. How effective this may be is doubtful. Said Hessey, "I've seen it work is some cases, and other contractors I've seen just ignore it."

There should be relatively little disruption to the campus once construction does start. Storage of the materials will be in the basements of the buildings. The contractor has also been made aware that he must be sensitive to the noise level. "One of the attractions for the contractor is that it is inside winter work," said Hessey.

SAT Scores Better than Norm

by BILL MORTIMER
Assistant Editor

According to an article in the Sunday edition ofthe New York Times on October 5, Scholastic Aptitude Test scores of college-bound seniors continued to drop for the 18th year with the Class of 1984.

The report said the "average scores on the two-part test have fallen from 502 to 466 in mathematics and from 478 to 424 in verbal skills from 1962 to 1980." The highest a student can score on either section of the examination is 800.

Yet at Washington College, the standard for the Class of 1984 seems to be better. The average verbal SAT scores actually rose over last years', going from 470 to 490, 60 scres far better than the normal, even for that of 18 years ago. Scores on the mathematical section of the SAT's stayed virtually the same as last year's freshman class. The article states further that "from 1979 to 1980, scores declined one point on the mathematics section and three points on the verbal section, the largest combined drop since 1977." Last year's class with the verbal score of 470 was just one point above the average score of 469. A jump of twenty points, then, is quite impressive.

Another impressive fact of this year's freshman class at Washington College is that two-thirds are from public schools and from these, 71 per cent of the students were ranked in the upper two-fifths of their high school class.

Board Notes

by VIRGINIA KURAPKA
Editor-in-Chief

•$6,000 was allocated for an engineering study of the proposed student center on a time and material basis. Funds from the maintenance reserve fund originally destined for the student center had to be used for the Kent House steam line. The center has been given top priority by the Board.

•The Board approved five recommendations from the Buildings and Grounds committee. Theta House is to be torn down, neither Spanish nor Richmond House is to house students next year. The rooves of Cain Gym and the Trustee House are to be repaired. Periodic reports on vandalism are to be delivered to the Board, and a five-year maintenance plan is to be drawn up as part of the operating budget.

•Honorary degrees are to go to Finn Casperson, chairman of Beneficial Finance and the Hodson Trust, Sir Fraser Noble, Vice Chancellor of Aberdeen University of Scotland, and to Jimmy Carter, if and when he comes to campus.

Clarke Reports to Board

by BILL MORTIMER
Assistant Editor

Dean of the College Garry Clarke gave a report to the Board of Visitors and Governors at the meeting held on October 4th dealing with the problem of student writing skills.

The report, a response to a memo sent by the Board and the Faculty and Curriculum Committee, dealt basically with the formation of the voluntary Writer's Workshop. The memo, sent to Clarke on April 17th of this year "expressed concern for student writing skills and for students taking the Education Block for degrees in Education. It also expressed concern that some students do not study English Literature while at Washington College" said Clarke.

Part of the solution to the concerns stated in the Board's memo was the formation of the Writer's Workshop taught by Dr. Diane Cousineau. Writing competency tests were administered to freshmen during orientation. From the results, a group of students whose writing could be improved for college work, were offered enrollment in the course. It is not obligatory, nor does it count for any college credits. "I gather students are being helped by this," said Clarke, adding that it is still too early to determine the success of the program. "Some students are just getting their first term papers" he noted. Dr. Cousineau added that "the first program was just for freshmen. A lot of students aren't coming. I think they feel that they can not deal with the burden of another course."

Although figures change weekly, Clarke said that last week only fifteen out of thirty-eight students were attending the workshop. "Six could not fit it into their schedules and seventeen just didn't show up" said Clarke. He added that "there is some concern that not everyone took advantage of the program that should have."

The program will continue, and further reports will be made to the Board. "We got ourselves started" said Clarke, "now it is going to be a continuous process." And, as Cousineau noted "those who have come are benefiting." As well, she said that "I've sent out letters to the student body and I hope that students will be coming now on a tutorial level to talk about their individual writing problems."

Both Clarke and Cousineau admit that there are problems with the Writer's Workshop. Cousineau said that "students who are taking Forms of Literature, as many are, find that there is too much writing." Clarke concluded that "we have to finally come up with the best possible program that we can have, see where to go from there."

Faculty Meeting Notes

by VIRGINIA KURAPKA
Editor-in-chief

•The total enrollment of 681 students, full- and part-time, is less than that on which the operating budget was based. Mr. Hessey has imposed two measures to cover the $200,000 loss. No new equipment will be purchased by any department of the college, thus saving approximately $25,000. With the exception of the salary budgets, twenty percent of the outstanding budget balances are to be encumbered. These measures will realize half of the shortfall. Higher interest rates, gifts to the school and cash management for better returns on short term investments should provide the other half.

•Of 38 freshmen contacted, fifteen students voluntarily are participating in the Writing Workshop, six had scheduling conflicts and seventeen did not respond.

•Students having one or more "D's" will no longer be denied honors at graduation, if their average still meets the requirements. Departmental honors will continue to be awarded only to students with Dean's List work in the major area, and honors on the senior obligation. A motion to eliminate the senior honors requirements was not carried.

•Funds are being sought for a security system for the library.

•A memo to the Student Affairs Committee condemning the pinball machine in Mrs. Dee's as inherently anti-intellectual and demanding that it be removed was considered by that committee. It recommended to Mr. Hessey that it be moved to the Coffee House.

Craig Langwost, Harry McEnroe and Steve Mullinix examine damage done in Little House

editorial

At last; some genuine, concrete progress is being made. A sound design plan for a student center, which has been too long in coming, is supposed to be on its way. Hopefully once it gets here, it won't get bogged down in bureaucratic red tape. Students need this center, and they need it soon. The enthusiasm of the Board of Visitors for this project is encouraging and welcome.

On the subject of the Hill Dorms, once they are ready for occupancy, who will be housed there? Three of the four fraternities may feel they are somehow automatically entitled to move back in, although they have not always been there in the past. A great deal of money is being put into this project. To deny all but a couple of elite groups the privilege of occupying what may become the most desirable housing on campus is unjust. If the fraternities are entitled to live in the Hill Dorms simply because they are an official group and require a chapter room, are not the sororities equally entitled? And is not the Writer's Union also a candidate for one of the dorms as an official group which not only requires space but is losing its home this year?

It doesn't look like the Hill Dorms will be ready for occupancy next fall at any rate, no matter how optimistically the situation is viewed. Students have adjusted well to a somewhat tight housing situation. Attrition and a small freshman class have helped that situation, but they have hurt even more in other areas. The whole college will be affected by a moratorium on equipment purchases announced at this week's faculty meeting to compensate somewhat for the anticipated shortfall in College revenues. The effectivenessss of such a moratorium is itself doubtful since it will at best provide only an eighth of the deficit.

Outlook for Pegasus 1981

by CHRISTY HOLT

This week, work will begin on the 1981 edition of the Pegasus. Jim Graham has been chosen editor, and Arlene Lee is the assistant editor. Last week a meeting was held to begin organizing the staff. There will be approximately 15 staff members this year.

There will be a few changes in this year's Pegasus. One of the most important changes will be a reduction of copy. Graham would like to replace superfluous, run of the mill copy with pictures, and more meaningful copy, possibly in the form of quotations, poetry, and short fiction.

The size of the book may also be changed this year. The book will be the usual 144 pages long, but may be smaller than usual in width and length. The size reduction is due to budgeting restrictions, coupled with the rising costs of yearbook printing.

Graham is very enthusiastic about this year's book and would like to see more people get enthusiastic and contribute their time, talent, and to making the book a good one. To do this, "we need a lot of input from the student body...after all, the book is for Them," he said. Anyone interested in working on the yearbook can contact Jim Graham, or simply come to the next Pegasus staff meeting.

Mailbox Controversy Continues

We strongly feel that a definite change of hours for mail pick-up is needed. As most students at Washington College either stay up late on Friday nights or they leave for the weekend, we assert that mail room hours be changed on Saturdays and Sundays.

Most of us engage in living up to the expectations of a rigid schedule Monday-Friday, what with classes, social functions, meetings and athletic events to attend. When the weekend FINALLY rolls around, we feel that the students should have a choice in what he/she does with it. Therefore, we propose that the mailroom ought to be kept open later than twelve o'clock in the afternoon on Saturdays and ought to be kept open during feasible hours on Sundays, in order that returning students may have the option to pick their mail up. This way we will have the opportunity to retrieve our mail at our convenience on the weekend, and will not have to worry about sticking to a rigid "mail pick up schedule".

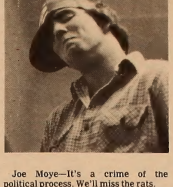
Question: (Asked of Thetas)

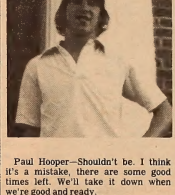


"What do you think about Little House being torn down?"

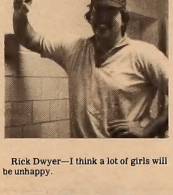
Question: (Asked of Richmond House Residents)

"How do you feel about having to abandon Richmond House next year?"

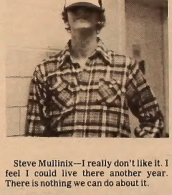
Harry McEnroe—A terrible tragedy, a grave social injustice. I lived there.



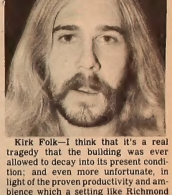
Joe Moye—It's a crime of the political process. We'll miss the rats.



Cathy Conn—I think that it the college wants to close down Richmond House, they should be willing to either repair the house or provide an alternative place for writing students. The students working on the Review and Broadsides also need the house



Tamara Dubin—If Richmond House had been taken care of all along, nothing would have to be decided and I'd be living here next year. But now I don't want it demolished because it is old, and because destruction is unnecessary.



Paul Hooper—Shouldn't be. I think it's a mistake, there are some good times left. We'll take it down when we're good and ready.

Rick Dwyer—I think a lot of girls will be unhappy.

Steve Mullinix—I really don't like it. I feel I could live there another year. There is nothing we can do about it.

Kirk Folk—I think that it's a real tragedy that the building was ever allowed to decay into its present condition; and even more unfortunate, in light of the proven productivity and ambience which a setting like Richmond House generates, that there was no foresight to guarentee that the Writer's Union would have a home in the future. Things look pretty shaky right now, however, the Writers would be happy to move into President McLain's house if it could be arranged.

Writer's Union Needs Its Space

Day on Richmond House

by ROBERT DAY
as told to Wendy Murphy

"I have a sentiment for the house, but I can't be in favor of housing students in unsafe quarters. Sentimentality is one thing, safety is another," said Professor of Creative Writing, Robert Day.

The main question concerning Richmond House's future seems to be "If the house cannot be used, what is going to happen to the Writer's Union?"

As of yet, it is undecided as to where the writers will be moved, but it is certain that they will not be living in Richmond House next year. Day said, "we would rather be situated in the middle of campus than not be situated at all. We would be very glad to have our own building again. I don't envision having our own floor of a dorm or a suite in the New Dorms. It just would not be the same as Richmond House because it does not have that eighteenth-century closeness of writers."

He wrote an essay on such a building being set aside for writer's entitled "First, to Find Out a Spacious House." In that essay, he wrote, "to be a good poet or writer is to have a liberal arts education. It is to make what is abstract concrete, through metaphors and allusion taken, often enough, from other branches of learning."

The essay further states, "True, Hemingway did not go to college and take creative writing courses, but Hemingway did hang around with writers . . . and later they hung around with him. It wasn't all drinking and swapping lies about hunting. When writers are young, they tend to talk about writing and writers. Literary communities flourish because writers need to know from one another how to go about the craft and the art of writing. Such communities have been around for a long time: they've formed around taverns and bookstores. Now they are flourishing around colleges and universities. If the creative writing workshop is a more formal arrangement of literary talk than the tavern or the bookstore, that has to do with the requirements of the academy, than with the interests of writers. Besides, creative writing workshops don't replace the informal literary communities; they tend to foster them. And in so doing, they help create the atmosphere necessary for the life of the mind to thrive, an atmosphere of learning, talk, comparison, allusion, and growth. Such an atmosphere is at the heart of a liberal arts education, and the spirit of the liberated condition."

Day, who has had his office in Richmond House for over ten years, said, "we have more than just courses, we have a literary society. In histories of societies, there is always a building associated with each. The reason for this is that artists believe in the concrete affirmation of what is evident in our world. We, the Writer's Union, have a history. James Dickey was here. Katherine Anne Porter was here. The students live surrounded by this."

He said "I have an education principle in mind; an educational philosophy of which the house is an extension. I regret that no money was budgeted or sought for renovation. If that's impractical, they ought to consider giving us one of the dorms presently standing instead of talking about building another one. I don't know what to do, but Mr. Hessey is right. That's the sadness of it all. I cannot argue with them because it concerns the safety of students. I wish that someone would come out of the blue and say, "I know it is too expensive to renovate Richmond House, but here is the money. Do it!""

Day added, "Mr. Hessey did ask me before if Spanish House would be useful. My impression is that the administration made a commitment to Spanish House. It seems they thought it to be in better condition than Richmond House and that any investments in it would better pay off."

The Insanity of Mary Girard

Eighteenth Century Eumenides

by BILL MORTIMER
Assistant Editor

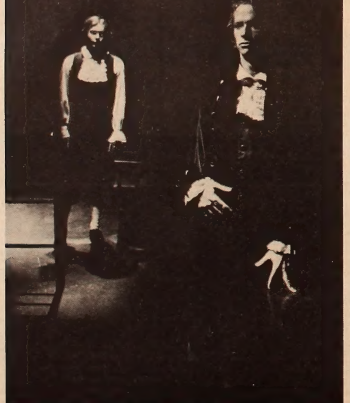
One-act plays tend to deal with oblique situations. There simply is not enough time for the writer to deal with a great deal during the short time a one-act play should take. In The Insanity of Mary Girard, which opened Thursday evening in the Gibson Fine Arts Center, playwrite Lanie Robertson handles an historical event in a short (one hour, fifteen minutes) time slot. The result is extraordinary. The Insanity of Mary Girard is a full, detailed play which covers a lot in a little time. It does not seem crowded and never is boring.

In 1790, Mary Girard, wife of a rich Philadelphia merchant, was committed to the Pennsylvania Hospital by her husband. The play, which is a fictionalization the events, deals with Mary's acceptance of her situation. Mary Girard, the play contests, was not a woman who should have been committed to an asylum. She is portrayed as being frustrated by a cold husband, as a victim of society's expectations. Her main problem is her husband Steven, who committed her to the hospital.

Timothy Maloney staged The Insanity Of Mary Girard in the Studio Theatre. The effect is a good one, suggesting the closeness of audience to actors and actresses to the situation that is necessary. The set is reminiscent of a cell. Although the basic design is simple it is both effective and shocking. Six black ladders are set vertically around the playing area. A section of the ceiling has been removed and the ladders rise through the hole into the great nothingness above. Certainly representative of the prison bars, the ladders become an integral part of the play's action and a prop for all of the actors. In the center of the stage is a 'tranquilizing chair', a device of primitive means used to restrain patients of the asylum. Technical works, directed by Larry Stahl, are excellent and simple. The lighting, controlled by Joneen Neilson and part of Maloney and Stahl's direction, is used to its greatest advantage. Spotlights are placed at the top of each ladder and directly on the chair. The effect is frightening. Maloney, through set design and lighting, creates a cold and gloomy atmosphere where one would certainly expect to find the insane.

Acting by all of the cast is certainly up to par. Sally McKenzie as Mary Girard is all that we can expect of her. She is a craftsman and she performs her craft meticulously, turning in perhaps her best performance on the Washington College stage. Under Maloney's direction, she portrays Girard as a woman confused on many counts but still strong of will. Upon the audience's arrival, she is found in the tranquilizing chair with a box over her head, the accepted method of treatment of the day. In this moment, her control, though silent, is epitimized. But released from the box she blossoms. Her entire range, from hysteria to self-control to reminiscence to resignation is tested by this role and the transitions from one beat to the next are flawless.

The roles of the Furies are filled by actors who take on additional roles. Nick Nappo returns to the Washington stage as the Warder, with an excellent performance. This is an actor who knows what the craft is about. His taunting of Mary takes on many looks and voices. He makes violent, inhuman pokes at her and entices her as he frustrates her.



As Mrs. Lum, Jodee Baccalla is orderly, precise and cold. She portrays the poor mother of a rich daughter with a stiff upper lip and no time for "tears or buts". In short, she attacks her role with a vengeance. As part of the Furies she shrieks out menacingly with Nappo, and, of the five Furies, is the most frightening. John Foul, in the role of Mr. Phillips, is a change from the other four. He delivers his speeches with marked pauses, emphasizing the hypocritical "these orders are from my superiors" attitude which the role requires. As a Fury, his taunting is almost childish, a most enraging kind.

Ginnie White's Mrs. Hatchet is a crazy woman taking Mary's illegitimate baby, is frightening, and certainly proof of White's talent. She handles the woman as a raving southernbelle-manic-depressive gospel-preaching shrew. Along with Baccalla as one of the Furies, her shrewness continues with shrieking movements and quiet taunts of false promises. Finally, freshman Nancy Brown turned in an excellent performance as Polly Kenton, one of Steven Girard's "many mistresses". Her sweetness and sympathy for the unsuccessful wife never go to full hatred. But her answers, all truthful, have no reason to doubt, are vicious. This same sweet aggressiveness continues into her role as a Fury.

Collectively, the Furies are figments of Mary Girard's tired imagination. They speak in a circle, one never finishing a sentence, but collectively doing so. One may think they are belligerent and cruel, but finally they allow Mary to see exactly what she has never been able to see. The only reason for her is to become insane. The Furies are frightening, from the moment they call out Mary's name at the beginning of the play until the last scene when she replaces the box on Mary's head. They recall ancient Greek theatre, with the Eumenides in Aeschylus' trilogy, The Oresteia. Through them, Mary is allowed to see why and how her family disintegrated so, and through them she is able to find a way to be happy as an inmate in the asylum.

Will Camp takes on the only role aside from that of Mary which is not part of the chorus of Furies. Mr. Girard's husband Camp is cold and uncaring. It is easy to see through his performance why Mary Girard did what she did. There is nothing human about Steven Girard, and that is exactly what Camp shows. Girard's affection is for money and what it can buy, and with that money, he secures Mary's ill-fated future.

The Insanity of Mary Girard will be presented this evening through Saturday, October 12.

This Week's Movie

Directed by Terrence Malick and starring Richard Gere and Brooke Adams. Set in the Texas Panhandle wheatfields on the eve of World War I, Days of Heaven tells the story of one woman torn between two men. The beauty, humor, and tragedy of normal lives provides the archetypal material for the narration by a streetwise 12-year-old. Writer-director Terrence Malick guides a masterful, sensual blend of sight, sound, emotion, and illusion to create an exceptional and accessible work of art. Penelope Gilliatt of the New Yorker says, "A most eloquent and important film . . . One of the best films about America in a long time."

Work Progressing for Bicentennial

by JEFF ALDERSON

During the 1981-1982 school year, Washington College will be celebrating its two-hundreth year as an educational institution. Bicentenial Steering Committee has been formed consisting of six faculty members, several administration officers, including the Dean and President of the College, three members of the Board of Visitors and Governors, and five students. According to Dr. Peter Tapke, a member of the committee, "we are trying to stimulate discussion of our two-hundreth year observence."

The bicentenial will be celebrating all next year, beginning with fall convocation. The founders of the college, especially Reverend William Smith, will be honored, at what is planned to be a very colorful convocation.

The bicentenial will be

Continuing in the same spirit as the fall convocation will be the George Washington's birthday convocation and commencement. The president of the United States has been invited to speak at either of these events, and would receive an honorary degree. This is a very uncertain matter since there is an election before the bicentenial; however, President Carter's office has been notified and has received the invitation warmly. They are, of course, not making a commitment.

Dr. Tapke sts stated, "This will be a whole year of special cultural events in which all clubs and committees will try to put on programs to make it a year of outstanding qualities and excitement." All of these programs will be a chronological move through the history of the College. The fall semester will begin with celebrations of the eighteenth century and, as the semester ends, will move through the nineteenth century. The spring semester will be more concerned with celebrations of the twentieth centruy. The end of the year will focus on the future of Washington College and of the liberal arts.

The theme for the bicentenial will be, "Liberal Arts: The Renewing Challenge." The committee is aware that the phrase may have more than on interpretation; however, they feel it covers the wide variety of plans for next year. Dr. Tapke added, "This is a natural time to take stock in what you're doing and what you'll do in the future."

Many special events are being planned. One may be a river pageant in the fall of 1981 featuring the Pride of Baltimore, training shows from the Naval Academy, rowing events, and small sailing boats. Dr. John Conkling is arranging an enormous display of fireworks over the river on the night before commencement in 1982. All of these events are designed to support the ten million dollar Third Century Fund.

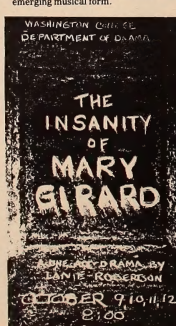
The Committee had a meeting last Friday. Five people will work here next fall specializing in monumental outdoor sculptures. They will be living and working here for a number of weeks, and will each work on a creation of his own as well as working on one outdoor sculpture collectively. The funding for this program, around twenty thousand dollars, is coming from federal, state, and county art committees and foundations. "This is a fairly important gift to the college form the outside, S" commented Tapke.

As the bicentenial year for the school nears, the students and staff of Washington College should feel proud. This is the first school in Maryland to have a bicentenial. The events celebrating our birthday will bring favorable attention to the school. Now is the natural time for the school to "blow our trumpet", as Dr. Tapke says.

Lafferty Performs

by JEFF ALDERSON, SUE JAMES and WENDY WOLF

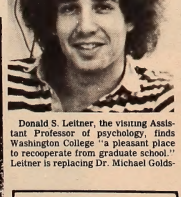
Maramatha Music recording artist Karen Lafferty gave a concert at the Board of Education building in Chestertown last Wednesday night. Thirty to forty people enjoyed an evening of songs, testimony, and prayer.



Lafferty, who is best known for her song "Seek Ye First" is thirty-two years old and unmarried. She comes from a small town in New Mexico and currently lives in California.

Primarily a Christian music missionary, Karen has traveled to Athens and Amsterdam. In Amsterdam she is involved in Music from Missions, an outreach training group. Musicians attend these teachings for a month and are then sent to existing ministries in the need of musicians. The group's objective is to bring the music ministry to the people.

Lafferty gave a delightful performance of Christian mode of music. Far from the traditional hymns, Lafferty's songs ranged from the countrified "Peace Thru the Day," to the Spanish style "El Salvador," to the beautiful worship ballads, "Father of Light" and "Beautiful Day." During the country flavored song, "Peace Thru the Day," the audience was encouraged to sing along and clap.



The set consisted of seven songs and was about one hour long. Between songs Lafferty talked about her life and relationship with God. She also told about her ministries in Europe. With the small size of the audience, the entire concert became an intimate experience for the performer and spectators.

More concerts like this are planned. In February, John and Lisa Wickam may appear. John was a member of the first Christian rock group, "The Way," and is currently a member of the "Benny Hester Band". Lisa was an up and coming singer appearing in nightclubs in California. She has performed with her husband in the group "The Parable." Chestertown is fortunate to get singers like this to perform locally. Christian rock is a relatively little known form of music, yet it is becoming increasingly more popular. Washington College students now have the opportunity to bear and experience this emerging musical form.

Leitner Joins Psychology Department

by STEPHANIE PAUP

Donald S. Leitner, the visiting Assistant Professor of psychology, finds Washington College "a pleasant place to recooperate from graduate school." Leitner is replacing Dr. Michael Goldstein this year while he is on sabbatical at Kent State University. Leitner, a native of New York City, received his Bachelor's Degree from State University of New York at Stony Brook in 1976 and his Master's Degree from Bryn Mawr College in 1978. He will receive his Ph.D this May.

Greek Student at Washington College

by SUE JAMES
Fine Arts Editor

Freshman George Seremetis speaks English quite fluently as a Greek student with only one year's background in the language.

The English Language Institute at American University is where Seremetis received his language education. He enrolled last September for the 'crash course' in English while living with his uncle in Washington, D.C. Seremetis decided to take the English language course as a preparation for a college education at an American school.

Seremetis decided to attend college in the United States as an alternative to enlistment in the Greek armed forces. In Greece, males who are 19 must serve in the military, or attend a foreign college. Seremetis still plans to enlist after receiving a degree in Business Administration.

Seremetis found out about Washington College while attending classes at American University. He sent applications to various American schools, and was accepted here first.

Classes are somewhat difficult for Seremetis, because they are taught in a foreign language, however, his professors are helping him to understand the material. He has a Greek-English dictionary in his room to which he refers quite frequently.

American culture is quite different from the Greek one that Seremetis was exposed to. He believes that his countrymen are more friendly than our own.

One aspect of American culture that George accepts willingly is the difference between American and Greek currency. One American dollar is equal to the equivalent of 43 drachmas in Greece. George said the value of the dollar has really depreciated in Greece.

Seremetis will not be returning to his home in Salonika until next summer. When asked if he would choose to live in the United States, George replied in the negative. He is just here for an American Education, and then it's back to Greece to serve in the military.

Sculptors on Campus

by VIRGINIA KURAPKA
Editor-in-Chief

Next fall, as a part of the Bicentennial celebration of the college, five sculptors will be working on outdoor art on campus.

The college was contacted, "out of the blue", said Dean of the College Garry Clarke, by the Maryland Arts Council, which along with Kent County and a federal source is funding the program. The college will have the option to purchase the sculptures when they are completed. Each artist will be working on a separate project. They will also work as a group on one larger piece.

Because of the noise involved in creating the outdoor sculpture, the artists will be working behind the maintenance building, where there is also adequate space. The sculptors will be living and eating on campus. "This is the first big gift of outside money for the Bicentennial," said Bicentennial Committee chairman Dr. Peter Tapke. The Board of Visitors and Govenors also voted last week to allocate $25,000 to the faculty for use for funding Bicentennial projects.

Library, Computer Department Welcome Thornton

by ANYA LIPNICK

Greg Thornton is the new Director of Technical Services for the Miller Library.

He also has a second role on campus. He teaches a Math 101, a computer science course. "Teaching is two-fold," he said, "you teach the kids and learn the subject yourself better than you ever had before."

Thornton received his Bachelors degree at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, and his Masters in Library Science at Syracuse University, New York.

His main job at present is being a librarian, but he enjoys his assistant professorship in computer science.

Prior to coming to Washington College he was a librarian for ten years at Smith College.

So far, Thornton and his wife like living here. His only complaint is that he wishes it wasn't so hot in the summer. Being originally from Central New York, the climate here takes a little getting used to.

Thornton is looking forward to his first year at Washington College as a librarian and his first year of teaching.

Baker Speaks on Blacks in America

by COLLEEN MILLER

The Sophie Kerr Committee of Washington College brought Professor Houston Baker, an authority in the field of Afro-American literature to the campus last Thursday night.

Introduced by Professor Richard DeProspo as "interdisciplinary in the best sense" and one who uses "the most sophisticated tools of contemporary criticism", Professor Baker discussed autobiographical acts in the voice of the Southern Slave.

Author of several books including The Journey Back, Baker outlined the voices in slave literature by confronting literacy problems such as the education of the slave, the term "nigger", proper articulation, and the achievement of an authentic self.

Baker defined autobiographical acts as "acts of self-revelation", and went on to quote author Elizabeth Bruss: "Autobiographical acts are those narrative acts that carry autobiographical force." Bruss composed a speech act theory which insists context is extremely important in communicative acts.

Context, according to Baker, is an important key to communication through literature. There is a difference between correct grammar and, as Baker explained, grammar such as, "Before you drink your gin ricci, empty the garbage, turkey." White literature developed accordingly whereas slave literature remained stifled, due to its oppressed nature.

"Juxtapose the tradition of Anglo-American letters on the tradition of Afro-American letters and you see a definite contrast between the two cultures," said Baker. There were two alternative visions for the slave; either "chattel, personal", or "looking back to Guinea", where a God vision induced slaves to see Africa is the homeland, the mecca of salvation.

"Only by grasping the words could he (the slave) erupt into the speech act", continued Baker. A sparse existence characterized by brutality limited a slave's education as much as white oppression: "The children were then called like so many pigs, and like so many pigs would come eat their mush," said Baker.

An inferior environment could only result in an inferior attitude. According to Baker the term "nigger" was superimposed on the black identity by racial attitudes such as "learning would spoil the best nigger in the world". He explored the problem a slave had in "becoming the master of one's own situation."

Autobiographical works in slave literature came to counterpoint the presumption of the white world that the slave is subhuman. To illustrate Baker read from the autobiography of Frederick Douglass, who likened sailboats to shrouds in his struggle, "You are loosed from your moorings and free...I am confined in bands of iron...Why was I born to be a man whom to make a brute?"

Baker expressed his belief that "only a man free from bondage has the ability to obtain his 'firm sense of being'". Bondage kept the slave from achieving proper articulation and as a result slave literature was not as mature as it could have been. "I had become articulate as a Negro writer," Baker quoted Douglass; "only to discover there was nothing to write about."

The importance of achieving an authentic self in slave literature was the final point Baker made. "Whites continually sought to strip Africans of their cultural modes," he said, citing an example from The Life and Times of Frederick Douglass in which Douglass sees a black woman by a stove with an iron muzzle clamped on her head.

"The voice of a self transformed by the autobiographical act" is the ultimate achievement of the Southern Slave in his autobiographical acts according to Baker. "The slave's realization of language as a key to freedom" concluded the lecture.

Float Contest for Homecoming

by VIRGINIA KURAPKA
Editor-in-chief

There will be a float contest during half-time of the soccer game on the Saturday of Homecoming weekend, October 18.

The contest will take the place of the traditional parade, usually held Saturday morning of Homecoming weekend. "Since we got started late and Homecoming is so early, all the marching bands were booked up," said SGA Vice President Geoff Garinther. Prizes will be given for first, second, and third place. First place is $100, second is $50, and third is $25. No registration is necessary, appearance on the scene by the beginning of the game is the only requirement.

Lose 3-2 in Disputed Double Overtime

Shoremen Drop Five Straight

by HARRY MCENROE
Sports Editor

The Washington College Soccer team continued its losing trend this past week by dropping two crucial conference games. They lost 2-1 at Swarthmore on Saturday and were edged by a visiting Ursinus squad 3-2, in double overtime on Wednesday.

The Shoremen took a 1-0 lead against Swarthmore when junior striker W.J. Fillben scored after rounding up a loose ball in front of the goal. However, the Quakers were awarded a penalty kick late in the half after senior defender John Lonnquest allegedly tripped a Swarthmore forward. After the conversion of this disputed free kick, the score was deadlocked 1-1 at halftime. Midway through the second period the Quakers scored the deciding goal on a shot that hit the post and caromed into the goal, giving them a 2-1 victory.

The Shoremen enjoyed a 1-0 halftime advantage against Ursinus at Kibler on Wednesday after playmaking senior Ken Maher scored unassisted. The Bears managed to score during the second half and thwarted all Shore offensive efforts. As a result, regulation play ended in a 1-1 tie.

There were no goals in the first ten-minute overtime period, as each squad's defense played under pressure exceptionally well. With about five minutes left in the second overtime, however, Ursinus scored, giving them a 2-1 lead. The booters came back moments later when sophomore Mark Mullican drilled a beautiful shot past the Ursinus goaltender, knotting the score for the second time.

Ursinus scored the winning goal with only fifteen seconds remaining in overtime when a Bear forward apparently touched the ball with his hand, setting up his game-winning shot. During the ensuing argument the referees claimed that they didn't see the hand-ball and admitted they made a mistake in missing such a crucial play. This apology gave little solace the to the Shoremen, who absorbed what must be their most disappointing loss of the season.

SHORE NOTES: The Shoremen travel to Reading, Pennsylvania tomorrow to face Albright, then return for a five-game homestand which begins with a game against Washington Bible next Tuesday. The booters' record stands at 3-5, as they have lost five straight contests.

Crew Races at Oneida

by HOLLI MATHISON

"Considering the amount of practice time we had, I think we put in a good performance", coach Eric Stoll said of the Oneida Boat Club's Regatta held last Saturday in Burlington, New Jersey.

The W.C. Crew entered three boats in the regatta. The four-man crew of Jeff Landry on stroke, Court Treuth, Richard Cookerly and Alan Luthy rowed in the First race against Undine and Iona. The crew lost time which they never made up on a false start and an ignored signal from the coxswain. Undine won the 2000-meter race followed by Iona in second, and W.C. last.

The men's eight knew to be prepared for anything at the starting line, Charlie Curtis was the stroke, and Evan Williams, Jack Willis, Todd Harman, Dave Pointon, Eric Lynn, Pat Cosgrove and Bob Coale completed the boat. Under the direction of coxswain Bart Nathan, the W.C. crew came in a strong second to Crescent, Colgate finished last.

The women's eight did not get to race until five hours after their arrival in New Jersey. Still, they managed to rally plenty of enthusiasm for their thousand meter sprint. With Molly Meehan as coxswain, the eight girls—Valerie Marsh (on stroke), Ellen Beardsley, Ruth Chisnell, Claire Paduda, Didi Schwarz, Eileen Trently, Becca Fincher, and Kathy Kraus managed to win a decisive victory over both Back Bay and Colgate. "It was great," said oarswoman Kraus, "we could hear the rest of the W.C. crew cheering for us as soon as we started." Each of the eight was awarded a plaque.

CREW NOTE: The Homecoming race between alumni and students will be held on Saturday, October 18th, at 2:00 PM. Eric Stoll promises that the alumni boat will be "awesome".

Third Annual Faculty Challenge

by JEFF CHAFFIN

Once again, the faculty runners invite WC students and alumni to join them in a five-mile run through Chestertown, the campus and the cross-country course. Although it will be conducted as a race, the purpose of the challenge is to promote campus awareness of the joys and benefits of physical fitness through running. Individuals may run the complete five-mile course at their own pace, or they may join together in teams of five persons to run one mile each. All of those students and alumni who wish to participate are welcomed, regardless of their ability.

The race is Saturday, October 18, at 10 a.m., beginning at the Old Town Dock at High and Water streets. Be there by 9:45 a.m.

There are two categories: the individual five mile run; faculty, students, alumni; and the team 5x1 relay; by any organized grouping, i.e. fraternity, sorority, club, friends, etc. Relay team captains must meet with Jeff Chaffin by Friday, October 17.

Prizes similar to last year's; T-shirts, tickets for drinks and admission to Homecoming events, will be given. Refreshments will be provided for all participants. For more information, map of the course, and/or registration forms, please see Jeff Chaffin in the library.

People are needed to see that the run goes smoothly. Please volunteer to help if you don't want to run.

Faculty Decisions on Graduation with Honors

by WILLIAM MORTIMER
Assistant Editor

The faculty last week voted on two proposals which will have an effect on the system whereby students graduate with honors.

The faculty passed the proposal from the Academic Council calling for an end to the old rule whereby a senior could not graduate with honors if he had one or more D's, even if those grades did not affect the student's average. "One reason that it was deleted is that in a sense, it creates a situation of double jeopardy", said Dean of the College Garry Clarke. Clarke added that, "the D already brings the grade down, so why should a student be further penalized? Why penalize twice by saying that the student cannot get honors?" If a student gets only one or two D's and A's in every other course, he or she will now be able to receive honors. Clarke noted, that, while these cases are rare "they do happen".

The other proposal, which was defeated, was that a student should be able to receive honors at graduation even if he did not receive honors on the senior requirement. The vote by the Academic Council was a tie. Clarke said, "I voted for it because it was so close. I felt it should go to the faculty", for consideration.

The final decision, Clarke said, comes from the feeling that "if a student is to get honors there should be high quality of work." Now, as in the past, to get Departmental Honors a senior must achieve Dean's List work in their major field and honors on the senior requirement.

The first SAB meeting was held last Monday night at the same time as the faculty meeting. Because of this, the SAB, which works with the faculty through the Academic Council on such proposals as those that were made and voted on, did not have a chance to speak of the proposals before they went to the faculty. Geoff Garinther, President of the SAB, said, however, that "our feelings were similar to the faculty's, we agreed that the first needed to be changed and that the second needs exploration, perhaps."

Broadsides Denied Funds

by WILLIAM MORTIMER
Assistant Editor

The Student Government Association, meeting last Monday evening, denied funding to the Writer's Union for the publication of Broadsides.

After long discussion, the SGA decided to reject the Writer's Union request for $500, needed to publish 20 issues of Broadsides during the school year. Broadsides, a bi-weekly publication, features student writing and art work in a single sheet form. The cost for each publication is twenty-five dollars for one hundred copies.

"It was the unanimous opinion of the Senate that the Writer's Union is valid" said SGA Vice-President Geoff Garinther. He noted that the discussion on Broadsides was the longest during the two hour and ten minute meeting. He said also that the final decision was "very close."

Garinther said that "the $500 which the Writer's Union asked for is about 20 per cent more than what we gave to most other clubs." Almost every club applied to the SGA as their sole source of funding.

The final decision of the Senate was based on the fact that the SGA is not the only source to which the Writer's Union could, or has, applied. It was the feeling of the SGA that "more than any other club, it is possible for Broadsides to get money from another source" said Garinther.

The Writer's Union has already applied to and been rejected for funding by the Sophie Kerr Committee. The Sophie Kerr Fund, the interest on an endowment made by Sophie Kerr Underwood at the time of her death in 1965, is divided in half each year. Fifty per cent is given at graduation, to the senior whose writing, the Committee feels, shows the most potential. The other half goes towards bringing various literary persons on campus during the course of the school ar. This past year, Claire Mowbray was awarded approximately $23,000 and the Committee was able to bring such figures as playwrite Robert Anderson to lecture. Sophie Kerr Underwood bequeathed nearly $500,000 to the college.

"We felt that just because Sophie Kerr turned the Writer's Union down didn't mean that we had to finance them" said Garinther, adding that the feeling was that "Sophie Kerr is more responsible for the Writer's Union." The SGA also felt that the Sophie Kerr Committee has a large budget. This year, due to the low enrollment, the SGA budget is very tight. In general, the feeling of the Senate was that "the Sophie Kerr Fund has more money to spare than the SGA does" said Garinther. All requests for fundings were cut down, Garinther noted, "but Broadsides took the biggest cut in percentage."

Although the SGA has denied funding for Broadsides "we don't want the Writer's Union to be left out in the cold" Garinther said. "If things don't work out with the Sophie Kerr Committee, the Writer's Union is welcome to come back and re-apply for funding in January.

No Band, No Parade

Homecoming Highlighted by Dance

by WENDY MURPHY
News Editor

"The biggest change about Homecoming this year is that no parade will be held," said Jay Young, SGA President'

According to Young, the local high school band could not play because they are entered in a battle of the bands this weekend and the SGA was not able to get the Army band which usually plays in the parade.Said Young, "We did not get a lot of response and without any music we felt it would just make the whole concept of a parade useless."

He added, "The big part of Homecoming is the floats so we will still have them. The problem was when and where to have the judging." There will be a float contest held during the half-time at the soccer game.

There are a number of events planned for the weekend, Greg Martin, who plays the acoustical music of such artists as Steely Dan and the Beatles, will play in the Coffee House tonight from 10:00 to 1:00. The admission is one dollar per person. Saturday evening's homecoming dance will feature "Back East;" which plays top forty music and recently played at the Naval Academy.

The Last Word On Enrollment

by GINGER KURAPKA
Editor-in Chief

Due to some ambiguity and typos, the enrollment of freshmen this year may have been confusing. One last final word and the subject shall be laid to rest, at least until next semester.

There are 198 people classified by the Registrar as freshmen this year, as opposed to last year's figure of 220.The enrollment of full-time students this year is 664. The percent of withdrawals for whatever reason from the three lower classes last year, 1978-1979, was 22.5 percent. For the year 1979-1980, it was 25.4 percent.

editorial

It looks like the Writers' Union is getting it from all sides now—their home is being taken away from them, and now funding for one of their publications, the Broadside Series, has been denied.

Although the English Department, including its Creative Writing element, runs one of the strongest programs at Washington College, which is particularly attractive to potential students, it is seldom given the recognition it deserves, by either the students or administration. The writers are not one of the larger or more visible groups on campus, not only because they are somewhat isolated physically but because the creative process is largely private, seldom leading to rowdiness or the other forms of attentiongetting so well known around here.

The fact is that SGA money is scarce. This may be no one's fault, being a result of the drop in enrollment, but it means everyone suffers. Programs like the Broadside, which have received SGA money in the past, will have to be cut back. But some portion of the Broadside request should have been granted, pending reapplication to the Sophie Kerr Committee for additional funds. It would be a shame if this forum for student poetry and artwork were to disappear.

Meanwhile the Sophie Kerr Committee should assume the support that the SGA has had to discontinue. The Broadside is a literary endeavor, and it would seem that Sophie herself could not have objected to the use of such a small portion of her monies for so worthy a project. Also, it seems evident in at least some cases that the Broadsides reach more people than do some of the lectures sponsored under the Sophie Kerr Lecture Series.

Letters to the Editor

Blood Drive Successful

On behalf of the Washington College Republicans, the American Red Cross, the Kent County Red Cross Chapter and the Kent County High School Nursing Students, I would like to congratulate the student body and the citizens of Chestertown for a successful Blood Drive. Sixty-seven pints were credited to WC in this last drive, the second highest since the beginning of the blood program. The winners of the half keg were Caroline and Martin with twelve each. Again I want to thank the student body for a job well done.

Sincerely, Glen Beebe

Mailroom Okay

I feel that the mailroom and the mail service have been unjustly criticized! I am very pleased with the existing arrangement. I receive my mail promptly and feel reassured by having the mailroom locked for the most part on Saturday and on Sunday. Ample time is provided for students to pick up their mail Monday through Friday as well as on Saturday. I believe it is good to have the mailroom locked at the times which have already been designated. It obviously discourages vandalism, a factor students who are so quick to criticize seem to forget.

In response to Cathy McGuire's comments that "the students should have a choice" about what he or she does with the weekend, I feel that it is a ridiculous assertion in reference to receiving mail. If a student is unable to physically reach the limits of the mailroom by noon on Saturday, he or she does not have the interest in obtaining the mail. Furthermore, McGuire referred to having the mailroom "open during feasible hours on Sunday in order that returning students may have the option to pick their mail up." I also believe that this is unrealistic and unnecessary. Students choose to go away for the weekend. They are not forced to leave campus and certainly therefore, should be required to wait until the mailroom reopens at 8:30 on Monday morning to obtain their mail.

Students should appreciate the promptitude and attention which the mailroom and central services department give them.

Sincerely Yours, Ginny Kammer

Moratorium Affects Faculty

by VIRGINIA KURAPKA
Editor-in Chief

Vice President for Finance Gene Hessey announced at the October 6 faculty meeting that due to the lower-than-estimated enrollment the operating budget is over-estimated. He announced two measures which directly affect faculty, and thus students.

A moratorium has been put on all equipment purchases as of September 30. Said one faculty member, "On paper it affects us greatly. In fact it doesn't because we have outstanding orders," from before the cut-off point.

Twenty percent of the approved budget, exclusive of any faculty, staff or student salary, is to be encumbered. That money is to be held in reserve until the second semester enrollment is known. "If our estimate of the average enrollment for the year has been extreme, we may be able to release these funds," said Hessey.

A review committee has been set up to handle appeals from those departments, "where cuts will affect the quality of the program," said Hessey. One professor said, "In principle I don't approve of the action in that it places the weight of making up the deficit on a rather small area of the college," since not all departments have portions of the budgets set aside for equipment purchases.

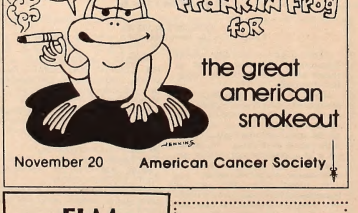
Beginning and End of Universe at Next WJ Forum

by NEWS BUREAU

"The Beginning and the End of the Universe" will be the topic at the next meeting of the William James Forum on Tuesday, October 21. Professor Bruce Partridge, chairman of the Astronomy Department at Haverford College, will give the talk, to be illustrated with slides, at 8 p.m. in Hynson Lounge.

How did the universe begin? What is its structure? Will it last forever? These profound questions, frequently left in the past to philosophers and theologians, are now the province of astronomers with vastly improved scientific techniques such as radio telescopes. Dr. Partridge will not hesitate to explore these deeper realms.

Until recent times the focus of astronomical attention was the Milky Way, the galaxy in which the Earth's solar system is located. Only its stars are visible to the naked eye. With sophisticated new ways of exploring interstellar space, astronomers are now exploring the vast spaces beyond the galaxy. The evidence now suggests that there are millions of galaxies in the universe, each with billions of individual stars.



Professor Partridge's current research, funded by grants from the National Science Foundation and NATO, is carried on in such diverse places as Tromso, in northern Norway, and Kitt Peak Observatory in Arizona. Partridge is looking for traces of "missing matter" between galaxies which would provide animportant clue to the fate of the universe. Partridge believes that in about five billion years, the sun, having used up the hydrogen near its core, will swell, engulfing the nearer planets including the Earth, and then collapse into a shrunken sphere.

Dr. Partridge is a grduate of Princeton University and was a Rhodes Scholar at Oxford. He stayed on at Oxford to complete his doctor's degree. After teaching physics at Princeton for five years, he moved to the Haverford Astronomy Department in 1970. Partridge recalls that he built his first telescope at the age of 14, using Army surplus parts.

Young Lived, Studied, Worked in Europe

by JEAN FEGELY

Holli Young had the unique opportunity to live, study and work in Europe which has proven to be an overall enriching experience for her.

After becoming immersed in the European culture it is easily understandable how she developed a love for Europe. "Some people wish they could spend a year, I wished I could stay two years."

And she almost did. Holli spent a total of 16 months in different parts of Europe after having decided that she wanted to become fluent in French, her major at Washington College. With French as her choice Holli applied for a scholarship and was accepted at the Sorbonne in Paris.

Holli spent time visiting friends an in England during the summer before entering school in October. This gave her time to relax and get a feel for theEuropean way of life.

The family chauffeur met Holli at the airport in Paris. Fortunately she was able to speak some French, having spent several summers with relatives in Belgium, for she was very surprised to be picked up by a chauffeur. Her French family lived in Sceaux the suburbs of Paris.

Adjusting to her new family ans school was not difficult for Holli and she immediately became involved in French life. "I was more aware of theworld and has a better conception of international affairs while in France."

Living in a big city, Holli was exposed to many new and exciting things. Education in France had great impact on her. "Education has such a rigid structure in France, people are better educated and muststudy hard to pass their Baccalareat, a comprehensive exam before entering college." Holli attributed the concentration on language, geographical and international studies to France's geographical position and influx of foreigners into France. On the whole Holli felt the environment was especially conducive to learning "I became interested in history, geography and international affaire." Radio and television in France are especially educational and Holli absorbed the culture as well as the language during her stay.

Holli was extremely impressed with the French cuisine. "Eating was always a special affair and food was prepared with such care." Never before had she been interested in cooking but France gave her an appreciation of food.

The antiquity of Europe amazed Holli as she visited historical places such as Brittany and Normandy. "In America we think an 18th century house is old where in Europe this would be considered new." Holli travelled as often as possible making use of weekends and holidays. Transportation in Europe is outstanding. The high speed trains ans subways are punctual, efficient and clean. Holli was able to visit Shannon Crosby who was staying in Spain at the same time. Holli also enjoyed meeting her friends at sidewalk cafes and going to night clubs in Paris.

After school ended for the year, Holli taught tennis at clubs in Antwerp and Brussels, while she lived with her Belgian friends. From there she visited Israel and gave lessons there also.

Although Holli was anxious to come home to the States, she had mixed emotions about leaving. Now she becomes homesick for France as she listens to her French records or receives letters from her friends in Europe. A senior, Holli hopes to find a job using her French and eventually return to France.

Browning Lectures on Hunger

by HOLLI MATHISON

"How can we possibly grasp the notion of a billion people suffering from starvation" We really can't," said Mr. Preston Browning, who was the guest speaker of the Lecture Series on Wednesday night.

Mr. Browning, who is a member of the English department at the University of Illinois, only recently became interested in the impact of world hunger. He has joined the World Hunger Education Service, and plans to travel to other colleges to help inform the students of the gravity of this problem.

"The hungry are hungry because they are poor. The poor are poor because they are powerless." Browning explained that in many Third World nations, the economy is run by a few elite groups. They do not care about the starving masses. Browning called for a redistribution of land and a fair system of sharing wealth. If the standard of living goes up, the population will decrease as people will be more secure in their economy.

"The poor, depressed, hungry people will not accept poverty as their destiny." Browning recommended that the U.S. encourage and even pressure Third World nations into making "radical reforms" which would help the masses. Browning concluded by saying that people must be made aware and induced to action concerning world hunger. "It will not be easy, things won't change overnight. But this change is a prerequisite to human survival in the twenty-first century."

The lecture, entitled "A Billion Starving People- Does It Matter?" was attended by twenty people.

—Gene Shalit, NBC-TV

Directed by Mark Rydell and starring Bette Midler, Alan Bates, Frederic Forrest, and Harry Dean Stanton. In this tale based loosely on the life of Janis Joplin, Bette plays "The Rose," a hardsinging rock star who can't reconcile public adulation with her own deeply rooted loneliness. "Midler has style and dramatic power to burn. Watching her burn them at both ends is impressive, for she whips through a series of showstopping scenes— musical and non-musical—that spell out Oscar nomination in neon,"— Playboy

Phi Sigma Tau Elects Officers

by GINNY KAMMER

The honor society in philosophy, Phi Sigma Tau, held its first meeting of the 1980-81 year last week. It was an organizational meeting and officers were elected. Dave Bate was elected President, Charles Warfield was elected Vice-President, Ellen Beardsley was elected Secretary and John D'Amanda was elected Treasurer. Social Chairperson is Carolyn Sellers and Membership Director is Diane Howard. The faculty advisor is Dr. J. David Newell, associate professor of philosophy.

The essential purpose of Phi Sigma Tau, which was founded at Muhlenberg College in 1930 is to promote ties between Philosophy departments in accredited institutions and students interested in philosophy nationally. The Washington College chapter of Phi Sigma Tau is the Maryland Delta Chapter which was granted a charter in March 1979.

Phi Sigma Tau places an emphasis on academic achievement. According to Newell, "If you are a declared philosophy major or minor you already hold an associate membership in the local Washington College Chapter of Phi Sigma Tau. Full membership in th National Honor Society in Philosophy is a matter of academic achievement." Membership is open to anyone who has completed three semester courses in philosophy beyond an introductory course. In order to be a full member a student must have a 3.6 average in the courses taken in philosophy.

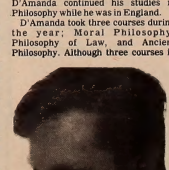
Newell seemed pleased with this year's beginning. He added, "I think we're going to have a really good year."

Vice President Charles Warfield was also enthusiastic and hoped to "have a meeting for all people interested in philosophy in general." He stressed that Phi Sigma Tau was not limited to the philosophy majors only.

Dialogue the national journal of Phi Sigma Tau issued three times a year, is written entirely by undergraduate and graduate students.

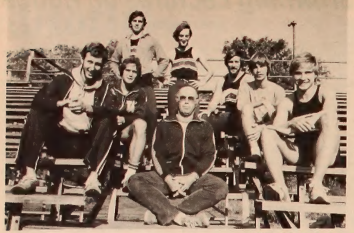
D'Amanda Studied Philosophy at Oxford

by CHRISTY HOLT



Senior John D'Amanda returned this semester after spending the 1979-80 academic year attending Manchester College Oxford in Oxford, England. D'Amanda continued his studies in Philosophy while he was in England.

D'Amanda took three courses during the year; Moral Philosophy, Philosophy of Law, and Ancient Philosophy. Although three courses in one year, one per trimester, may seem like a light load to American students, it is a full schedule at Oxford.



Courses at Oxford are run on a tutorial system. Each week the student is responsible for covering a certain amount of material and giving an oral report on it to his tutor. There are lectures during the week, but courses aren't based on teacherstudent lectures as courses in the U.S. are. D'Amanda said the college atmosphere in England is much different from that of Washington College. It is "more like research" in England.

D'Amanda didn't spend all of his time in England preparing for tutorials. He also learned to play rugby, visited a few pubs, and did a lot of sightseeing. During one of his trimester breaks he traveled throughout France, Germany, and the Netherlands.

D'Amanda was "impressed with the sense of history that the people live with there," and how that sense "very much affects their political and social viewpoints." He also enjoyed looking at the U.S. from the "outside". When asked how he liked his stay in England, D'Amanda summed up his experience with one word—"great."

Cross Country team keeps on truckin'

Runners keep up Track Record

by ED NORDBERG

The Washington College Cross Country team, under the leadership of senior Ken Merz, perpetuated its reputable .500 season with a win and a loss this past week. The harriers easily triumphed over visiting Delaware State and then suffered a disappointing defeat to Loyola College. With six meets remaining in the season, their record is 4-4, an incredible achievement considering last year's 2-8 mark.

Mystery man Merz continues to be the principle reason for the harriers' success. As Coach Don Chatellier puts it, "Kenny makes the team competitive." His consistent first-place finishes, seven wins in the past eight meets, always put the harriers in contention for a victory.

The others on the team are also improving, according to coach Chatellier. Last year's ace, Peter Cameron, who was hampered by leg troubles earlier this fall, has come on strong as he placed second for the harriers against Delaware State. Peter Keyser, a top-notch runner who does not even work out with the team, and regulars Jeff Lucas and Kevin Kroenke have also fared well.

The harriers are now beginning the toughest part of their schedule. They must travel to Madison, New Jersey this Saturday to run against Widener and Drew. It will be interesting to see how well the runners perform against these and other formidable MAC schools. Last season, they lost every conference meet. Regardless of the results of their next six races, the team will compete in the MAC championships on November 8. Merz will also run in the NCAA Division III Regional Championships on November 15.

Volleyball Tournament Success for W.C.

by JEFF ALDERSON

The volleyball team performed very successfully this weekend at the invitational round-robin tournament. "This weekend they finally put it together," stated coach Penny Fall. "During the early part of (last) week they were playing badly. We talked about it Thursday and decided to play to win."

The Washington College squad was seeded third behind Juniata picked first and Dickonson second. Hood and Shepherd were rated fourth and fifth respectively. W.C. won the first match 15-13, 15-13 in two very competitive games against Dickinson. Fall commented that during the games with Dickinson, "The team came as close to its potential at this point as all year."

Friday night the six took on Hood and won 15-13, 15-9 in two closely fought games. Fall felt that the playing caliber was not as high as it was against Dickinson, but this was probably because the pressure wasn't on against the lower-seeded Hood.

The squad finished Friday with a record of 2-0 with two wins to be proud of.

At 11:30 A.M. Saturday, W.C. played Shepherd. "We started off sleepy and when we woke up, Shepherd was ahead 13-6," said Fall. The girls came back and won 16-14 and took the second game 15-9. This assured the team of at least second place with a record of 3-0.

Finally, at 1:00, the volleyball players played number one-seeded Juniata for the championship. Although the scores were disappointing, 1-15 and 5-15, they did not indicate how well the girls played. "They are better than most teams we'll be up against all year." Fall said, "we really gave them a battle. I was very pleased with their performance."

During the tournament many individuals played extremely well. Among these outstanding players were the tri-captains Julie Wheeler, Cheryl Loss, and Ann Most.

"Julie Wheeler, senior setter, had her most consistant series of matches. She really put the ball where we could do something with it," Fall commented, "Ann Most played all positions extremely well, particularly when serving. Cheryl Loss continued her high level of play especially around the net in terms of hitting and defense."

Other players whose performances were outstanding include Laura Chase, Karen Parkinson, Maureen Murray, and Anne Plumar. Chase proved to be the surprise of the weekend with her hitting. According to Fall, "she scored some crucial points against Dickinson." Perkinson and Murray, both freshmen, are beginning to fulfill their potential. "They are melting in nicely with the upperclassmen," Fall commented. Anne Plumer was used as a spot server against Dickinson and Shepherd and also made some crucial points.

Fall said, "The high point of the tournament was the determination not to give up, even when we were down, and we were down a few times. One thing that I like to see is that kind of attitude."

The volleyball team will play home both Tuesday and Friday nights. "We can't rest on our laurels," Fall remarked, "We must keep working. I'm hoping that the girls will continue with their excellent attitude."

Fall feels that one of the main factors in winning the tournament was the support of a lot of students, faculty members, and townspeople at the games. W.C. may have a championship contender team this year. This impressive group has a quad match Friday night, October 17, at 6:00.

Traffic survey to be taken on 213

by Virginia Kurapka
Editor-inChief

A traffic survey will be conducted on Route 213 at the fire lane to determine whether a traffic light will be installed.

In the aftermath of an accident last year involving a student hit by a car while crossing 213 at the fire lane, the State Highway Administration will take the survey.

Andrea Colatti, a freshman last year, was hit by a car during exam week at the end of the first semester. "That accident was first involving injury in the ten years I've been here," said Vice President for finance Gene Hessey. After the accident, the town council and the college administration agreed to work together to try to prevent any further accidents.

In order for the town council to contact the State Highway Administration to request action, a proposal from the college for a flashing yellow light at the beginning of the campus was drawn up by Dean of Students Maureen Kelly. "The administration seemed to be divided on whetherit really wanted to do this, so it (the request) was withdrawn," said Dr. Michael Bailey, chairman of the Economics Department anda member of the town council. He added, "The town is willing to pass along any requests to the State Highway Administration."

The SHA requires, among other criteria, that five accidents have taken place at the location, or that to be an intersection with a heavy traffic flow, if the state is to cover the cost of a light and its installation. At the present time a traffic light is the only alternative being considered. Said Hessey, "The cost of either an underground or a raised walkway is prohibitive. Either a manually controlled traffic light or a timed one seems to be the only way."

When the traffic survey has been completed, the SHA will make its decision. "I'm not too optimistic that the state will find that the location warrants a traffic light," said Hessey. "But it doesn't hurt to try."

Faculty Cooperating with Moratorium

By Virginia Kurapka
Editor-in-Chief

"The departments have been most cooperative," in complying with the moratorium on equipment purchases and the twenty percent cut in budgets, said Vice-President for finance Gene Hessey.

A faculty-administration committee has expanded its duties to include review of requests by departments for exceptions to the moratorium. So far, few areas have asked for special treatment. "The exceptions the committee is seeking are reasonable," said Hessey. Dr. Nate Smith, chairman of the History Department and committee member said, "The feeling was that many departments haven't a need for exemption later in the year.

"It's just a way to start," said Smith. "The flat twenty percent is rather unrealistic," because some budgets are already spent, some which may be able to absorb a cut are already small. Still others may be able to get by with nothing.

The major revision will take place after the second semester semester begins when the enrollment and budget will be adjusted. Depending on attrition and transfers, the funds may be released. Concluded Smith, "Realistically, you can't say that twenty percent will be saved, but at least some will be."

Broadside reapplys to SGA, gets funding

By William Mortimer
Assistant Editor

The Writer's Union was granted $200 for Broadside funding at the Student Government Association meeting held on Monday night, October 26.

Represented by Writer's Union members Lee Ann Chearneyi and Tamara Dubin, the Union asked for funds after its $500 request was denied at the October 13th meeting. Chearneyi and Dubin attended the meeting to clear up a misunderstanding and to reapply for SGA funding. Contrary to what was believed, the Sophie Kerr Committee has not denied funding for the publication of Broadside. "The Sophie Kerr Committee has certainly not turned its back on the Writers Union," said English Department Chairman Nancy Tatum, who also heads the Sophie Kerr Committee. She added that, infact, funding for the Writers Union was "raised from $2500 to approximately $3U00 last year."

Chearneyi, who is Editor-in-Chief of the Washinton CollegeReview said that "the Sophie Kerr Committee is definitely going to fund us (the Writer's Union) but they wanted us to get support from the SGA." This was done because the Sophie Kerr Committee wanted "us to get money from the students, and the Committee doesn't want the English department funding to cater to English students alone." Chearneyi said. She added that it was important to get student funding "because the Writer's Union is for and by the students."

The problem, it seems, arose from defining the use of the $500 which the Writers Union originally requested. "In the past, the SGA has wanted to know what the money was used for and we would answer thatit was put in the general fund" said Robert Day, professor of Creative Writing and faculty advisor to the Writer's Union. "This time, to accomodate their inquires we thought thau t it a good idea to use Broadside since it costs about $500 a year to publish," Day added. Typically, in the past, the Writer's Union budgethas been approximately $3000. The Student Government Association would supply the remaining $500. According to Chearnyi, the Writer's Union thought it important to designate "Broadside because the SGA has previously, in the past, wanted to know what the Sophie Kerr Committee gives us for general use."

Despite the $500 increase in the Sophie Kerr contribution, the Writer's Union is still in need of additional SGA funding. Aside from wanting to involve students with the Review and Broadside, the cost of printing continues to rise. "We are changing the format of the WCR, but we don't want to sacrifice Broadside for the Review," said Chearneyi. Day noted that "last year under Nick Nappo we decreased our costs and thisyear under LeeAnn Chearneyi, we might so the same," but nothing definate can be said until "we get our estimates."

The two literary publications are not the only things for which the Writer's Union needs funding. "The Broadside is just one of the things the Writer's Union does" said Day. An Autumn Reading, honoring Miriam Hofecker, retiring librarian, is one such additional event which requires Writer's Union funding. "We don't say what it is to be used for" said Dr. Tatum of the Sophie Kerr Funding "we handle their request. A certain amount is set aside in the budget every year." She added that the Writer's Union "expenditures have been visible enough."

With the additional $200 funding from the SGA some, but not all problems will be solved for the Writer's Union. As Day said "My guess is that we have Anyone who's ever has to cross Maryland Route 213 at the fire lane knows that you take your life in your hands when you step off the curb. Drivers tend to increase their speed in the long straight-away between the light at the A&P and the light at the shopping center. Why has nothing been done to protect the many students who must cross the road there?

Red tape. The amount of it generated at a college of this size is amazing; add to that piles from state and local government and you get a mountain.

If for some reason a traffic light can't be put in the middle of Washington Avenue, why can't one be put either at the intersection of Campus and Washington Avenues, or at the intersection of College and Washington Avenues? Not only would a light at either place slow down traffic past the fire lane, it would help drivers at these intersections turn onto Washington Avenue, which currently handles between 8,000 and 12,000 cars daily.

It's Maryland law, statute number 21502 A2 to be exact, that a driver must stop or at least slow down at a designated cross walk if a pedestrian is in it. There are three cross walks on Washington Avenue. Not every driver stops for students, however, and unless something more is done another student is going to get hurt or worse.

International Association

Dean Maxcy is interested in discovering if there is any interest in forming some kind of international association at Washington College which would bring together members of the college and community with international experiences or interests for social and cultural events. Such an association might work with and support the efforts of the Modern Language Department, but its membership would be open to students, members of the faculty and administration, as well as members of the Chestertown community who are not necessarily students of the modern languages offered at Washington College.

Anyone interested in the formation of such an association is encouraged to put his or her name on a "mailing list" in the Student Affairs Office. Those people whose names are on the list will be informed by mail of the first and subsequent meetings.

Freshman's Father Researches Cancer

By Anya Lipnick

For the past twelve years, at the John Hopkins Hospital, Dr. Stanley E. Order, a radiation therapist, has made breakthroughs in cancer research.

Order is the father of Washington College freshman Jeff Order.

The breakthrough involves placing a patient in isolation for eight to twelve days in a radioactive container. The patient has a better chance of recovery with no loss of hair or sickness.

Besides the radiation treatment Order and his staff research various types of cancer. They are also able to isolate tumors and inject them without having the injections spread to the surrounding areas.

The cancer research department is the fifth largest in the country. Its national cure rate is sixty-eight percent.

Everything Order is doing is heading in a positive direction toward curing cancer. "It's fantastic, the things thing they are developing" said his son Jeff.

Order and his associates should be commended for their determination in researching this disease. There are probably many lives that are thankful for having Johns Hopkins, and many more to come who will be.

Dance Company Performs

By ATHLETIC DEPARTMENT

The Washington College Dance Company was invited to perform at the State Convention of the Maryland Association for Health, Physical Education, Recreation, and Dance held at the Carousel Hotel in Ocean City October 16-18.

Six members of the company were involved inan evening informal concert along with the Salisbury State College Dance Company. Four dances were presented: "Mercurial," "Galactic Funk", "Allthat Jazz," and "One" from "A Chorus Line". The dancers involved were Susan Ericsson, Lucille Hughes, Hillary Simmers, Cindi Siefert, Steven Mumford, and Karen Lynn Smith.

The audience, made up of dancers, physical education, and non-convention hotel guests, was complimentary of the skills and choreography displayed by both companies. The evening of dance was a fine example of the possibilities for cooperation between diverse companies from "rival" colleges.

Christian Fellowship on Campus

By Jeff Alderson

Most evenings at approximately 9:00, the Campus Christian Fellowship (C.C.F.) meets in the Alumni house. These meetings consist of Biblical discussions, Bible studies, singing, open prayer, and sharing each others ideas and problems. Around twenty-five people attend these meeting during the week.

Each night is set aside for a special purpose. Monday nights the group studies special topics such as peer pressure, homosexuality, loneliness, happiness, and so on. On Tuesday nights a study of Paul's letters to the Corinthians is scheduled. Wednesdays the group practices singeng. Thursday nights an Agape (Greek for love) study is held, covering passages form various sections of the Bible. Saturdays are social nights with different activities planned each week.

On Fridays and Sundays, C.C.F. meets at 7:30. Friday nights the meeting is held downtown for a night of Christian fellowship. Sundays, the meeting is in the Alumni House and consists of a study of Genesis, led by a woman from California who is currently living in Chestertown.

This group was formed during the 1977-78 academic year with the help of Larry Morell, (at that time a computer science professor). Between seven to ten people met every Monday night to learn and discuss certain aspects of the Bible.

In the fall of 1978, Paster Ridley of Christ Methodist Church in town began holding meetings. This group eventually merged with the campus group to form C.C.F. They began meeting every night and in the mornings from 7:30-8:00 for prayer.

The group acquired a room for their meeting in the basement of Minta Martin during the Spring term of 1979. C.C.F. holds their meetings here during the 1979-80 academic year. When housing became tight on campus, this year, the group moved to its present location in the Alumni House.

Many activities have been planned by C.C.F. Last year they had a year end picnic at Turner's Creek. This year they are helping Calvary Chapel of Chestertown to bring Christian Rock Musicians to town.

The S.G.A. has granted funds to C.C.F. for the second year in a row. This money is used for study and song books, retreats, and social events.

The group is nondenominational and open to the entire campus. 1980 Graduate Tammy Wolf feels that the most important aspect of C.C.F. is, "the love that I felt from everyone. It became a really neat bond. That love was from God."

PRIME 550—Has It Solved Computing Needs?

By WENDY MURPHY
News Editor

The Computing Center, a place well known to computer science students, but perhaps not so well to others, has received its share of turmoil in the last year. Here is a history and brief follow-up on the computer.

William Schmoldt, a former Computing Center Director for the college, called the school's IBM 1130 "an outdated piece of equipment" so far as this school's computer needs were concerned. His main objective was to keep the Computing Center as a resource for all academic areas.

The computer had been "virtually trouble-free" according to Schmoldt, but IBM had discontinued the manufacturing of computer cards and print-out sheets, the computer was over ten years old, and it had been determined that a Radio Shack computer, costing little over $700, had a larger memory bank.

Considering the benefits for his own students, Schmoldt said that FORTRAN, the computer language used by the IBM 1130, is "limited and no longer considered a good first language for students to learn." A newer computer would use a different language such as PASCAC which he said "is more like programming in the way that you think. I don't think we can have a strong computing program without a better computer. The demand for courses in computing is greater than the 1130 can handle." The enrollment in the introductory courses had to be limited because the computer couldn't handle the large student demand for it last year.

An article in the October 5, 1979 issue of The Elm reported:

Schmoldt says that he has been working on an indepth study of the available replacements for the IBM 1130, and that the College may be able to purchase a computer with a memory over 15 times that of the current machine for something in the neighborhood of what the IBM originally cost. Schmoldt summarizes his case for a more modern computer simply. "Our need is immediate," he says. "We are trying to accomodate larger enrollments in computing and the needs of other departments for an easily-accessible computing devices."

Schmoldt estimated, at one point, that about 90 percent of the computer's users were in computer science courses, but that that figure would probably drop to 60 percent. because he believed that a new computer would be a "more accessible tool to everyone." He said that at least six people would be able to use the computer simultaneously and it would take less time to remove errors from a program.

On Wednesday, November 21, 1979, William Schmoldt handed in his resignation. He did not wish to say why he was leaving, but he did say that he had not accepted another teaching job. He would not leave until the Fall 1979 semester was finished. The administration was far from pleased at the timing of his resignation, but had to accept it and began to plan who would teach his courses. Despite Schmoldt's unscheduled departure, the search for Washington College's new computer continued.

In December, the Hodson Trust gave the College $125,000 for the purchase of a new computer, Schmoldt proposed the purchase of a PDP-11 saying that it would allow the user to work with more computer languages. He also said that he would like to see both BASIC and PASCAL taught with the new computer. The only language taught at the College was FORTRAN.

January brought the beginning of a new semester and continued confusion due to Schmoldt's resignation. It was decided that all of his classes would be taught by either Dr.Richard Brown, Chairman of the Department of Mathematics and Computer Science, or Assitant Professor of Physics Louis Cadwell. Brown predicted that the faculty of both departments would become more involved with the computer and that Schmoldt's replacement would not necessarily deal with only computing courses. He added that the new computer would arrive during the week after commencement.

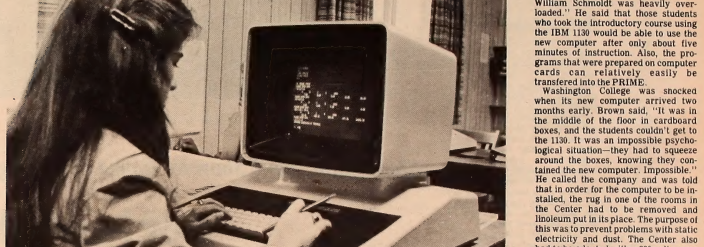
Even more confusion arose when a statement was made saying that the new computer had been chosen and was to be a PDP-11. When that statement was printed, the choice was not definite. Within the following two weeks, representives from PRIME, Incorporated, DIGITAL EQUIPMENT CORPORATION, and PERKIN-ELMER were present at WC to describe their proposals and respond to any questions concerning their computers.

A contract was signed with PRIME Computing Corporation, Incorporated, of McLean, Virginia for their computer, the PRIME 550. The agreement was made for the purchase of the main computer, a card reader, a line printer with graphic capability, and a magnetic tape unit on Friday, February 15, 1980.

Brown said that the PRIME 550 has a larger memory than the IBM 1130, and it is easier to use. An operator can seat himself in front of one of the six video-screen terminals and type in a program, run it, correct it, and run it again without leaving his seat. Up to six operators can type and run programs simultaneously with the PRIME. On the IBM, only three operators could use the card punchers simultaneously and only one could run his program at a time.

The new computer has a large capacity for expansion. It has facilities for up to 63 videoscreen terminals which the College may obtain for under one thousand dollars a piece. The terminals could be placed anywhere on campus as they do not have to be near the main computer. If the system should break down, a servicemen can run tests on it by remote control, and figure out the problem before making a service call.

Concurrently, the College was soliciting soliciting applications for a computer sceince professor. Brown said that the Computing Center would not be run by only one person and predicted that "four or more people on campus will be teaching computer Science—at least three members of the Math Department, and perhaps one outsider." He added, "I think we have made a mistake in the past in giving one person the work of two people. William Schmoldt was heavily overloaded." He said that those students who took the introductory course using the IBM 1130 would be able to use the new computer after only about five minutes of instruction. Also, the programs that were prepared on computer cards can relatively easily be transfered into the PRIME.



Washington College was shocked when its new computer arrived two months early. Brown said, "It was in the middle of the floor in cardboard boxes, and the students couldn't get to the 1130. It was an impossible psychological situation—they had to squeeze around the boxes, knowing they contained the new computer. Impossible." He called the company and was told that in order for the computer to be installed, the rug in one of the rooms in the Center had to be removed and linoleum put in its place. The purpose of this was to prevent problems with static electricity and dust. The Center also had to be adapted with a 230 volt power line. Within forty-eight hours, the system was in operation. Students began using it on March 24.

For the convenience of the students, Brown mentioned the possibility of having a terminal installed on a "math floor" of one of the dormitories. He also said that several members of the administration were interested in getting terminals.

The main problem with the computer's early arrival was that Brown said that he "didn't know everything he needed to know about it." He was very pleased when it began operating so soon after its delivery and said, "I guess you could call it the Miracle on College Avenue."

In April, Brown wrote a "Letter to the Editor" which was printed in The Elm. In that letter, he thanked everyone who made the reality of the new computer possible, enumerating each person and his part in the selection process. He wrote, "It appears that there is now unanimous agreement that selecting a PRIME 550 computer was exactly the right decision."

Eventhough there were minor problems with the computer last semester Brown called it " a tremendous success." The Computing Center seems to be getting a lot of use, but Brown refused to comment on how the computer is working at the present time.

"Our problem" said Day, "is that we are changing publishers."

Day said that the granting of $200 as opposed to the $500 "reflects the SGA's budget austerity...I have no hard words for that. We're grareful for what we have recieved. We'll make do."

Frosh. Girl Views Homecoming

It was over a plate of ravioli that he popped the question. Very casual he was-yes sir! I had just taken a bite of ravioli when he nonchalantly asked, "Could I interest you in a date for Homecoming?".

Well, I very nearly swallowed the fork along with that bite! Could he interest me in a date for Homecoming? I'd only worshiped the ground that he walked on since the second day of Orientation Week. And now, the big blue-eyed senior had asked me, a lowly freshman, to the Homecoming dance. If he had just asked me to marry him, I couldn't have been happier!

I drifted back to Reid Hall on a pink cloud and announced the news to my green-eyed friends. After the "ohs" and "ahs" had diminished to a dull roar, I was confronted with the problem of what to wear. I examined my ten cocktail dresses and decided that I didn't have a thing to wear. I was shocked to find there was the possibility of buying a dress suitable for the occassion in iddy-biddy Chestertown. I found just what I wanted—a slinky black job of filmy chiffon.

After spending a month's allowance on the dress, I decided that it was much too sophisticated to go with my fluffy little ducktails. The next project then was to find a coordinating hair style. I finally decided to pile my hair on top of my head in a fashion not unlike that of pictures I had seen on the covers of Glamor and Mademoiselle. However, the whole illusion was destroyed at dinner when he walked up to me and inquired what I had done to my hair. The question itself wasn't so bad; it was the way that he said it! Needless to say, I resorted back to my fluffy little ducktails.

When my preparations had reached a peak, I was stunned to learn that I had door duty — you guessed it — Homecoming weekend! Ten dollars and a box of homemade cookies later, I had solved that problem.

Now the only thing that worried me was would he be proud of me as his date for the big dance?

I know now that I worried in vain for as I descend the creaking steps of Reid Hall, I can see the admiration in his eyes and I know that my First Homecoming at Washington College will be an event to remember.

First Impressions of Manchester in England

By PETE TURCHI

Pete Turchi, a junior at Washington College, is presently studying in Oxford, England, on the Manchester program.

A few days before I left for Oxford I went to Chestertown, to say goodby to some friends. The night before I left we drove to Cliff City and walked out on the pier to watch the moon set across the river. It was the beginning of fall and we were chilly as we saw the moon turn from a bright orange disk solid in the night to a pale light just above the horizon.

The next morning when I woke up I found a picture of High Street that someone had left as a gift. It was taken from somewhere around Bonnett's Department store, and in it you can see some duck-hunters Ford pickup, Stam Drugs, the traffic light, a truck in front of McCrory's and, off in the distance at the end the street, the Chester River.

That picture is on my desk now. It is still early fall in Chestertown, but here it is in the forties and very chilly, although the sun does its best to nudge in between the English rain whenever it can. We have had our first frost, even a hail storm, but no one is talking about the affect it will have on the crops. There are plenty of cars on Broad Street every day, but they aren't Ford pickups—they are Volkswagens, or cheap little noisy cars that the tourists rent.

Oxford is not Chestertown. There is no Phil's in Oxford; there are plenty of pubs, where you can get beer and wine and hot rum punch, but they all close at eleven, and they don't have fresh donuts. There is no place to go late at night when you have a craving for orange juice and Pepperidge Farms cookies. The orange juice is no good, and even if you could find Pepperidge Farm cookies they would probably cost you over three dollars. Everything is expensive. You can buy a large can of beer, almost four pints, for four and a half dollars. That's what they call a bargain here. You can get a shot glass ful of Coke for eighty-five cents. No, Oxford is not Chestertown.

But there is one coincidence—one of the major streets in Oxford is High Street. Local businessmen say that rent on High Stelet (or the High Street, as the English call it) may be the highest anywhere in England, outside of London. There is no McCrory's, but there is John Menzies, a store that sells books and film and stationary and typewriters. There is no Stam Drugs, but nearby there is Boots, the chemist. Several streets run off of High Street: St. Aldate's and Cornmarket Street are the biggest, but my favorites are the smaller ones—Magpie Lane, Logic Lane, and, back a few blocks, Dead Man's Walk.

The University makes up a large part of Oxford, but there are also many businesses, and a lot of tourists. Even on Sunday, when all the stores are closed, you can see them on High Street, gaping at University College, trying to find Christs Church and the Bodleian Library. You can see a whole herd of blue-suited Chinese businessmen corraling themselves into a corner on Queens Avenue, then retreating back to High Street. You can see French tourists, and Germans, and Nigerians, and more Americans than you will ever see in Chestertown, and sometimes even a few Englishmen.

If you stand at the intersection of Cornmarket and High Street, next to Barclay's, you can almost see the entire length of the street. Everywhere, around old buildings and new, there is scaffolding. There isn't a street in Oxford without scaffolding, whether its around the Magdalen College tower or around Barclay's Old Bank (Barclay's has three locations on High Street alone; there are also at least three other banks—they don't want those Chinese businessmen running short).

You can walk down High Street and feel as if you're in New York, until you look closely. There are well over twelve bus stops in three blocks, but of course the busses are double-deckers. There is an indoor market, but inside there are freshly-killed turkeys hanging by their necks, and fresh sides of beef sitting in the open. There is a wine shop, but a painstakingly-lettered, typically English sign says: "WILLIAM RICHARD MORRIS, later Lord Hufield, 1877-1963 first used this shop in his business as a cycle maker and repairer from which developed the motor car enterprise which was to benefit millions by the philanthropic benevolance of its founder."

No, Oxford is not Chestertown. All the stores close for lunch, and every time I see a small English boy in a suit I expect him to pipe up and say, "God bless us, every one!" Bells may ring in Chestertown on Sunday, but Quasimodo, the Hunchback of Notre Dame, has nothing on the Oxford student at Christs Church whose room is next to Old Tom. This, one of the oldest bells (they do things like that here—name a bell Old Tom), rings 101 times every day at nine o'clock. Across the street from my room in Warrington House there is a bell that rings every fifteen minutes, and adds a little melody on the hour. But Sunday, Sunday is the day to hear the bells. All day there are bells—before church services, after church services, during church services—a bell rings nineteen times at five thirty-four. Another set of bells plays a particularly ugly tune from five-thirty until five after six. Ah, the bells, the bells!

Manchester College has no bells. Manchester College has no playing fields. Manchester College does have a pipe organ, though, and it has dorms that are hundreds of years old, and plumbing to prove it. Most of the male residents have a short walk through a small courtyard to get to the toilet (referred to around here, and I don't think it's anything personal, as WC). And it's another few steps in the freezing cold rain to get to the bathroom where there is, of course, a bath tub. Not a shower. There is a bath tub with a skylight above it, where you can sit in steaming water and watch the white clouds turn to gray and listen to bells chiming off in the distance.

But I don't mind it. One morning I woke up early and grabbed my towel and ran, half-naked, across the campus to get to the only showers in the College, and on the way I heard violin music coming out of the practice hall. And when I came out of the shower a half hour later, my wet hair crisp from the cold, it was still there, echoing between the chapel and Warrington House. And some afternoons the music tutor sits at the pipe organ in the chapel and practices his Beethoven, and it drifts across the quad and into the bathroom, where I sit watching the clouds.

Manchester is small, smaller than Washington College. At meals all of us fit into one small room very comfortably, in less than a week we all recognized each other. We have a soccer team, and a rowing team, but only one team can play at a time, because they both have the same people. There are a lot of sports they play here that I don't understand, but when an English girl in a sports equipment store tried to tell me that lacrosse is an English sport, I had to set her straight. I'm from Washington College. I know lacrosse.

Rowing is very popular here, and the other day when someone said they were going to jog down to the boat house, I felt, just for a second, like I was back in Chestertown. Last night I got to thinking about the picture of High Street on my desk and I walked out to the Folly Bridge, over the river, to watch the moon set.

Year Abroad Program In England

By Jeff Alderson

Every fall, around early November, Manchester College, in Oxford England, reviews an offer for three juniors students at Washington College to attend its institution. A committee of four from Washington College sends out notices of this to the entire sophomore class and faculty. An evening is scheduled to show slides of Oxford and provide a chance for discussion. This is usually held at the house of Dr. Peter Tapke, chairman of the Philosophy Department, the three students who have just returned from this program intend to tell of their expressions in England. The three returnees this year are John D'Amanda, Ellen Beardsley, and Cathy Conn.

Interested students are asked to consider this option over Christmas break and to discuss this with their parents sometime after the New Year. Those interested are asked to write a short statement of why they are interested in the program what their aims are if they attend Oxford.

The Manchester Committee then meets with the applicants and picks the three strongest candidates. This choice is usually based on academic standing. In case one of those chosen cannot attend, an alternate is also chosen.

While attending Manchester, students are involved in a tutorial curriculum. Each student meets with his tutor once a week to discuss what is to be read and which lectures are to be attended. Ellen Beardsley said, "Some weeks I didn't attend any lectures while some weeks I would attend several in a day."

Manchester College is set up on a three term system. The first term, Michaelmas term, lasts until Christmas. The second term, Hilary, lasts from January until March. The third term, Trinity, lasts until the end of June. Each term is eight weeks longer, however, students are asked to be at Oxford for the week before and the weeks after each term.

In the past, only people majoring in English Literature, British History, Music, or Philosophy and Religion were permitted to attend. This year, Manchester is adding political studies. These are generally based on the British political system; however, they are applicable to many aspects of the US political system.

Manchester has a trimester opposed to WC's two semester year, the transfer of credit is sometimes difficult. Tapke stated, "Manchester sends back reports with suggested grades. From these we recommend what credit should be given for the whole year."

There is very little financial aid available for tuition. Beardsley said, however, "All things considered, tuition, room and board, the cost was almost the same, but the cost of living is so high." She added, "With the traveling done over vacations and just living there, it ended up costing considerably more."

The three people to attend Manchester and the one alternate will be chosen in January. Beardsley offered this advice to those who go, "Keep studying. Don't wait until the night before to prepare for a tutorial. Also, the only people disappointed (no one from WC) were those who went with specific expectations. You need to go with an open mind."

A Rose Trying to Cope With Fame

By Sue James
Fine Arts Editor

Sex, drugs, and rock and roll are the major ingredients in a famous rock idol star's life, as illustrated by Mary Rose Foster (Bette Midler), the main character of the Marbin/Wortharon Russo production, "The Rose."

"The Rose" takes its basic plot from the life of Janis Joplin, a roch in the 60's whose short life was characterized by drug addiction and homosexual activity. It is said that Joplin ended her life with an overdose of barbiturates. Bill Kerby, who wrote the screenplay, ends the picture with Rose dying on stage during a performance. This, however, is a deviation from the Joplin bibliography.

It is a tragic motion picture, and it leaves the audience reflective after the unmerciful finale. Bette Midler, after articulating several indecipherable sounds into the microphone, falls to the stage gasping for one last breath.

Bette Midler's performance is dynamic as she moves from one emotional state to another. At times, Midler plays a hard-core street lady as she galavants from one night spot to another, uttering obscenities and looking for that someone to fulfill her unsatisfied needs. Yet, there are other times when Midler reveals the poignant side of the Rose—she cries when her manager (Alan Bates) refuses to accept her decision to take a year off from the music business, and when her at a greasy bar. Rose is confused, and cannot accept the long-awaited lover, the chauffer, Houston Dyer, leaves her stranded at a greasy bar. Rose is confused, and cannot accept the fame that has showered on her. She is lonely, believes that the only way to get a man is to let him take advantage of her body and her money. This action leaves Rose stranded at theend of the movie as she is discovered with her lover, Sarah, by Houston. Houston had seen the sensitive side of Rose during their short relationship, and he liked this quality.

After seeing this unexpected event, however, he realized that Rose is too involved in drugs and the rock scene, for them to have a long-term relationship. He cannot change Rose, she has to change herself. This is the poignant side of the movie as Rose discovers that she cannot cope with her personal qualities. She is obscene, loose and addicted to drugs and alchohol. For Rose, death appears to be the only release from these addictions and from that she has earned as a rock star.

"The Rose" is noted for Bette Midlers performance and the theme that is attributed to the lives of todays rock musicians. At the end of the movie, the theme song "The Rose" is echoed by Bette Midler as her lifeless form is carried off by Alan Bates and the members of the band. The words in the score somehow wrap up her life.

"When the night has been too lonely, and the road has been too long and you think that love is only for the lucky and the strong. Just remember in the winter, for beneath the bitter snow, lies the seed that with the suns love in the spring becomes the rose."

Print exhibit opens in Tawes

by TAMARA DUBIN

"Of all modern printmakers; none has so challenged and changed the traditional methods and approach to. printmaking as has Stanley William Hayter", is the claim of the introduction to the "Innovations in Intaglio" show, which is being displayed in Tawes Theatre until Wednesday. The show is primarily composed of selected intaglio prints by S.W. Hayter, who teaches a printing workshop known as the Atelier 17 in Paris. As well as an attractive and colorful display, "Innovations in Intaglio" is also an exploration into the intaglio process.

The exhibit begins with the engraving process. A plaque on the wall informs the Viewer that "though one of the most direct Intaglio processes; engraVing is extremely difficult to master," Hayter illustrates in the following examples from the 1930's and 40's that the grooves cut into the zinc or copper plates can express motion and dimension as well as outline a form. In one example, Hayter displays a crayon version next to its duplicate print in order to giVe the viewer an idea of how the variation in the thickness of the engraved line can give the form of three-dimensional quality as compared to the flat crayon lines.

The dates of prints take the viewer in chronological order to the second process of Intaglio printing—the soft -ground technique. Rather than using tools to cut lines, this technique employs acid to dissolve areas of the plate which hold the ink when pressed to the paper. Soft-ground enables Hayter to create texture in his prints. In the example called "The Cruelty of Insects", Hayter presses crumpled paper as texture behind the abstract, engraved lines of the insect. The large areas in the background suggest the oversized foliage of the insect's world.

Hayter's next advance is the technique of simultaneous color printing which allows more than one color to be applied to one plate. Or, as seen in Hayter's "Abstraction", one roller is appleid to a succession of different colored plates. In his examples, Hayter's Surrealist background is suggested in the "spontaneous and intuitive design" of "Centauresse" and "Sun Dancer." Their bold areas of texture and color contrast to the frail,-wispy lines of the engraving, creating impressions of weightlessness and flight.

The rest of the show contains examples form other member of the Atelier 17. Following the progress made by Hayter, these printmakers have devised variations on the basic processes using stencils, power tools and a multiviscosity technique of color application. In the creation of "Shadows of Fish" the artist inks the actual fish and transposes the prints to the plate. The result of the work of.the Atelier 17 is a refreshing new way of using the art of printmaking. Hayter is seeking to replace printmaking's frequent role of mere reproduction by a new, more creative mode of experimentation.

This fine show will be open Monday from 4:30 to 6:00 and Tuesday from 8:30 until 10:00 p.m.

McCabe performs at return engagement

by SUE JAMES
Fine Arts Editor

Electrifying pianist Robin McCabe performed at a return engagement last Tuesday night at the Tawes Theatre.

McCabe, who is noted for her exceptional interpretative abilities with orchestras and in recitals put on a splendid performance during her three-hour piano concert.

Selections included in the performance were Beethoven's Sonata in E Major, Op. 109; Ravel's Miroirs; Chopin's Sonata in B flat minor, Op. 35; Liszt's Sonnetto del Petrarch, 104; and the Verdi-Liszt peice, Concert Paraphrase from "Rigoletto."

Ravel's collection of short piano pieces, entitled "Miroirs," performed by Assistant Professor of Music, Kathleen Mills, earlier this semester, McCabe gave a short description of the five piano pieces before playing them. All are pointillistice in style—a characteristic of the French Impressionist school of composers in the twentieth century—meaning that the tone of the piece contains shadows of color—evokes a languid landscape," McCabe said. "Une 'barque sur l'ocean' conveys water images." The pianist performed these pieces with a kind of emotion that Ravel perhaps intended to evoke. McCabe's facila expressions were transformed by the various pianissimos and fortes that accompanied the memorized score.

Robin McCabe's piano talents have recently been described in a full length biography, "A Pianist's Progress." This book is an expanded version of a feature article that was written in New Yorker magazine. "A Pianist's Progress" traces McCabe's rise from a Juilliard School piano student to the nationally sought-after artist she is today.

Critics claim that McCabe is one of America's most brilliant and exciting young artists. Her debut at Carnegie Hall in 1975 began a tour itinerary that included the United States, Canada, Europe, and South America. McCabe has also recorded a piano transcrition of Stravinsky's "Firebird" on the Vanguard label.

Professor Robert Day's black Labrador Amos has, he reports, "collected 300 Lacrosse balls now, and given them back." Coach Ed Athey has promised Amos a Varsity letter sweater, but Amos says he'll hold out for better. According to Day, Amos demands, "either an honorary degree or an award of excellence."

Amos plans to team up with two other dogs in a joint venture of lacrosse ball retrieval. Now, Day says, Amos "wants to apply for special interest housing in West Hall for dogs who retrieve lacrosse balls."

"He's going for 1000 balls by the Bicentennial" of the college in 1982, says Day of Amos. And, Day says "the next 100 balls Amos collects, he wants to give to the Women's Lacrosse team... he likes them."

Day also reported that Amos recently recovered "a very old lacrosse ball which Amos says is the original lacrosse ball Joe McLain played lacrosse with in the '30's." The ball is currently undergoing cobalt dating and Amos, who could not comment himself, has his mouth full.

Volleyball Teams Meet at WC's Quad Match

By JEFF ALDERSON

The Washington College volleyball team played a squad match Friday, October 17th. The team began with three games against Albright playing in characteristic fashion. "We started slow and didn't play very well the first game, losing 15-7," coach Penny Fall said. "The second game was played well even though we lost again 15-12." She added that "If we had played high gear we could have won."

The second opponenent was Notre Dame. "We have always had tight matches with them in past years," Fall said. Washington College lost the first game 9-17, but came back and won the second game 15-1. Fall described the third game as incredible. "We were down 14-1 and ended up winning 16-14. It wasn't just Anne Plumer's outstanding serving that won it for us. This game was a good indication of our spirit. The closer we got, the more dissoncertered they got."

The final opponent was from Washington College. "They have a little less 'classy' manner on the court which made us a little mad." Washington College's squad lost the first game, won the second game, and lost the third game 15-7 "in a real struggle." Fall said, "We played as well during the second and third games as we have all year. The girls really put up an excellent battle. I was not unhappy at all."

On Wednesday, October 22, the squad competed with two more Mid-Atlantic Conference teams. WC lost all three games to Gettysburg, 4-15, 3-15, 7-15. Fall said, "We haven't played well against MAC teams this year, though we always have in the past."

Gettysberg then played Catonsville and lost. Catonsville had a record of 15-0 last year and placed third in the country. Fall feels that because of the outstanding quality of Catonsville, our scores against them do not indicate the quality of our team's performance. "We played them tough," she added.

Some of the outstanding players continue to be the tricaptains Cheryl Loss, Ann Most, and Julie Wheeler.

"Cheryl Loss is still exceptional all around especially her hitting and covering. Her performance was consistently high Friday and Wednesday." Fall said.

Although neither Ann Most nor Julie Wheeler was in top shape during these matches, both continued to play well. "Most had strep throat which hurt her timing and spike but she still played hard. Wheeler has slowed down since she hurt her ankle in the match against Loyola, but she's still doing well." Fall said.

Other outstanding players include Judi Skelton, Annie Plumer, Maureen Murray, and Laura Chase. "Skelton has done a nice job." Fall remarked, "Her play has picked up considerably. Plumer did na incredible job of serving. She put the ball in play hard every-time." Fall said, "Murray played her best game all year against Winnington." Laura Chase continued her excellent performance. "The Catonsville game was one of her best blocking games yet," Fall added.

With only two weeks left of the season Fall feels a constant need for the team to progress. "We have been working hard since break," she said. "This has been a rebuilding year for us. We've been trying to 'put money in the bank' for next year."

Basketball Prospects Promising

By HARRY McENROE
Sports Editor

The Washington College basketball team has been practicing for the past two weeks in preparation for the upcoming season. The Shoremen face head Coach Tom Finnegan terms an "attractive and competitive" 25-game slate.

Last year's squad finished with a 10-11 record, having lost two games by a single point. These setbacks cost the Shoremen both a winning record and a possible Middle Atlantic Conference playoff berth. Having no seniors on last year's quintet, the backbone of the team returns with a year of experience under its belt.

Among the returning lettermen is junior Captain Joey Moye, who enjoyed a fine season last year as he led the Shoremen in both scoring (13.8ppg) and rebounding (14.8). Senior guard Craig Langwost, who scored at a 12.2 points per game clip and led the conference in foul shooting returns also. Another veteran who has contributed in the past and will be depended upon this year is senior Rich Dwyer, who led the cagers in field goal percentage last year.

Several talented newcomers were key members of last year's squad and all are back this season. Sophomore guard Dave Blackwell led the team in both steals and assists while averaging 12.7 ppg. Sharp-shooting forward Jim Corey added an 11.7ppg average to the '79-80 Shore cause. Another first-year starter who returns for his sophomore season is Carl Fornoff, who led the team in blocked shots and tied for the rebounding lead. The lettermen list is completed with forwards Paul Hynson and Bill Graham.

Although Coach Finnegan will rely heavily on these veterans for their leadership and experience he hopes that five or six freshmen will make "significant contributions" to the Shore cause. Heading the freshmen crop are twin brothers Scott and Wayne Spurrier from Andover HighSchool in Maryland and Tom Keefe from Notre Dame Catholic in Trenton, New Jersey. Since Finnegan is "not"concerned with having a select starting five" many players will see action. Other freshman prospects include guards Ted Russell from Mt. St. Joseph High School, and Joe Stallings of Archbishop Curley in Baltimore, and Vince Gasior of Patapsco High School along with two swingmen from New Jersey, Mike Shwed and Greg Dargan.

The season begins on November 21 when the Shoremen travel to meet Virginia Wesleyan in the first round of the North Carolina Wesleyan Tournament. Virginia Wesleyan won twenty-two games last year and will provide strong opposition for the cagers. The Shoremen will also participate in the Susquehanna University Tornament in the beginning of December. Trenton State College and Philadelphia Bible College are also in the tourney. The teams will host the fourth annual Wild Goose Classic in Cain Athletic Center beginning Friday, December 12th. The guest teams are Salisbury State and two colleges from New York City, John Jay and Lehman College.

The team's schedule is highlighted by ten Middle Atlantic games. These contests are crucial since they decide whether on not the Shoremen will participate in any post-season playoff tournaments. This season the squad will also play two Division I teams, American University and Loyola.

Coach Finnegan feels "optimistic about the overall situation right now," With the veterans back for another year and several freshmen with potential on the squad, he thinks that the team has a "pretty healthy talent situation." Due to a lack of height, rebounding may be a problem however Finnegan thinks that they have the potential for a winning season, even a great season, depending upon how hard the squad is willing to work.

Shore Note: In recent years student support has added significantly to the basketball team's success. In fact, over the two seasons the cagers have enjoyed an impressive 18-3 home record. The Shoremen hope for continued support this year.

Senior Rick Dwyer takes it up as the basketball team prepares for the season ahead.

Bicentennial Publicity Committee Takes Shape

by WENDY MURPHY
News Editor

"Washington College is one of the best kept secrets on the Eastern Shore of Maryland. Many people aren't even aware that a liberal arts school exists on the Eastern Shore," said John Conkling, ChairMan of the newly formed Bicentennial Publicity Committee.

The Committee was formed about three weeks ago as a sub-committeeof the Bicentennial Steering Committee.

"There are anumber of events wefeel may be of interest to alumni,friends of the College, and to the general public because of both the historical aspect of the Bicentennial and the celebrative spirit," said Conkling.

The committee plans to hold its first meeting late this Fall or early next year. Conkling said that he has already has discussions of plans with Kathy Myrick=DeProspo, a committee member, who will be doing a lion's share of the work as most of it will be channeled through her Public Relations Office." He added, "One of the main reasons the committee was formed is to help Kathy."

Other committee members include Hurtt Derringer, Hilda Nicari, Geoff Garinther, and Ginger Kurapka. John Traviest, father of student Patti Traviest and producer of the Today Show, is also being asked to join the committee. The editor of next year's Elm will also become a member.

The possibility of hiring an outside public relations firm from Washington or New York has been discussed but is still undecided. Conkling said that there appears to be no major budget for this but the possibility is still being considered. He also said that people who are in any position to help are being asked to do so.

The majority of the publicity work will be done on campus but Conkling hopes that Baltimore television stations will do something to cover the story on one of their programs. Other outside work will be done by persons not able to visit the campus.

Throughout the Bicentennial Year, the entire calendar of lectures, exhibits, and concerts will have a connecting bicentennial theme. During the first part of the year, the emphasis will be on the past years of the College. Following that, the emphasis will be on the present College, and the year will be concluded with emphasis on the next one-hundred years of Washington College.

One of the largest plans for the next year is the Fall Convocation. The speaker will be Su Fraser Noble, Principal of the University of Aberdeen, the alma mater of Washington College's first President, William Smith. Smith was simultaneously President of the College and rector of the Emmanuel Episcopal Church, where the Convocation will be held. A parade will be held which will end at the church. Conkling said that the Bicentennial Committees are working on getting a fife and drum corps to lead the procession.

Commencement for the graduates for the Class of 1983 is also planned to be "a gala affair," according to Conkling. He adds that either President Reagan or another distinguished speaker will come to deliver the address to the graduated.

KA's Involved in Fight at U of Delaware

by WENDY MURPHY
News Editor

Senior Duane Marshall is in The Delaware Memorial Hospital with a serious eye injury he received as a result of a fight which broke out at a party he attended Monday night at the University of Delaware.

Marshall, President of the Kappa Alpha Order here at Washington College, went with several of his fraternity brothers from the College to an election-eve party at the off-campus Fraternity House owned by the Beta Epsilon Chapter of Kappa Alpha Order from the University of Delaware.

At one point in the evening, a disagreement with a rival fraternity from Delaware began. A fight, which centered around a door, followed. Marshall was trying to separate two groups when he was struck in his face by a beer bottle thrown from within a close range. He was taken to an area medical center and then to the hospital.

Two persons were arrested Monday outside the Fraternity House for disorderly conduct in connection with the fighting. The incident is being further investigated by Washington College, The University of Delaware, and the Newark Police Department.

The Kappa Alpha Order of the College would like to express their appreciation for all those who attended the special prayer meeting held in Talbot House, Tuesday, on behalf of Duane.

Academic Housing Proposed

by VIRGINIA KURAPKA
Editor-in-chief

The Student Affairs Committee is in the process of drawing up a report to be delivered to President Joseph McLain, concerning a proposal to house academic interest groups in the Hill Dorms when renovation on them is completed.

As early as last April, Professor Robert Day proposed "exploring the idea of using the Hill Dorms for academic housing," he said, as opposed to fraternity housing. McLain requested the report, and since then the Student Affairs Committee, chaired by Dr. Steven Cades, associate pr ofessor of Sociology, has, "agreed to receive campus opinion on the proposal and to help in writing a report to the President on its merits," said Cades.

A meeting of interested faculty members was held last week, and a meeting of officials of existing student groups was held last night. "Almost all the faculty members present were in support of Mr. Day's proposal," said Cades. "I think I can speak for the committee when I say none of us with to do away with the fraternities. The question is only one of how best to use those renovated buildings for the benefit of the campus as a whole."

Faculty Meeting Notes

by VIRGINIA KURAPKA
Editor-in-Chief

The faculty discussed the following at their November 3rd meeting.

•Su Fraser Noble and Finn Casperson have agreed to come to the college to accept honorary degrees. Noble, vice chancellor of Aberdeen University, will be here nextfall, and Casperson will be present at graduation. Of threepeople contacted so far to be speakers at graduation, Andy Rooney has regretfully declined due to a prior commitment, and no answer has been received form Art Buchwald or Garry Trudeau. As of Monday night, a letter was ready to be sent to President Carter, but had not yet been mailed.

•Dean Clarke reported that approximately 30,000 pieces of information have been collected form various sources by the committee on attrition. This information is to be coded and programmed into the computer, and tests are to be run on it.

•Evaluation forms are to be used by the interested faculty members in their classes. Tenured faculty have the option to use them.

•A motion was passed that the report of the legal committee of the Board of Visitors and Governors concerning the issue of financial exigency in releasing tenured faculty members, be considered by the executive committee of the Washington College Chapter of the American Association of University Professors. A drafted response for submission to the board will then be submitted to the faculty for consideration at the December faculty meeting.

editorial

academic housing

The proposal to house academically oriented groups in the Hill Dorms presents Washington College with one of the best opportunities it's had in a long time.

This issue is likely to provoke all kinds of controversy. It should be pointed out immediately that this isn't an anti-fraternity move, and that this neither is just a special plea from special interest groups. The question is not whether fraternities should be replaced by other, narrow interest groups. The question is whether the college will gain by broadening the representation of students living in the Hill Dorms, and thereby enhance the academic quality of life here. This must be answered by faculty, administration, and, above all, by students. The outcome affects us most, and we have a unique chance to prove that what we're interested in here is our education.

The debate over this issue will be beneficial no matter what the outcome. To get people-involved, to get them thinking, may be considered an end in itself.

But we hope the decision will be to open up the Hill Dorms. So centrally located, there is no spot so well situated to begin a renaissance in the academic life outside the classroom at W.C. This would be a real, lasting renovation, one well worth the million dollars it's costing to make these buildings habitable again.

Scholarship Bank

Press Release

Anew servicedesigned to assist students in need of financial aid to continue school or plan for graduate school was announced today by the Scholarship Bank.

According to Steve Danz, Program Director, the new service will give each student a print-out of the scholarships, loans, grants and work-study sources available to him or her in that student's specific field.

Students apply by writing for and filling out a questionnairewhich is then used as the key to the data bank. The questionnaire is a mini-profile of each student, seeking information on year in school, major, occupational objectives, sex, religion, parent's union, employer and military service and student's outstanding abilities, such as leadership experience or sports. The service is so thorough according to the director that in the field of girls' sports scholarships alone there are over 2,000 entries.

The director also indicated that the Scholarship Bank is the only program that offers a full listing of all graduate and post-graduate scholarships, which would be of interest ot.all grad students and even faculty.

The data bank guarantees that each student will receive at least $100 in aid, or the service frrfee of $35 will be refunded. Danz indicated that students unable to pay the $35 fee may receive a "basic" print-out of at least 15 scholarship sources for $25. The $25 fee will give students up to 50 sources of possible aid.

The service will also send each applicant a publication on How to Play Grantsmanship, which will be of help to the students in applying for the aid. The Scholarship Bank cooperated with financial aids offices and does not duplicate their services, according to the director. Most financial aid offices give information onlyon sources that they administer.

Write to Scholarship Bank, 10100 Santa Monica #750, L.A. 90067 for an application. Enclose a stamped, self-addressed envelope and the required fee.

Letters to the Editor

Broadside Clarification

To my very great surprise an article in The Elm (October 17) reported that the Sophie Kerr Committee and refused to provide funds for the Writers Union. This report is not true. The Kerr Committee has supported the Writers Union since that organization's founding and regards it as an important part of the program at Washington College. There is no question, to my knowledge, of either discontinuing the funds provided by the Sophie Kerr Committee, or of asking the group to cut its budget. Last year a request for an increase in the amount allocated to the Writers Union's functions was promptly accepted by the Committee in the belief that the rising costs of publications were inhibiting the students in their efforts.

The source of the misinformation in both the article on the first page of The Elm and the editorial on the second page is unknown to me, and I do not wish to speculate idly on the orgins of the errors, but it does seem that such serious allegations as were apparently aired in the SGA hearing, make careful checking of facts an important part of pre-publication responsibility. Misunderstandings and hard feelings are bound to arise as a result of what has been said in the SGA meeting, and subsequently printed in The Elm. I would appreciate the cooperation of all concerned in establishing the truth for the good of the college community—and the record.

Yours truly,
Nancy Tatum, Chairman, English Department

ERI Offers Adventure

A new firm, Expedition Research, Inc., has launched a campaign to register adventure-minded college students who are looking to join expeditions.

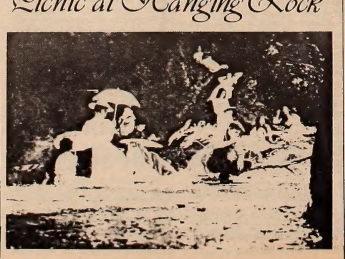
Expedition Research, Inc., a placement service for adventurers and explorers, is now accepting applications from college students, photographers, scuba divers, mountain climbers, archaeologists , ocean sailors, scientists, and other explorers who want to be placed on various scientific and exploratory expeditions worldwide.

Over 250 expeditions have approached ERI for team members. These projects range from archaeological excavations to Himalayan mountaineering, from oceanographic surveys and cave exploration to scientific investigations on all six continents. Some expeditions award salaries, commissions, and royalties to team members; others require cost sharing. Expeditions last from several days to several months. College credit and scholarships are often available.

Students, either undergraduate or graduate, are in demand. They gain field experience by working with professors and scientists involved in their field of study. Expedition Research, the brainchild of two experienced mountaineers, was formed on the premise that there are thousands of young scientists and adventurers around the world who would like to put their talents and interests to use in the field, but who do not know how to go about it. ERI provides a service not only to these individuals, but to the groups who are looking for them.

Expeditions registered with ERI have been endorsed by such organizations as the Explorers Club, National Geographic Society, and the Smithsonian Institution.

Chris White, a Princeton University biologist, and Jim Stout, a geographer from the University of Washington, are co-directors of the firm. White explains that "there is a terrific need for people with interests ranging from archaeology, to scuba diving, to zoological research."



ERI members receive monthly issues of EXPLORATION, a newsletter which lists expedition opportunities and summer and career job opportunities in the outdoors. ERI members are offered positions with scientific institutions, research vessels, commercial trip operations, and outdoor leadership schools. Registrants also receive resume forms which are placed on file to fill urgent requests.

Registration with ERI costs $15 per year for students ($20 regular). Registrants receive nonthly isses of EXPLORATION, resume forms, and a 20 percent mail order discount on outdoor equipment ordered through Eastern Mountain Sports.

Students may register by sending $15 to Expedition Research, Inc., P.O. Box 467R, Cathedral and Franklin Sts., Annapolis, Maryland 21404, or write for further information.

The Presidential Election

Chronicle Takes Pre-Election Straw Vote

by JANET HOOK
The Chronicle of Higher Education

If students on five Ivy League has their way, John B. Anderson would be the next President of the United States.

That's what the Daily Princetonian found this month when it asked almost 2,500 students at the University of Pennsylvania and Brown, Cornell, Harvard, and Princeton Universities how they would vote in the Presidential election.

The newspaper's tally gave 41 per cent of the vote to Representative Anderson, the independent candidate, 29 percent to President Carter, and 15 per cent to Republican Ronald Reagan.

President Carter took the lead among the Ivy League students when they were asked how they would vote if it seemed Mr. Anderson did not have a reasonable chance of winning. If the independent candidate were not in therace at all, the poll found that President Carter would win with about 56 per cent of the vote-despite the fact that more than a third of the studentson each campus said they thought they were more intelligent than either the incumbent or the Republican nominee.

In that measure of students' self-esteem- or their lack of esteem for the two major candidates-Harvard and were "equal in hubris," the student newspaper reported. On both campuses, about 56 per cent of the students polled regarded themselves as smarter than both President Carter and Mr. Reagan.

Straw polls on other college campuses have also found ! Mr. Anderson the favorite among students. For example:

•The independent candidate swept a straw poll of 600 Grinnell College students last month with 51 per cent of the vote, with President Carter's support tallied at 25 per cent and Mr. Reagan's at 12 per cent. Barry Commoner, the candidate of the Citizen's Party, took 4 per cent of the vote, and Ed , the Libertarian candidate, took 2 per cent.

•In a mock election at the College of the Holy Cross last month, Mr. Anderson drew 37 per cent of the vote, Mr. Reagn" an 27 per cent, and President Carter 19 per cent.

•A poll of 200 students at Georgewown University found the independent in the lead with 36 per cent of the vote.

The second largest bloc (sic) of student voters—23 percent of those polled—fell into the "other/decided" category. Mr. Reagan came in third with 22 per cent, and President Carter fourth with 15 per cent.

At other campuses, however, the Republican and Democratic nominees are running neck and neck for first place.

•President Carter led Mr. Reagan by only one vote—87 to 86—in a survey of 230 students at Missouri Western State College. Mr. Anderson received 36 votes.

•At the Unviersity of North Carlina at Chapel Hill, the incumbent led Mr. Reagan by a 28-to 26-per cent margin, with 29 per cent going to Mr. Anderson.

•Students at the College Misericordia gave the Republican nominee a lead of four percentage points—39 to 35—with Mr. Anderson running third with 26 per cent.

Reagan Gains in South

Mr. Reagan's campaign organization reports that polls on six campuses show the Republican leading by margins of 10 to 60 percentage points over his challengers. Most of those polls were taken at colleges in the South, including Old Dominion University, Radford College, Louisiana State University, and Southern Methodist University. Mr. Reagan racked up the most impressive victory at Louisiana Tech University, where he had the support of 71 per cent of the students polled.

A spokesman for the College Democrats of Amcrica says the group has not been keeping track of straw polls on college campuses.

"Students' views have been changing a lot lately," the spokesman said. "Anderson has been losing a lot of support."

Reagan, Will He Affect Washington College?

by WILLIAM MORTIMER
Assistant Editor

Ronald W. Reagan, the newly elected President of the United States, will take the Oath of Office in January. With his ascension to the White House as fortieth Chief Executive, policies will, without a doubt, change. The question which remains to be seen is how radically the new government will alter life for various sections of the population. For colleges, Washington College in particular, will the Reagan administration help or hinder students and faculty?

Among members of the administration and faculty, there are varying opinions as to how the Reagan Presidency will affect college life. Washington College, being a small school, recieves very little federal aide. According to President of the College Joseph McLain "we're too small to be affected by whomever is in the White House." He continued to say that "I don't think it will have any impact, major or minor, on this college."

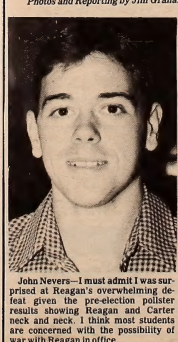
Dean of the College Garry Clarke said that "I think the picture goes wider than the implications for a small college, and for education in general." He added that "there are larger problems than those in Education."

Clarke sees money expeditures as being affected by the Reagan administration. "We're giving away money hand and fist," he said. "Reagan wants to cut this down . . . we do so badly by the government (in terms of finances) that our support comes from elsewhere.

The newly formed Department of Education is "controversial at best," Clarke said. "The things that happen on Capital Hill are questionable."

Clarke concluded that "after reading all kinds of things, I was not able to reach a conclusion as to who would be best for Washington College." He added that he felt the "whole thing is kind of odd . . . I wish that one of the candidates had come out with a campaign view on education."

Dr. Daniel Premo of the Political Science department said that "Mr. Reagan was hardly what you would call a friend of higher education while serving as governor of California. It remains to be seen what his policy will be as chief executive." Premo said that "some people think Reagan's election will have little affect on Washington College because we do recieve a minimal amount of federal aide." The move to conservatism, with the election of Reagan will, in fact, "have direct implications to higher education in this country," he said.

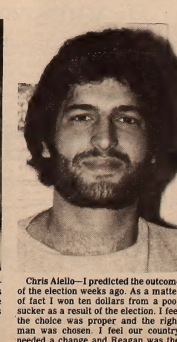


Washington College is not "invulnerable to policy changes at the federal level" said Premo. According to Premo, the recently created Department of Education will probably not be abolished. It is also unlikely that the functions of this department will be incorporated in the older department of Health, Education and Welfare. "However," Premo said, "I do anticipate reduced federal funding for a variety of programs that will affect all segments of the college community." For example, Premo believes that "less money will be made available for student loans, funding for area specialization programs, and educational exchange programs will be further curtailed." This Premo feels, will affect both students and faculty adversely. He added that there may also be a "reducation of federal aid to state educational institutes" which might then lead state legislators to "decrease their amount of support for the private educational sector." This, Premo concluded would cut funding in "areas such as low interest for capital improvement projects, funding for student loans and scholarships, and the direct subsidy initiated under former Governor Mandel based on the number of graduates." This funds Washington College with approximately $50,000 "with no strings attached."

Whether or not the Reagan Administration will actually affect fundings for the college, directly or indirectly, remains to be seen. The question is, obviously, a controversial and opinionated one.

Roving Reporter

Photos and Reporting by Jim Graham



Question: How do you feel about the outcome of the Presidential election.

John Nevers—I must admit I was surprised at Reagan's overwhelming defeat given the pre-election pollster results showing Reagan and Carter neck and neck. I think most students are concerned with the possibility of war with Reagan in office.

Nan Weinstock—I think it was inevitable. There was no other way it was feasible. I don't like Reagan but the country needed a change and this was it.

Chris Aiello—I predicted the outcome of the election weeks ago. As a matter of fact I won ten dollars from a poor sucker as a result of the election. I feel the choice was proper and the right man was chosen. I feel our country needed a change and Reagan was the right man for the job.

Ken Maher—I just hope we all don't have to go to war or I'll be catching a suntan in another country so it doesn't make too much difference. The American people will find out soon enough whether Reagan was the man. I believed in Carter.

Mystery Man Merz Gives Harriers Spark

by JEFF ALDERSON

"I worked this summer (running), it was very enthusiastic and it really paid off," says senior cross country runner Ken "Mystery Man" Merz. Merz has been an asset to the team since he started running cross country for W.C. a year and a half ago.

"Mystery Man," comes form Gladwyne, Pennsylvania, a suburb of Philadelphia. During his high school years, Merz was mainly involved in wrestling. He felt that cross country was a good way to condition for wrestling season.

When Merz applied to college, he was put on "too many waiting lists." He eventually applied to W.C. because "it's a good place for chemistries." When he found out that there was no wrestling team here, Merz decided to try out for cross country. He ran his freshman year but was hurt so he did not come out his sophomore and junior years.

Ken acquired his nickname from Hurtt Deringer, a writer for the Kent County News. "Someone told me that there was an article in the Kent County News (entitled) "Mystery Man Merz Spanks Shore Harriers." The point of the article, written by Deringer, was, "Where had Merz been in previous years?"

Merz does not feel that cross country is really a spectator sport. "If you're not interested, it's dull. Competing is exciting, though," he said.

"For a five mile race you have to really be psyched," Merz commented. He "psyches" himself before a race with some stretching routines then "I just relax and goof around. Then just line up and go."

Merz has good feelings about his teammates and coach. "Chatellier's a good coach. He doesn't want excess in working out, he just wants us to do well. I'm glad that I can help him and do well for him."

For the first time in his life, Merz is going to try out for outdoor track this spring. His goal is to "try to get as close to or beat the school record for the mile."

Last year, "Mystery Man" ran in the faculty challenge and placed third behind Sean O'Connor and Jeff Chaffin, first and second respectively. Merz could not run this year because of a conflict wit), a meet. He also ran in the ten-mile Chestertown Sea Party race last spring.

This summer, Merz ran 10-15 miles everyday until he had to cut down because of a bad knee. He continued to run six miles a day and raced most of this summer at a distance of ten kilometers.

Merz adds that, "Sean O'Connor is going to help me and Jeff Lucas this year. I go running with him (O'Connor) and he really gives me inspiration. He keeps me going."

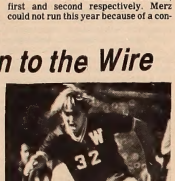
"I don't understand all this bother about me." Merz remarked. "I consider myself only a slightly above average runner. I'm hoping I can eventually become really good. I hope to keep running in Grad school." Being a chemistry major, Merz feels that cross country is "just another lab course."

The Mid Atlantic Conference Championships are this Saturday, November 8. "I hope W.C. is not bottom ranked this year, again," Merz said. "Next weekend I'm going to try to quality for nationals. It'll be tough. It's just a try but it should be fun to race with quality runners."

Shore Booters Coming Down to the Wire

by JIM GRAHAM

The soccer season is fast coming to a close for this year's squad and it has gotten to the point where they must win tomorrow against a very good Western Maryland squad to continue their playing days.



It has been a frustrating season for many of the players and their coach. Last years 11-5-2 season was the best in recent soccer history at W.C. and this year's record, now hovering one game below .500 has been hard on the squad. "I'm just not used to losing," Ben Tuckerman once said.

Ed Athey, the team's coach, commented that, "this team has just as much potential as last year's squad. It's just that we have a much tougher schedule and we haven't had the luck we had in last year's games."

Another frustration for the team has been empty stands. People haven't come and publicity has been minimal. One player said, "It seems that we've been forgotten. Student enthusiam is at an all time low."

The game tomorrow will probably be one of the toughest games the Athey men have played all season. In an early pre-season contest Bobby Kline, the Terror's goalie, won a 2-1 decision. Athey is planning to move Ken Maher to half-back. This will probably allow Athey to take advantage of Maher's speed and play-making ability to spring the front line open on the wings.

The team will have to press throughout the game. They cannot afford to make any mistakes, like the ones that allowed Johns Hopkins to tie and win the game last week. As Roger Vaughn said, "Sometimes you gotta get mean, dog mean. We have to play to win."

Students React to Rape

by VIRGINIA KURAPKA
Editor-in-Chief

Dorm doors continue to be locked at 6:00, following the rape which occurred on campus two weeks ago. There does seem to be some concern, however, that security in general has relaxed.

"I'm really concerned because I think people have forgotten about it already," said SGA President Jay Young. "It's blown over quickly."

Some feel that the security force itself needs to be increased. "I feel sorry that the incident took place; it's a blatant example of the security problem which exists at this school," said Jani Gabriel. "Three security guards making occasional rounds just isn't good enough." Said Kathy Waye, "I think they definitely need to beef up security, and people should continue to be aware of security."

Suggestions were made for a resolution at the last SGA meeting, but, "nothing specific came up," said Young. "The need for awareness on the part of the students seems also to be a concern." We could have the National Guard and the Marines here, and if people open windows and prop doors, it wouldn't do any good."

Academic Housing in the Hill Dorms—Pros and Cons

by VIRGINIA KURAPKA
Editor-in-Chief

Opinion over academic interest group housing in the Hill Dorms is divided. There is little argument that the academic atmosphere on campus outside the classroom needs to be enhanced, and that housing groups with a common academic interest together is a good way to start. The specific proposal, however, to place those groves in the Hill Dorms when they are renovated is not as readily acceptable to some people.

"The problem with the specific proposal is that I don't think this is the way to do it, and it will have a negative effect because it is potentially divisive," said Geoff Garinther, Vice President of the SGA. "Academics has always got to be the top priority. But the effect of putting academic interest groups in the Hill Dorms to all other areas would be so detrimental, it would offset the benefits."

Dr. Daniel Primo, Associate Professor of History and Political Science, said, "We're presented with the opportunity to make a fundamental and crucial decision in terms of influencing the character of the environment. The Hill Dorms complex is the nerve center of the campus in its physical location and I'd like to see it converted into a more academically oriented area as opposed to basically a center of social functions. Said Lee Ann Chearneyi, "We need proper facilities. The Hill Dorms are at the center where everything's happening. It's the key location."

Other opinions expressed have been that since the campus is small, there is no center, and that academic housing would be as effective elsewhere, whereas fraternity housing may not be, said Frank Dirks, "To displace any group which has resided in an area for a long time does something to effect it (the group). A college is such a transient community it's hard to tell until you look at the long term effects of such a move."

Untenured Faculty To Use Evaluation Forms

by WILLIAM MORTIMER
Assistant Editor

The Committee on Appointment and Tenure has recently passed a measure by which only untenured professors will be required to have students fill out evaluation forms at the end of the semesters.

The evaluation form, a multiple choice format which students are asked to fill out, is used to evaluate the professor and his abilities from the student's point of view. According to Dean of the College Garry Clarke, "every year we discuss the forms and the use of them."

The decision of the Committee was based on literature written about the forms. Such literature "suggests that you need not use a form" for all faculty members, said Clarke. He added that "some semesters we make it mandatory, others, optional. We always use the forms for untenured faculty as they are on a sort of probation." After discussing the possibilities, Clarke said the Committee "decided to do it this way."

Forms for second-year faculty members "will be administered on either Friday, November 21, Monday, November 24, or Tuesday the 25th" Clarke said. The forms for the rest of the faculty will be used "anytime after December 1, at the descretion of the faculty," said Clarke. The reason that second year faculty members will be evaluated by students earlier is that "the second year contracts will be reviewed on December 15" said Clarke.

"The benefits of something like this are always questionable," Clarke said. Literature on the matter says that students do have a reaction to the manner in which a professor teaches. "But they (the students) cannot evaluate in a professional way," added Clarke. He said, however, that "the reactions of students are valuable", especially the written remarks which can be of great use to a professor.

Having the forms mandatory for only untenured professors is vital. "There would be a disservice to untenured faculty if we did not get various reactions," Clarke said, adding that help and feedback from varied sources is essential for the untenured professor.

The reaction to this measure on the part of the untenured faculty members is one of understanding. "I think evaluations are a good thing, they are important" said Dr. George Spillich of the Psychology department. He added that "speaking as a psychologist, it may be that those who are most interested in their teaching would always be interested in some sort of an evaluation, whether formal or informal, by the Dean or on their own."

Dr. Thomas Cousineau of the English department said that "I don't approve of the format of the questioniare which is presented to the students." The purpose of the evaluation, he said "is to help the teacher improve his methods of teaching." In that respect, he added, "I don't find the forms helpful." Because of the format of the multiple choice questionaire, Cousineau said that all that is represented is "a quantitative summary." He added that "verbal comments are more valuable than quantitative results." Cousineau said that the weaknesses of the present form "could be corrected" if students would take the time to "write a thoughtful paragraph and in that way overcome the limitations of a multiple-choice format." Cousineau concluded that "the value of the questionaire, or the aim of it, should be to improve teaching."

Duane Marshall, Kappa Alpha President of Washington College, is now at home in Cambridge, Maryland following treatment of an eye unjury at the Delaware Memorial Hospital, Wilmington.

He returned home Friday, November 7, but visits specialists at The Johns Hopkins Hospital in Baltimore. He is recovering either well and is expected to be able to return to the College after Thanksgiving.

McLain in Hospital

by VIRGINIA KURAPKA
Editor-in-Chief

President of the College Joseph Mclain is in satisfactory condition in the Kent and Queen's Hospital following intestinal surgery last week.

After tests indicated the need for surgery, rather than delay the operation, Mclain decided to have it while he was in the hospital. The surgeon has not indicated how long he must remain in the hospital, nor how long a recuperative period he will need. "The surgery went according to plan and was successful," said Vice President for finance Gene Hessey. "He came through in fine shape and is doing well."

Dean of the College Garry Clarke is taking over the President's responsibilities while he is absent, in accordance with the by-laws of the school.

editorial

The Elm story, and the editorial, about the rape appeared just one week ago. The rape itself happened not two weeks ago. Already people are complaining about the hassle of having dorms locked at 6:00. Just how forgetful, and selfish can we become?

Part of the reason this crime was publicized was to make people more aware of the need to be cautious. And yet, barely two weeks later, we've chosen to let bygones be bygones. It's not the responsibility of the administration to coddle us. If we're unwilling to help provide for our own safety, we can't expect the administration, no matter how many steps it takes, no matter how much money it spends, to ensure the security at this campus.

No one is promoting hysteria. But neither can anyone accept complacency. What is needed is some common sense. If an "undesirable" could enter a dormitory, seemingly without trouble, how much easier is it for one to roam around outside the dorms. All the spotlights and security patrols in the world can't prevent this. We're going to have to start watching out for ourselves and for one another. We're going to have to stop complaining about the small sacrifices that this responsibility demands.

The American Arts Trio with William Skidmore, cello, Herman Godes, piano, and Donald Pertnoy, violin, will perform for the Concert Series in Tawes Theater on Tuesday, December 2 at 8:30 p.m.

Committee Gathers Data on Attrition

by JEFF ALDERSON

"When we lose one student, that's too many," stated Mickey DiMaggio, Director of Admissions. "We have to find out if we need new programs or facilities and why are our students are leaving." This is the main purpose of the attrition committee, informally named the Student Retention Committee.

The Student Retention Committee was formed last spring when President Joseph McLain asked for a study of retention and attrition at Washington College. The committee consists of students, faculty, and administration. "We met at the end of last spring," said Dean of the College Garry Clarke, chairman of the committee. "We discussed the way to proceed, and decided to do a formal study of our students and the kinds of factors that might affect their attrition."

There have been 30,000 pieces of data collected so far for this study. According to Clarke, this includes information on every student enrolled in the school in the past five years. Where that student went to high school, his S.A.T. scores, activities involved in while in high school, G.P.A., board scores, and in some cases, his parents' occupations have also been noted. The study also contains information on the student's prospective major, how long he attended the college, his advisor, and activities participated in.

The information is being coded by Mrs. Patsy Will, in the Business Office. "Each name has essentially been turned into a number and now everything is in the process of being coded, then it will be put into the computer," said Clarke. Gathering the information has been a tedious process since it all had to be collected by hand for 1245 people. "We hope that the results will give us much needed information. When the results are out, the committee can get together to study the information," said Clarke.

"It is very important that we, as an institution, find out why students leave or remain," stated Associate Dean Ed Maxcy, a member of the committee. "We met to decide what information would be relevant and what is most readily available." Continued Maxcy, "We can't do much more until Dr. Cades is finished. Once we have the information, we'll have to decide, as a committee, where to go."

Dr. Steven Cades, Associate Professor of Sociology, is not a member of the attrition committee but is serving as a technical consultant since he has worked with the kind of material the committee is studying.

The tests being run on the material will, hopefully, determine "what kinds of characteristics can be associated with leaving Washington College before graduation," stated Cades, "Is it determined by low or high grade point averages or involvement in student groups? Do fraternities, athletics, or activities like the Elm staff make college more enjoyable? There are a lot of theories. We hope that this information will allow us to replace these theories with some evidence."

All of the data collected is being coded for processing on the Prime 550 computer. A social science package, Statistical Package for Social Sciences has been added to the computer. "This is a way of describing a set of data so that one can request almost an unlimited variety of statistical tests," Cades commented. With this package, "someone else has done the Fortran work."

There are a number of people interested in S.P.S.S. For any student interested, Cades added, "S.P.S.S. is alive and well for use. I am available for help for anyone interested."

Traditional Thanksgiving Meal—No Bird

by ANYA LIPNICK

Wednesday, November 19 marks the fourth year of the traditional Washington College Thanksgiving meal.

"The program was first initiated by the students themselves," remarked Mr. Dave Knowles, head of the Food Service. This year Knowles has a co-operator, Mark Simpson, SGA food chairman. "More students are becoming involved now. What used to be run by the staff is slowly being taken over by the students," said Knowles. He thinks that is wonderful: the students helping creates a more relaxed atmosphere.

This meal, like all others, is open to the public, and tends to attract more non-student participants than regular meals.

Reservations for four or eight are taken with the option of "bird or no bird." People who give up their turkey have to show up for dinner in order for their bird to be given away. "This makes it more of a sacrifice." says Knowles. So people who sign up for "no bird" and then don't come to dinner defeat the whole purpose, because their birds are not given away.

On the average five hundred people are served, and about one hundred and fifty turkeys are given away. These turkeys go to the social center downtown. The center chooses the people who will receive the turkeys.

Knowles, with the help of his staff and the students, creates a special dinner that benefits both the college and the needy in the surrounding area.

Question: Do you think academic special groups should be housed in the Hill Dorms?

Cat Carrier—
NO. Because putting Academic special interest groups would lead to the demise of the Fraternities. Both groups could be satisfied by placing the ASIG in housing such as Talbot, Caroline, etc. This way both the fraternities and the ASIGs could be satisfied. I see this as a compromise and the best of both worlds.

Sarah Smith—
NO WAY!!!

Dan Shananan—
NO. I think the Fraternities should remain in the Hill Dorms. They've been there quite a long time and they should be allowed to return if they wish to.

Fannie Hobba—
NO. The fraternities lived there when they were in bad shape so they should get to use them after they've been fixed up. Also, the fraternities need places to hold special activities.

Leslie Shaw—
I think the writer's union and other special interest/artistic groups would benifit greatly by living in the Hill Dorms.

Karen Perkinson—
NO. The fraternities are a very important social part of campus life. Breaking the tradition of where they live, is a step towards the possible extinction of fraternities all together. Let the ASIGs live where the fraternities are this year and put the frats back where they belong!

Model of Original College Building to be Built

by WENDY MURPHY
News Editor

"Many students here don't feel the pride of attending a venerable institution, and one reason for this is because the first building is gone. It is only a phantom," said Dr. Robert Janson-LaPalme, Associate Professor of Art, who hopes to discover the exact structure of the building and have a model of it constructed.

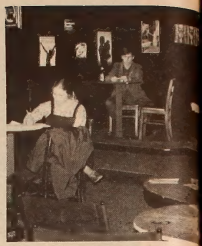
He added, "By having a model of the first Washington College building built, I want to provide a perpetual reminder of the size, scale, and aesthetic quality of the college edifice which has been lost to the contemporary college community. Our origins were nationally significant in the era of the 1780's, but the modern public doesn't seem to be aware of this."

The original College building was demolished in 1827 when a fire, which began in the center, quickly spread to the roof and engulfed the entire building. The bricks from it, over one half million, were sold for a small sum to townspeople. Janson-LaPalme said, "Any documentation of what the college was like are hard to come by. Because of fires, we have lost two libraries and have, therefore, had horrible luck in finding anything about the early College." The first building was destroyed before photography was invented and it has been impossible to find even a sketch of it.

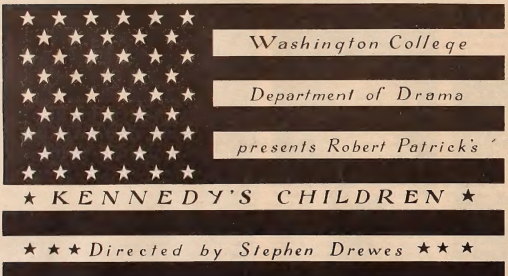
The only rendering known to exist was printed in a booklet written by William Smith, the first President of Washington College. A folding plate in the book, entitled "The first engraving of a Maryland Historical Landmark," showed the building as Smith and the Board of Visitors and Governors had decided to have it built. There is no evidence, however, that the building matched the sketch exactly. One problem with the sketch is that it only shows the front of the building. It was sectioned into three points and the basic dimensions of each part are known. Another problem is that the middle section was longer than the other two and it is not known if the middle projected more toward the front or rear. JansonLa Palme said, "The only way we can find out is to look for the foundation."

He has had several archeologists look at the area around Middle Hall, where the original building is believed to have been built. Those consulted include Chandlee Forman, a leading histoian of Maryland architecture who excavated St. Mary's City, and Milner Associationes, a professional firm from West Chester, Pennsylvania. He said, "It isthought to be worth the effort but, of course, no one can be sure. When the archeologists were touring the ground aroung Middle Hall, some pieces of pottery which were clearly 19th Century were found only one half inch under the soil."

Janson-La Palme added that "good archealogy, is done by hand and is therefore expensive." The College has been given estimates, but, in order to save on expenses, it has been thought that students might be interested in volunteering a few hours a week towork on the project. The archeologists hired would be living and working with these student volunteers. If the project is fully funded, it would be started this spring.



The idea has been approved by the full Bicentennial Steering Committee and allocations have been made. According to Janson-La Palme, though, only about forty percent of the estimated cost has been raised. A tentative plan of how the archeological dig will be carried out is to dig a trench behind Middle Hall and to work toward the Hill. Janson-LaPalme said, "It won't be a full excavation, but we expect to find artifacts which will tell us about the College's History." At a meeting of the Steering Committee last year, one student suggested that if a section of the building is found it should be exposed by landscaping. If all is approved and the necessary information emerges, a leading professional builder from Washington D.C. will construct a model of the original building.



Janson-LaPalme said, "I consider it a well designed building as compared with several other 18th Century buildings." He teaches a course entitled "Arts in America" in which he gives students ideas of what buildings looked like during that time preiod. He said, "I have always used buildings at William and Mary, and Harvard as example, but felt frustrated that I could never really present Washington College's buildings accurately. Over the years it has just been something that's been on my mind. I have wanted more visible evidence of what the College looked like."

marijuana, the GI says, "Thought the Vietcong turned them on." Mark ceases to speak as Wanda describes the chaotic situation in New York City on the day of Kennedy's assassination. "Every bell in New York started ringing. We knew that he was dead." Carla has now walked up to the bar and with a martini in hand, says, "I'm not interested in the sixties." The five characters continue their discourse in intertwining monologues as Rona gives the chronology of events.

Each of the five characters is symbolic of a distinct level of society perceived in the sixties. Wanda, the schoolteacher, is the symbol of the conservative side of the American society.

She pushes for high standing morals, and believes that degradation of these would have not occured if Kennedy had not been assassinated. Wanda traces the life of the Kennedy family after John F.'s assassination— the strain put on his wife to lead a life as a sex symbol, and a grieving widow, the publicity given to the Kennedy's favorite play, Camelot. For Wanda, Camelot is what American should be—perfect i n all cultural aspects. Sparger, is a symbol of the gay counterculture. The homosexual wants a change in the traditional American living, and he tries various thing to accomplish this 'goal'. He talks about his experience as a transvestite at one point in the play, and describes an episode in which he was badly beaten by some soldiers who had picked him up while he was hitchhiking. It is a very gruesome description, as are several others that are related to the audience by the characters during the course of the play.

Rona, the symbol of the hippie generation, discusses her experiences as a prostetute and a drug baby. The sixties were experimental years for her, and she enjoyed these times, though she was beaten by the police during the protests, and rejected by her parents after they discovered her participating in the protests and drug parties in California. During one of her monologues, she talks about the cult counterculture, and the assassination of Martin Luther King in 1967. Her conclusions—"That's how you work within the system." Rona feels a generation gap, and believes that the sixties were benevolent times in comparison with the early seventies.

Mark, the Vietnam GI, is a pacifist made to fight, and his story is the result of the change he undergoes. He doesn't understand the meaning behind war, the idea of having to take sides when fighting, and having to kill the enemy. Mark even goes so far as to say in the letter to his mother that he killed his friend Chick because Chick took sides and killed a Vietcong who was attempting to kill Mark.

The GI informs the audience at the end of the play that he is going to a correctional institution.

Carla is the symbol of the sex object in American Society. She was a faithful follower of Marilyn Monroe, and even went so far as to try to make herself look like the sex queen. Her goal is to becom.e a sex goddess, and she tries everything to reach it. She is a lady of the streets. This is the only affection that she can obtain. Her monologue at the end of the play is very touching. In a nonchalant tone of voice, Carla says, "I'm twenty six today. I just took seventy four sleeping pills and came in here to wash them down." Carla is unconscious during the remaining few minutes of the play. The bartender walks around the bar turning on the liquor display lights, and punches some buttons for a selection on the juke box. It is quiet in the bar until Don McLean's "American Pie" is heard. The lyrics are as poignant and pertinent to the play as they are to the sixties.

Three of the roles in "Kennedy's Children" are played by newcomers to the Washington College stage. They are Sophomore Todd Crosby, and freshmen Kate Krauss and Linda Medina. The students performances are most worthy of recognition, their growth in future roles is a refreshing prospect. Sally McKenzie is as exciting as ever in the variety of facets she presents in her character. Bill Mortimer has made leaps since his first stage appearance last year, and at this rate could develop into a truly fine actor.

"Kennedy's Children" leaves the audience in a melancholy, contemplative mood. It hits right at home as the audience recalls its life in the sixties, whether they were children, as the students are, or adults. American society has changed to a remarkable degree since the sixties, and the play may leave some of the audience wishing they could have shared in the vitality which characterized much of that decade.

Directed by Edouard Molinaro with Ugo Tognazzi and Michel Serrault. One of the most phenomenal film successes in history, this vrilliant comedy is on its way to becoming the largest grossing foreign film ever made. La Cage Aux Folles is the name of a transvestite nightclub run by a pair of aging homosexuals, one of whom has a son. The son, who was raised by this unorthodox couple, is eager to marry the daughter of the Chief of the Department of Morals, who is not likely to approve of his new in-laws. Eager to help the young lovers, the boy's "parents," make a valiant attempt to alter their outrageous lifestyle by trying to appear "normal" and "respectable." The results are unforgetably comic, but beneath the comedy is a touching and sensitive story. In French with English subtitles.

Controversy over the Menace of the Moral Majority

by WILLIAM MORTIMER
Assistant Editor

In what seems to be a growing issue, a member of the Moral Majority in Maryland called Dr. Peter Tapke, faculty advisor to the William James Forum, to complain about Thursday evening's lecture on "The Menace of the Moral Majority."

"In recent months the Morale Majority issue has gotten to be very controversial" said Tapke. The William James Forum invited Richard G. Puckett, executive director of Americans United for the Separation of Church and State. Tapke said that he "didn't know what points" Puckett would make at Thursday evenings lecture when interviewed.

"The talk was listed six weeks ago in the school calendar" Tapke Said. "Somehow the Maryland office of the Moral Majority found out about it." He said he had "no idea how they found out."

Approximately ten days ago, Tapke "had a phone call from a Jim Wright, an executive with the Maryland branch of the Moral Majority." Wright, Tapke said, "did not like the title ...he suggested it looked like the college or the forum was trying to smear the Moral Majority."

Wright also told Tapke that "they would be sending observers to the meeting and that they were concerned that no falsehood or slander be indulged in. "Tapke then formally invited him to both the reception prior to the forum and to the forum itself.

The Moral Majority issue is not being represented only by the opposition, however. Tapke has invited the Reverend Jerry Falwell, founder and president of the Moral Majority, to speak at a second lecture. Falwell was invited "to present his viewpoints of the Moral Majority." Tapke said that he assured both Mr. Wright and Reverend Falwell that "neither the Forum or the College has taken a formal view on the issue." As of yet, Falwell has not responded.

"The aim of the forum is unquestionably sound" Tapke said. "When you realize that an issue is highly controversial and subject to response," he added, "you would want to present both sides."

Puckett Lectures to Receptive Audience

by CHRISTY HOLT

Thursday evening Reverend Richard G. Puckett, national Executive Director of American United for Separation of Church and State, spoke to a full house in Hynson Lounge. Jay Young, SGA president, introduced Reverend Puckett and described some of his achievements, which include a bachelor's degree from Western Kentucky University, and a bachelor of divinity from the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary. Rev. Puckett has also been a leader in theological education, press relations, and numerous Southern Baptist Conventions. His topic for the evening was "The Menace of the Moral Majority."

Puckett opened his talk by saying he was "grateful to be a part of such an exciting era in American history," and that "now is a wonderful time to be alive." He descibed himself as an optimistic, realistic, "moderate", Baptist. He considers himself a Born-Again Christian, and stressed that he was a "bible-believer", preaches the gospel, and believes that "changed individuals should change society."

Puckett gave a short summary of Reverend Jerry Falwell's rise to leadership of the Moral Majority. He pointed out that Falwell's father was an atheist, and that Falwell came upon faith when he was 18 years old and soon after began attending Baptist Bible College. Falwell has no formal theological training, just four years of college and "that's it", Puckett pointed out. He also pointed out that Moral Majority is not Falwell's church, but an organization separate from it which was founded in 1979, and that before that time Falwell's activities had been rooted in the church.

Falwell, according to Puckett, has many methods for generating support. He mentioned several, including effective use of the media, computerized "personal" letters to possible supporters, "slick" publications, and the ability to mix religion and patriotism well. Puckett also pointed out that Moral Majority employs a "non-endorsement technique" because their tax status does not allow them to officially endorse candidates. Instead of endorsing their choice for e, they put his opponent on their "hit list" in hopes of helping their candidate by ruining his opponent. This technique, siad Puckett, is "very effective."

Moral majority, says Puckett, "blurrs the lines between public morals and religious morals." These, he contends, are two different kinds of judgments and to try to make them seem to be one is wrong. He admits that there must be public morality, but says that it must be found "through the public forum where all postions can be heard." Puckett also contends that a "Christian position" cannot be referred to because there is not just one, but many different positions taken by Christians in moral issues.

Puckett has received quite a bit of "hate-mail" supporters of Moral Majority in the past few weeks, and this he said shows the hostility of the movement which is one of its flaws. He asked "where is the love" in the Moral Majority movement, and added "it is something to be zealous—something else to be so obsessed with your position that you give nothing but hate."

One of Puckett's biggest objections to Moral Majority is that they seem to want government to control morality. The explained that "genuine morality cannot be legislated" because authentic morality cannot be imposed externally, but can only come from within the individual. Puckett recognized that this "morality from within" is not always a morality in step with the Judeo-Christian tradition, and therefore legislating Christian morality for the entire country would not work. He is strongly opposed to Moral Majority's use of the power-block in an attempt to legislate morals and said, "anytime some of us impose on all of us their values, it is grossly unfair to the whole community." This statement was greeted by an enthusiastic response from the audience.

Puckett's well-prepared and smooth arguments were received well by the crowd. During the question-and-answer period which followed the was asked to clarify and expand some of the points in his lecture, but no clear advocate of Moral Majority raised ady objections. At the end of his talk the audience gave Puckett a warm and vigorous round of applause.

Tenth Annual Foreign Language Poetry Reading

by DR. COLIN DICKSON

The Odyssey. Carmina Burana. Fables. Beowulf. Inferno. Camoens. Goethe. Alphinaire. Unamuno. What do these works and authors have in common? Over the last decade, students have had the opportunity to hear selections form them recited in the original at the annual Foreign Language Poetry Reading. They have heard how the "Nun's Priest's Tale" actually sounded, what a Renaissance Frenchman said to win his lady's love, and have listened to Dante's lament over the fate of Paolo and Francesca.

This year's reading, marking the tenth anniversary of the event, will be given in the Tawes Studio Theater at 8:00 p.m. on Monday, November 24. Emphasizing the rhythms and sounds of poetry rather that exact meanings, more on the Dionysian than the Apolinian. Eight foreign languages will be represented, and there will be a guest appearance by Professor Robert Day.

The Department of Foreign Languages cordially invites all interested members of the college community to sample and savor this year's multi-cultural poetic smorgasbord.

In keeping with the Dionysian spirit of the occasion, wine will be served.

The Season in Perspective

by HARRY MCENROE
SPORTS EDITOR

The Washington College Soccer team completed its season with a frustrating 3-6 setback to Western Maryland in the opening round of the Maryland State Tournament. This loss left the Shoremen with a 6-8-1 season record.

This season has to be considered disappointing in comparison with last year's impressive 11-5-2 mark. Injuries to key players plagued the Shoremen throughout the season. Among the players who were out of action for varying lengths of time were seniors John Lonnquest and Curt Nass, juniors Tommy Vach and V.J. Filliben, sophomore Mark Mullican, and freshman Ron Lauricella.

The Shoremen began the year with a string of victories over Lebanon Valley, York, and Upsala, jumping off to a 3-0 record. However, they quickly lost their stride as they dropped five straight. Three of these setbacks were at the hands of Division I powerhouses; William and Mary, West Virginia and Navy. Following these games, in which the boosters played rather well, the team dropped its first two orucial conference games to Swarthmore and Ursinus. From that point on, the Shoremen played at the .500 level, splitting six contests while tying Widener, a particularly frustrating game in which the boulers vastly out-shot their conference rivals but failed to break the score deadlock.

The defense, led by senior fullbacks John Lonnquest, Ben Tuckerman and Dave Bate, along with Chris Keifer in the goal, made the opposition fight for every score. On the other hand, the major problem with the Shore squad this year was their failure to score goals. This inability to tally goals consistently is reflected by the fact that in the five games decided by one goal, the Shoremen lost four.

The soccer team scoring was led by freshman forward Rob Gottfried who had seven goals and two assists. Close behind him were sophomore Mark Mullican with four goals and three assists, and V.J. Filliben, who tallied five goals and an assist. Defender John Lonnquest, who took penalty shots for the squad, scored three goals, while senior striker Ken Maher tallied two goals along with a pair of assists. Halfbacks Curt Nass and Bill Bounds shared leadership in assists with four each.

The loss of seniors Ben Tuckerman, Chris Keifer, Curt Nass, John Lonnquest, Dave Bate, and Ken Maher will certainly cloud next year's soccer picture, but hopefully the Shoremen will return to their winning ways.

Finnegan Looks Ahead to Season

by TOM TWOMEY

The Washington College basketball team kicks off its 1980-1981 campaign this Friday at the North Carolina Wesleyan Tournament, and Head Coach Tom Finnegan is optimistic. Although the team finished at 10-11 last season, an excellent group of freshmen recruits and the return of the entire 79-80 starting team, save Rich Dwyer, point toward improvement this year.

While some may be quick to expect certain success, Finnegan is cautious. "We certainly have the potential to have a good, possibly great, season, but several things must be considered. If we play up to our potential, stay healthy and play team ball, things should come together." Finnegan points to two major keys to success, as far as this team goes; first, that the returning players help to bring the younger ones along and two, that the players perform as a unit, rather that a collection of individuals. "We have several excellent, consistent ballplayers," Coach Finnegan commented, "But we have no superstars, people who can totally dominate a game. The concepts of unselfishness and team play are essential.

The absence of a dominant player, or players, along with a relatively small team, means that the Shoremen will exploit several other assets. Fennegan feels the lack of height, which is felt mostly in the rebounding and defensive areas, can be offset by quickness and speed, overall shooting and ballhandling, and the use of a controlled fast-break offense. He also noted that the depth of talent on this year's squad is cause for optimism.

Imagimime to present program

News Bureau

Baltimore's Imagimime, David and Carol Geyer, will perform an evening of mime at the college on Tuesday, November 25 at 8 p.m. in Tawes Theatre. The performance has been arranged by the College Lecture Series through the support of the Robert Julian Emory Memorial Fund. The late

Mr. Emory of Newark, New Jersey, was born on Piney Grove Farm, Chestertown and attended Washington College.

Imagimime will present a new program to its Chestertown audience, one that involves traditional mime sketches in the first section, followed by a variety of futuristic mimes in the second half. Together, the two sections of the program will create an art form that is flowing and beautiful, as well as meaningful.

Based in Baltimore, the mime duo has performed all over the East Coast and in Puerto Rico. Imagimime has been invited to perform at the International Festival of Mime to be held at Washington D.C.'s American University in July, 1981.

The one and one-half hour performance will be preceded by a workshop in mime to be held in the Dance Studio of Cain Athletic Center from 1 to 2:30 p.m. The public is invited to both events free of charge.

Team depth should prove especially important, as the Shoremen must play their first ten games within a 22-day period. Commenting on the toughness of this year's schedule, Coach Finnegan said that in addition to the initial grind, the rivalries with conference opponents, and the inclusion of Division I and II teams makes for a "very competitive" campaign.

If the 1980-81 Shoremen have one dominant characteristic, it is youth. Of the twelve members of the squad, all but 3 are freshmen and sophomores. The three upperclassmen are senior Craig Langwost and juniors Joey Moye and Jim Corey. Sophomore team members this year include Dave Blackwell and Carl Fornoff. Joe Stallings, Vince Gasior, Mike Shwed, Tom Keefe, Wayne Spurrier, Scott Spurrier and Ted Russell are the freshmen on the team.

Another important factor in the success of WC's basketball program, Finnegan believes, is student and faculty support. "I believe that an athlete is a performer, and that the level of his performance will be uplifted by student and faculty participation. We enjoyed tremendous support from not only the students and faculty, but from the townspeople as well. We hope this continues." As proof of Finnegan's belief, it should be noted that over the last 2 seasons the Shoremen were 18-3 at home.

Finally, Coach Finnegan offered some insights about his hopes for this season and his general coaching philosophy. When asked to name his goal for the upcoming season, he remarked, "We have several goals, but our first priority right now is to win the first game. After that, we'll see how things go and hope everything falls into place."

When asked to comment on his feelings on coaching, he said, "It's basically a form of teaching, the fundamentals first then the complexities. We want basketball to be a learning experience throughout the entire season; our goal is to improve each day so that by the end of the season we'll have a sense of group achievement both on and off the court."

The first home game is Tuesday, November 25. The Junior Varsity plays at 6:00 with the varsity game to follow.

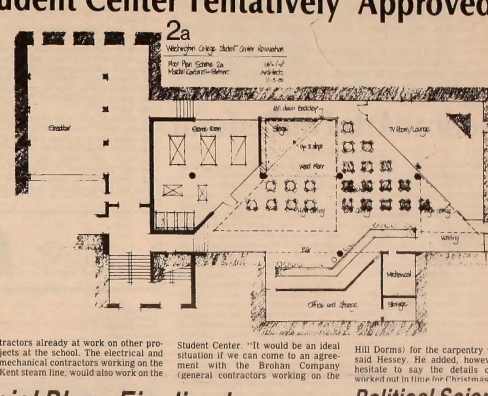
Plans for Student Center Tentatively Approved

by VIRGINIA KURAPKA
Editor-in-Chief



Plans for the proposed Student Activities Center have been tentatively approved.

On the basis of randomly-sought student opinion, Scheme 2A was chosen. Opinions were also solicited from the Deans, Ray Crooks, the Student Affairs Committee, and Vice President for Finance Gene Hessey. Hessey favored Scheme 1 since it, "seemed to have a greater seating area for stage activities than 2A." The architect for the project agrees with the Student's selection, and feels "He can persuade us that the seating won't be a problem," said Hessey.

Of the three plans drawn up for the project, the major differences were in the different locations of the bar, game room and television lounge. "There isn't a drastic departure in any of the schemes," said Hessey.

If all goes as to plan, the construction on the center should be begun during Christmas vacation. After approval of the plans is finalized, meeting with general, electric and mechanical contractors will work out the costs of construction, Said Hessey. "The architect doesn't feel there should be any problem with escalating costs." The project is expected to cost between $40,000 and $50,000.

The College is hoping to use the contractors already at work on other projects at the school. The electrical and mechanical contractors working on the Kent steam line, would also work on the Student Center. "It would be an ideal situation if we can come to an agreement with the Brohan Company (general contractors working on the Hill Dorms) for the carpentry work", said Hessey. He added, however, "I hesitate to say the details can be worked out in time for Christmas."

Bicentennial Plans Finalized

by WENDY MURPHY
News Editor

The Bicentennial Steering Committee has, after much thoughtful deliberation, begun to finalize plans for the 1981 Bicentennial of Washington College.

The Freedom Series, proposed by Dr. Peter Tapke on behalf of the Philosophy Department, would include two symposia and four lectures on the meaning of freedom from the 18th century to the future. The guest speakers would include Zbigniew Brzezinski and Andrew Young. The highest estimated cost for the series, including transportation and lodging for the speakers, was set at $8,000. The Bicentennial Executive Committee recommended $1000, as $7000 is being sought from outside sources.

Special Music Events, suggested by Kathy Mills for the Music Department, would consist of a seminar series on the topic of "Revolution in Music," a Victorian Ice Cream Social, a 19th century Salon Concert, a Band Concert, and the comissioning of new works by Washington College composers to celebrate "the renewing challenge." Mills presented the estimate of $3250, but the Committee felt that the events would only cost $2000 and decided to provide $1000.

Professor Sean O'Connor proposed a Liberal Arts Symposium which would include five sessions held over the course of three days. Each would consist of an address, a reaction, a group study and a concluding report. Two proposed speakers are Mortimer Adler and Theodore Hesburgh. The highest estimated cost submitted to the Executive Committee was $11,500. The Committee decided to provide $4500.

The Construction of a College Hall Model was proposed by Professor Janson-LaPalme. The original College Hall was one of the largest buildings in America when it was constructed in the late 18th century. The building was destroyed by fire in the 19th century and Janson-LaPalme wanted to have the model built and kept on permanent display at the College. He estimated the highest cost to be $5000. The Committee recommended a provision of $4000 for the construction.

An Eastern Shore Photographic Exhibition of the work of the internationally known photographer Constance Larrabee was proposed by Dean Maxcy. Larrabee is a Kent County resident and it is hoped that after the exhibit leaves the College it could then go on tour. He predicted the cost to be $5000 and the Committee decided to provide $2000.

To assist in the construction of a model of the original College Hall, Professor Janson-LaPalme suggested an archeological dig around Middle Hall in search of the foundation of the original building. This would include bringing professional archeologists to the campus to live and work with interested students in the exploration. JansonLaPalme submitted the highest estimated cost as $5000. The Executive Committee felt that this cost should be included with that of the model to be built. The finai decision was to provide $4000 for both projects.

A request for Hospitality for Chemists was made by the Department of Chemistry in conjunction with the visiting chemists speaking at the Two Hundred Years of Chemistry Series.

Political Science Hires Chaney

by WILLIAM MORTIMER
Assistant Editor

The Department of Political Science has hired Bradford Chaney to fill the position left vacant when Dr. Howard Silver resigned earlier this semester.

According to Dr. Tai Sung An, Chairman of the Department, Mr. Chaney has been hired "to be assistant professor of Political Science." Chaney will begin his career at the College beginning with the Spring Semester in January of 1981. "He will take over the courses in American Government previously taught by Dr. Siver" said An.

Chaney has received his Bachelor of the Arts degree from the University of California at Riverside and his Master of the Arts from the University of

Faculty Meeting Notes

The Following was discussed at the faculty meeting held on Monday, December 1. The meeting was presided over by Dean of the College Garry Clarke due to President Joseph McLains' recuperation from surgery.

• Dean Clarke reminded the faculty that according to the Advisors' Handbook, final examinations must be given to students at the time designated by the Registrar. Professors cannot administer final examinations on the last day of the class.

• Karen Smith noted that the Xerox machine in Central Services is often tied up by townspeople. College polices states that college, faculty and student work takes precedence over town work. Dr. Nate Smith suggested that mounting a large and visible sign stating that College work has priority over outside work might help the situation.

• A request was made by Dr. Steven Cades that the Admissions department report on the admissions campaign for next semester. There was some concern expressed because the Admissions department has not been represented at any faculty meeting this semester. Dean Clarke said that a report would be requested from Admissions to be presented at the February faculty meeting.

• Dr. Nancy Tatum said that during her Thursday night classes noise in the corridors of William Smith Hall has been a problem. She asked that people be more aware that classes are being held at night.

editorial

It looks like the Student Center is moving at a slow, unacceptably slow, pace. It is absolutely vital to the interests and well-being of the college that some tangible progress on it be made, and made soon.

Student morale has needed a boost for a long time. With the inactivity of long winter months coming, having some place for students to congregate and socialize will be more important than ever. The tentative finalization of plans to build the student center is a big step forward; and the administration should be commended for it. But something straight forward and relatively low-cost as this project ought already to be under way, off of the blueprint and into the basement of Hodson Hall. It's long overdue and student dissatisfaction is understandably growing.

We've come a long way this semester, and projects like the student center have not been allowed to stagnate. Delays, for the most part, have been unavoidable. But this project is too important to undergo another setback. We're all looking forward to seeing construction start soon.

AmericanArts Trio Perform

by JODEE BACCALA

This past Tuesday night at 8:30 p.m., the Concert Series presented The American Arts Trio. It turned out to be a memorable and enjoyable evening for all who attended.

The American Arts Trio began in 1955 in Washington D.C., headed by Dr. Donald Portney. The group has performed throughout the United States, Mexico, and West Germany. In 1959, the Trio established themselves at West Virginia University where they remain today as Artists in Residence.

The American Arts Trio consists of Dr. Donald Portnoy, violinist, Mr. William Skidmore, cellist, and Mr. Herman Godes, pianist. Dr. Portnoy is the founder of the American Arts Trio. He graduated from the Juliard School of Music in New York and the Peabody Conservatory of Music in Baltimore. Portnoy now is the conductor of the West Virginia University Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Skidmore is a graduate from the University of Illinois. He also performed with the Maryland Trio while serving on the University of Maryland faculty for ten years, and was a member of the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Godes studied at the Latvian State Music Academy. In Latvia, Mr. Godes survived four years in Nazi Concentration camps during World War II, and in 1950 immigrated to the United States. He toured through North America under Columbia Artists Management for a decade, and then became an artist in residence at West Virginia University.

The music of Wednesday evening consisted of 19th century Romantic and 20th century Contemporary selections The Trio opened with Perischetti's Serenade No. 3 Opus 17. When asked why they decided to open with Perischetti, they explained it was to soothe the audience, and relax themselves for the night's performance. And relaxed it was. Although Persichetti is a 20th century composer and uses numerous dissonances, it was a light sounding piece. The violin began the three movement work with a subtle theme, and the cello followed the violin repeating the theme in a counterpoint like melody. Mr. Skidmore also mentioned during the performance that Persichetti wrote this Serenade during his honeymoon.

The second selection was Beethoven's Trio No. 6 Opus 70 No. 2 in E flat major. Written in the late romantic period, the Trio is representative of Beethoven's stormier works, and is a very demanding piece on the artists. This work moves at an intensely fast pace. The American Arts Trio attacked this piece with musical fevor, and was an experience to watch. The work never ran away from them, and Mr. Godes's arpeggios were exceptionally clean and clear.

The third and last selection for this evening's performance was the Trio in D minor Opus 23 by Anton Arensky. Arensky was a contemporary of Tchaikowsky's although Arensky was never given as much recognition as Tchaikowsky did. During this piece, the American Arts Trio notably had fun with the music and the audience. Mr. Skidmore's facial expressions noticeably displayed this feeling. Dr. Portnoy and Dr. Skidmore used different techniques with their string instruments, such as plucking them, which is common for the 20th century style, and added a nice variety to the music, along with Mr. Godes's fast moving and clean cut scales.

The Trio finished the evening with an encore performance of the Adagio movement of Beethoven's Trio Opus 11. This piece held the audience in a relaxed and contented mood. The Adagio movement, using a folk melody as a theme flowed like a lullaby. A reception followed the performance.

Phillip Wingate, general Bicentennial Chairman said that he would pay for the expenses estimated at $500.

Foreign Language Plays, proposed by Professor Thomas Pabon on behalf of the Foreign Language Department would consist of professional companies visiting the College and presenting plays in French, Spanish, and German. The cost was estimated at $5000. The Executive Committee recommended that $1000 would be provided.

Professor Janson-LaPalme suggested the Restoration of Paintings of William Smith and George Washington that are owned by the College. The highest estimated cost was set at $1700. The Executive Committee sees the need for the restorations but does not feel that it is closely related to the Bicentennial and that they, therefore, should not pay for it.

A History of the Library proposed by Betty Wasson would consist of the writing and publication of an illustrated history of the Washington College Library from its beginning to the present. Because the College has lost two libraries due to fires, the committee decided to provide $500 of the $1000 estimated for the booklet.

The Committee has been allocated $25,000 and has distributed $14,000 of that to these ten projects, The remaining $11,000 will be used for other expenses such as mailings, dinners, cocktail parties, posters and transportation.

A Revolutionary War Soldier on Campus

by CHRISTY HOLT

Sophomore Bob Coale leads a dual existence. He is not only a student, but also a soldier with the First Maryland Regiment. The regiment is composed of 80 to 100 history buffs who are interested in the re-enactment of American history. They travel to state and federal parks giving shows of "living history."

Coale has been involved in re-enactments since 1975. He became interested in it through his older brother who did Civil War re-enactments during the Civil War centennial in the early 60's. Coale's major interest is in the Revolutionary War, but he also does some re-enacting of the Civil War and World War I.

An important part of re-enactment is authentic dress. Coale's uniforms are made from patterns taken from original uniforms, using the same materials that would have been used in the original uniforms. Professional seamstresses made most of his uniforms, but parts of them Coale made himself.

Coale's group demonstrates 18th and 19th century military tactics, re-enacts battles, and does exhibitions of 18th and 19th century military camp life. Every Fourth of July and Memorial Day the First Maryland Regiment performs "The History of the American Soldier." They are also planning an exhibition of the Battle of Cowpens in January 1981, and another of the Battle of Yorktown in October 1981.

The First Maryland Regiment has been featured on television. The entire regiment was in the PBS production of "Private Yankee Doodle," and they did a commercial for Continental Insurance. Ten of the members of the regiment, including Coale, were also in a PBS production of Mark Twain's "War Prayer," which will be aired in February.

Coale feels he has learned a great deal from re-enacting history. He says of his experiences: "Participating in living history has helped me appreciate what American soldiers of various periods went through."

Life in Her Majesty's Secret Service such as it is

by PETER TURCHI

Here's another installment from our foreign correspondant, Pete Turchi Mr. Turchi is currently on assignment in Oxford, England, at Manchester College. He's also a junior English major at W.C.

Foreign intrigue. Adventure. Beautiful women. Europe is the home of Italy's fastest cars, Switzerland's largest banks, and Ingrid Bergman. I've seen those spy movies, and although I haven't met any midgets with switchblades in the brims of their hats or giants with steel teeth, I have had plenty of adventures. Even crossing the street is a thrill, because there is always a speed-demon cyclist racing by, and I am always looking the wrong way. And trying to get money out of Lloyd's is on a par with trying to sneak a hostage out of Iran.

Actually, school started quietly enough. The first few days were very routine, and I was just settling in when a notice was posted for a meeting for anyone interested in playing on a Manchester College soccer team. I wasn't, so I didn't go, but I heard later that only three people showed up. That's understandable, because there are only seventeen males here. In all, that includes at least one over fifty years old.

The problem is that our principal, Reverend Bruce Fidelow, has already arranged a soccer match with St. Johns, despite the fact that we didn't have a team. Which is where I come in.

One morning I'm standing in front of my mailbox innocently enough, praying to Mr. Zip, when Réverend Bruce comes in and puts his arm around my shoulder. "Peter," he says, "You look like a strong young man....."

So I'm on the soccer team. I've never played soccer but Miles, the captain, assures me that it is easy to learn. He also tells me that practice is at Headington Park, about a mile away. He calls that "a good brisk jog." What he doesn't know is that for me a mile is more like a good brisk car ride. The next morning I stagger out of my room at eleven o'clock and start running.

The first block is not bad. I run past the rest and catch up with Miles. At the end of Longwall Street I realize that it is cold out. As we go down High Street I notice how hard the sidewalks is, and Bruce and Chris pass me. By the time we are halfway across Magdalen Bridge I am at the back of the pack, and they start to pull away. There is a busy traffic circle on the other side of the bridge, and just as I cross the bridge I see them go around a corner. A bus cuts me off, and when I get there they are gone.

I look to my left. The sign says London. The next street is Cowley Road, and I have been there and never seen a park. There are two more choices. I finally ask an old woman where the park is, but she just looks at me and keeps walking. There is something about a bearded American in blue sweat pants and a Baltimore Orioles T-shirt who pants and says "Oo oh air eddinton park?" that will make most English people stare and keep walking. I finally get an answer from a man at a bus stop and jog to the park. When I find the team they are sitting around a tree, waiting for me, and Miles is talking to them. He stops when he sees me.

"Alright," Miles says, "now that we're all here." General stares in my direction, but I ignore them. I didn't volunteer for this mission. "Let's start with a scrimmage, and I'll have a look at you. Would anyone like to have a go at goalkeeping?"

All eyes are still on me, and in a fit of enthusiasm I offer. "I'll try it," I say. Miles looks at everyone else. Finally he looks at me, then drops his eyes to the ground. "Right. Turch on goal." As I jog to the goal I gloat. No more running for me-I have a little square to stay in, a little net to protect. Miles blows the whistle and the other team comes downfield. I watch as my defense moves into position, and the attackers control the ball. They move to my left, but my defense moves with them. A pass goes across the field, and they are within shooting range. A black shoe nudges the ball, and suddenly a defender steps in front of me, someone grunts, and the hard leather ball smashes into my chin and past me, into the goal.

I try to be very nonchalant as I crawl into the goal to get the ball, but my jaw does not seem to be working quite right. I move it with my hands and distinctly hear something pop. Later I found out that while I had been trailblazing my way to the park Miles had described the duties of the different positions on the team, and he has concluded by saying that the goalie was the player most likely to leave the field on a stretcher. And he was right. Goalkeeping is great training if you're interested in joining the Air Force as a kamikaze pilot.

After practice I stayed behind with Miles while he explained the basic strategy of goalkeeping. He kicked some to me until one bounced off the side of the goal into my face, and something started to bleed. "Right," Miles said. "I think that's quite enough practice for today, actually." He jogged ahead and I walked back to school, pressing the sleeve of my shirt against my face from time to time to check the bleeding. Minor injury. The next few practices weren't as bad. I learned how to stop the ball without breaking any bones, and they learned to start without me.

My next problem was not how to do a respectable job of goalkeeping, but how to clean my uniform. Manchester College has, theoretically, a washer and two dryers. In truth, the washer is a large metal box with an unconnected piece of hose, and the dryers each old about three pairs of socks and a shirt. You can wash your clothes in the sink by hand, but that's not all. The tumble dryer works nicely, but it never actually dries anything. It just rotates your clothes, like some sort of revolving closet. The spin dryer works better, but it actually spins. You have to sit on it to keep it from jumping onto its side, and every afternoon you can walk into the Wedgewood and Bently kitchen and see someone riding the spin dryer across the laundry room. Demands for a saddle have brought no response from the administration.

There are alternatives, of course. A few faulty dryers never stopped James Bond. New College is across the street, and we are unofficially allowed to use their washing machines. They only have three machines, so we are allowed to use them whenever they are free, and as long as we don't get caught.

So one afternoon after soccer practice I came back to my room, shoved my last American box of Tide into my laundry bag, and climbed through my window onto Holywill Street, feeling a little like a guerrilla at Entebbe. From there I threw my bag over the wall across the street, scaled the wall, snuck past the Nazi porter, and crawled through the heat ducts into the laundry room.

The great advantage to the New College laundry room is that it is the hottest pick-up spot in Oxford, and this day I wasn't disappointed. When I arrived the room was empty except for a humming dryer, but I tossed my clothes into a washing machine and sat down to wait. Less than a minute later the dryer stopped and a girl, maybe not quite one of Bond's women, but close enough, came in and started to remove the clothes. I was admiring her assets and deciding whether or not I should dibulge my secret agent status when she took her clothes into the ironing room, near the stairs. I went back to my book.

A minute later I noticed something out of the corner of my eye. There, in the middle of the floor, was a pair of baby blue underwear. Now, the natural thing to do when someone drops underwear is to return it, of course. And if it had been a sock, or even a blouse, I would have taken it right in to her, but baby blue underwear. I had been reading Tom Jones, and my mind was racing. Could it be a modern version of the dropped hanky ploy? Too obvious.

I finally built up the nerve to stand, and I put my finger in the book and walked over and picked them up--and I felt it. A gold zipper running all the way around. What was I up against? This was getting harder and harder every minute. That's when I heard the footsteps. Someone was coming down the stairs, and there I was holding some strange girl's perverted panties. I quickly said the only thing I could think of-- I stepped out and tossed them into the ironing room, head high, then sat down and buried my nose in my book.

An English student came in and searched in his pocket for change while I read. He did and entire load of green socks, but there are some things you just don't question. A little while later a girl came in and started translating French on the bench next to me, but she locked harmless enough. When my clothes were dry I left, and on the way out I checked the other room. It was empty, so I have to assume Madame X got her underwear (probably in the face). Somehow I think James Bond would have handled it better.

This Week's Movie

Directed by Jean-Jacques Annaud with Patrick Dewaere and France Dougnac. This is a rousing comedy about a soccer player who gets even with a provincial French town and its bigoted residents. The New York Daily News calls it "A zesty satire; Annaud's direction is spirited; Dewaere is thoroughly engaging." In French with English subtitles.

Basketball Wins Spell Relief

by JIM GRAHAM
Photography Editor

How do you spell relief? Try two wins and a 3-3 record. That might be how coach Tom Finnegan might spell it after the Shoremen came away from Susquehanna's Crusader Classic with a sweep of its two games and a new plaque to put in the trophy case.

"Both games were great wins," said Finnegan. "When you come from behind as we did it's always very satisfying. The reason we won was that everyone contributed to the victory. Everyone performed when they had to, everybody gave us that little extra."

Joe Moye gave the Shoremen a win in the first game, against Trenton State, with a 17-footer with two seconds on the clock and the score tied at 69. Dave Blackwell came away with 24 points, in an awesome offense display and Tom Keefe, a freshman starting at the pivot spot, found his way to 15 points and a superlative effort under the boards and on defense.

The second game of the tournament was perhaps the "Finmen's" best of the season thus far. After finding themselves down at the half by ten, and depending heavily upon Jim Corey both offensively and defensively, to fill in for a foultroubled Moye the Shoremen came back and took charge of the game midway through the second half.

"It was the hustle that did it for us," said Finnegan. "When Mike (Shwed) followed a missed layup in a 3-on-1 situation it really got us going. His play probably typified the kind of hustle we had out there." It also gave the Shoremen the lead. Langwest and Dave Blackwell shut down their guard and Carl Fornoff came up with another defensive gem playing against Susquehanna's inside-post player.

Another thing that pleased Finnegan about the team's play was their consistency, both on offense and defense. "It was a real team effort."

Shore notes: Joe Moye and Craig Langwest were named to the All-Tournament team and Moye came away with the MVP award.... Carl Fornoff, who might not score a lot of points, may be the most underrated player on the team. His defensive play in the Post makes the Shoremen go.... Steve Siegrist tasted victory as JV head coach for the first time with his JV's debut win over Chesapeake 59-45. Next home game will be Monday when the JV's gwing into Russell gym. The Varsity follows on Tuesday with a game against Gallaudet. Ted Russell will be out for four to six weeks with a broken foot.... Wayne Spurrier was downed by brother Scott and missed the Susquehanna game.... Craig Langwost was 3rd in the Nation, in Division III in foul shooting percentage 88.8 percent according to the NCAA Basketball Guide, published annually

Cheerleaders Enthusiasm

by STEPHANIE PAUP

Jani Gabriel; Captain of the Washington College Cheerleaders finds cheerleading "a Very rewarding experience."

The Cheerleaders cheer for one major sport, Varsity Basketball. This is their third year since they had to disband due to lack of interest and the advent of inter-collegiate sports for, women at Washington College. The women interested for sports were able to play them instead of just cheering for them. Miss Penny Fall, the cheerleaders faculty advisor remembers that "About ten of the girls joined teams, and they did not have the time for both". Since their regrouping, interest has remained very high.

The Cheerleaders practice four nights a week for two hours a day. Miss Fall feels that "even though they got started a little late, the number of excellent and original cheers are fantastic." She also feels that "they enhance the atmosphere of the College."

This year's squad includes: Nanette Bouline, Andrea Colantti, Vicke Donnelly, Jani Gabriel (Captain), Beth Glascock, Lucie Highes, Lisa Laird, Julie Scott (Co-Captain), Sarah Smith, Sue Watts, Debbie Wilhelm, Gini White, Tammy Wolf (Adviser) and Lynda Webster (Manager).

He added that "next month he (Chaney) will have his Disertation Defense." and should, by the time he arrives at Washington College, be a doctor of Political Sciences, Chaney's dissertation topic is "Presidential Influences in Congress—the Ambivalence of Presidential Popularity."

"We invited three candidates from the thirty or forty applicants to the College for interviews," An said. The two other applicants turned down the offer, but Chaney has accepted.

"He has a very good educational background in American Government," An said. Chaney was also a teaching assistant at the University of Rochester.

An said that Chaney will "teach three courses including the Internship at the Maryland Assembly." The other two courses which he will teach will be an introductory course and a course about the American Congress.

Hodson Trust Grants College Largest Gift

by VIRGINIA KURAPKA
Editor-in-Chief

Washington College has received its largest gift, $678,000, from the Hodson Trust, a major benefactor of the school since 1936.

The gift, which was announced at last Saturday's meeting of the Board of Visitors and Governors and will be the subject of a press conference in Baltimore, is designated for three specific projects. $78,000 will be applied toward the cost of the Kent steam line. Further endowment for merit scholarships accounts for $300,000, and the remaining $300,000 is to be used for the renovation of the Hill Dorms.

The Hodson Trust was established in the will of Colonel Clarence Hodson, and benefits not only Washington College but also the Johns Hopkins University, Hood College, and St. John's College, all private institutions in Maryland. For the first time, a press conference will be held to announce the gifts to all four colleges. "The Hodson Trust is going to get some P.R. out of what they are doing and have done for these four institutions, and rightfully so," said President of the College Joseph McLain. The conference will be attended by the Governor of Maryland Harry Hughes and the Presidents of the four colleges.

The gift, although substantial, will provide none of the funds for the operating budget. "We have a commitment to the Trust not to rely on them for operating funds", said Vice President for Finance Gene Hessey.

Student Center Slowly Becoming Reality

by VIRGINIA KURAPKA
Editor-in-Chief

The Board of Visitors and Governors last Saturday approved plans for the proposed Student Center in the basement of Hodson Ha.ll.

Scheme 2A, as published in last week's Elm is that favored by both students and the architect, Carbonell. Vice President for Finance Gene Hessey is to meet with contractors, including several already on site at the college, to negociate the contracts. "It'll take a few days to gather cost information," said Hessey. "I'll push them as much as I can to get it done quickly." The importance of speed in starting and completing the project was emphasized at the board meeting. Chairman of the Board Louis Goldstein instructed Hessey to, "get on the ball" with the project.

The Board has allocated $50,000 for the renovation of the basement, but also indicated the flexibility of that figure. "Th Executive Committee was authorized to spend t.wo or three thousand either way", said Secretary to the Board Frederick Dumschott. "They're not being held to an absolute $50,000." The gift of $678,000 from the Hodson Trust, of which $78,000 is designated for the Kent steam line, has made it possible for money from the maintenance reserve fund originally destined for the steam line to be used for the Student Center.

Work on the Student Center may be able to be begun as early as next week, since most of the demolition will be done by the maintenance Department. No completion date was set, but the Board expressed a desire to see the project finished no later than the beginning of the second semester. Existing student publication offices in the basement will be relocated to the first floor of Caroline, in the room presently being used as a bike room. As far as the SGA is concerned, "We don't really need as office since there's no place on campus large enough to have meetings and use as an office. And we're certainly willing to give one up to get the Student Center", said SGA President Jay Young.

Budget Deficit Clarified

by VIRGINIA KURAPKA
Editor-in-chief

Although it was reported to the Board of Visitors and Governors at their meeting last Saturday that last year's budget ended in a $38,000 deficit, and a maximum deficit of $200,000 is projected for this year, it seems that such a deficit depends on whose books are studied.

According to the accountants' audit report, the school was in the red last year and will be this year. This deficit, however, appears because the money used to cover the difference between expenses and revenues in the operating budget comes from the accumulated reserves from prior years. "We had a choice to either adjust tuition costs to cover the shortfall, or to use the accumulated reserves from prior years", said Vice President for Finance Gene Hessey. Up until last year, the school operated undeniably in the black for eight years, and the accumulated surpluses from those years can now be used to cover the shortfall.

From the accountants' point of view, a transfer from prior year reserves constitutes a transfer out of a balance sheet account, which is not done. In the Business Office's books, such a transfer shows up within the operating budget and thus shows the college once again in the black.

The effect on tuition and salaries will come from the decreased enrollment this year on which next year's enrollment and operating budget will be based, and thus indirectly from the apparent deficit. Said Hessey, "The real problem would be if we were operating with no reserves. That's a mark of real financial difficulty. Fortunately, that's not the case here."

Dwyer, Graham Arrested

by VIRGINIA KURAPKA
Editor-in-Chief

Two students were arrested last week by the Chestertown Police, and charged with forgery and uttering, and daytime breaking and entering.

Richard Dwyer and William Graham allegedly forged a check of James Graham. Dwyer apparently tried to cash it using Graham's parents' car registration as identification at the People's Bank of Chestertown. "A call came almost simultaneously with one to the police from the branch manager of the People's Bank," said Dean of Students Maureen Kelley. "Before we did anything about it, Rich came in and told us it had happened."

It is alleged that Bill Graham had taken several checks from students' rooms, hoping to pay off a rather extensive debt. A pass key to Somerset had apparently been left to Dwyer and Graham by Mark Gildersleeve, who was expelled for academic reasons last year.

Both Dwyer and Graham were expelled last Friday, and will stand trial. At the moment, they have been released from jail on their own recognizance. Said Kelley, "I'd like to think they've learned a lesson from all this. It's a high price to pay for a stupid judgment."

Reagan Tentative for Graduation

"We have been in touch with Reagan's Public Relations firm and he is tentatively scheduled to deliver the address at commencement on May 16, 1982", said Kathy Myrick DeProspo, Director of Publications and Public Information.

She said the idea has been worked on for over a year. "At that time it was little more than a pipe dream but even that long ago the idea was presented to

The Board of Visitors and Governors discussed and acted on the following at their Saturday, December 6 meeting:

•The Board voted to nominate Bob Crane, class of '42 and chairman of the Biophysics and Chemistry departments and Rutgers University, and William Stafford, noted writer and poet, for honorary degrees.

•Maryland program tuition will be raised from $160 to $190 per course, and professors' salaries adjusted accordingly, in the first change since 1971.

One semester down, one semester to go. It's not time yet to sit back and sum up the year. Rather, it's time for reflection in mid-stream. And that's the most dangerous place to be--too far along to turn back, not far enough along to have our destination in sight.

Of the three major construction projects on the table at the beginning of the semester, only the Kent steam line has been completed, out of absolute necessity. Renovation has just begun on the Hill Dorms, and although the construction company is said to be on schedule, their ability to finish by August 1, even by September 1, is questionable.

The Student Center is not yet even begun, and this is the biggest potential beef we students have. It must be obvious to anyone who can compare conditions here with those at other, comparable colleges that a WC Student Center is no luxury. The school cannot expect to continue for long to compete with others like it when something as basic as a Student Center is missing from the campus. The Board of Visitors and Governors should be commended for their enthusiasm, and even impatience, about getting this project completed. Delay, however, is too often the rule here. In this case, provision has got to be made before construction begins for the possibility (the probability?) that construction will not be finished before the beginning of second semester. Think about that. No chapter rooms, no coffee house, no place to go, at least no place on campus. Will all the bands have to play in the cafeteria? Where will students gather? The Administration had better be able to answer these questions in January if, as we fear, the Student Center has not been completed.

This first half-year has also had its surprises. Unfortunately, they haven't been pleasant ones. A student raped, two students arrested for theft and forgery, a general increase in crime. It's become very clear first that security has to be increased, second that students will have to become more responsible for their own safety. The real world's finally arrived at Washington College. We're all going to have to grow up to deal with it.

So here we are, in mid-stream. See you next semester. Don't forget a paddle.

Commentary

by JEFF ALDERSON

The announcement came sometime around 11:30 p.m. "brace yourselve for the news! John Lennon was just shot and killed." The first reaction was one of disbelief. Of course this wasn't true. No one would do something like that. It's just a morbid joke. "He's really dead." The insistent tone was quickly causing a disturbing realization.

"Oh my God." was the first acknowledgement of acceptance. People were shouting the news down hallways. Students huddled around televisions and radios for more news.

"Police describe the suspect as a cold screwball." came the first report. No name of the assailant was given at first. "Crowds of people surround the spot where he was shot." The atmosphere was described as a "stunned silence."

Outside, people were wandering the campus in a daze. Students were comforting each other in their grief. The entire campus almost seemed to have a unifying sympathy.

There was a band in the coffee house when the news broke. "Everybody was going around saying, 'he's dead,' We were thinking they were just drunk."

Many messages were written on doors. Friends were telling friends the news hoping to be "the one to break it to her." The most touching note said, "-John Lennon is Dead!" to which was added, "Who cares?" which was answered, "Anyone who believes in love."

Lennon had just released an album "Double Fantasy" with his wife Yoko Ono. The single "Just Like Starting Over" was already in the top ten.

Now comes all of the commercialization. Artists will pay tribute to him in songs, but aren't most rock songs a tribute to Lennon and McCartney? They changed the style of rock music. Without their influence where would popular music be now?

For a time on Monday night, half of the campus ceased to live, choosing merely to exist on their own memories of a giant.

Academic Housing

I understand that in our on-going campus debate about the future use of the hill dorms it is alleged I have proposed that the Writers' Union occupy one of the buildings, and that the nine students now living in Richmond House live in grand splendor in, say, East Hall. That is not true.

What I have proposed to Mr. Cades, Student Affairs Committee is that they study the feasibility of creating a variety of academic housing for students, and that the buildings might be used, for example, as an International House, a Fine Arts House, a Schoiarship House, a Natural Science House, or other academic group housing based on student and faculty interest. I said that I would be glad to sponsor a Fine Arts House in much the same way that I now sponsor a Writers' House, but such a house would include students from all the Fine Arts, so that painters, printmakers, actors, composers, writers, and dancers might all have an opportunity to live together.

True, the writers who live in Richmond House have lost their home, and the academic program in which they participate is in jeopardy; no solution to that problem is in sight. But the debate over the use of the hill dorms for academic housing must have a broader scope than the argument of what to do with the student writers who live in Richmond House. There are important academic issues to be discussed this year, and the discussion must be among all members of our academic community, and it must not be cut short by straw-man tactics nor by predisposed views. What we need is a wide-ranging, open, factual discussion among all the students, teachers, and administrators of our campus, for only by that process can we decide what changes,if any, we might make to achieve the excellence our Third Century fund raising drive and our Bicentennial Celebrations mandate for us in the near future.

Admissions seek Update on Work

by JEFF ALDERSON

The admissions office of Washington College recently sent letters to W.C. alumni from 1974 to 1979. The graduates were asked to answer questions about their graduate work and careers on a self-addressed, stamped reply card.

Jody Dudderar, associate director of admissions, was very pleased with the response rate. The 380 responses were from 917 sent out, or 41 percent.

A brochure containing the results of the survey will be available to prospective students who want to know what recent graduates are doing. "We had plenty of information on graduates from ten to twenty years ago but not on the last five years." Dudderar said.

The main purpose of the survey is to show how a liberal arts education can be used. Present students will be able to see the broad range of occupational opportunities open to them with their education from W.C. Dudderar said, "This (the broad range) is something we already knew, but we wanted proof."

"When we started, it was just for recruiting purposes" she continued, she continues, "The alumni office is taking over from here. All the information will be turned over to them."

The information is arranged according to the department the student majored in a W.C. The number of graduates is listed as well as the number and percentage who responded to the questionnaire. Under each department is listed the careers and post graduate work of all past majors.

Of the different departments, Physics majors had the highest percentage of responses with 100 percent, while Drama majors had the lowest with 23 percent. Chemistry and Humanities majors had the highest rate of graduate school attendence among those applying with 80 percent each while Math had the lowest with 14 percent.

The information is currently being prepared for printing. Dudderar remarked, "Once the information is written up current students are welcome to a copy of it."

The ELM needs a driver to take copy to Dover, Delaware each Wednesday at 1:30 p.m. School car usually available, $5.00 per trip. Apply to ELM office by January 20, 1981, or see Virginia Kurapka or Bill Mortimer.

Administration Taking Control of Coffee House

by JEFF ALDERSON

For almost ten years the coffee house has been a student-run social center on campus. The past five years have not been profitable, but this year there has been a surprising increase in business resulting in a $3100 profit. Now, with the student center quickly becoming a reality, the administration is taking over the coffee house.

"This is the first year the place has turned a profit in five years. It took a lot of hard work and now it's like a slap in the face to have someone take it away with no more than a pat on the back and have someone say, 'good job. Thanks anyway'," stated Court Treuth, coffee house manager.

Treuth and co-manager Andrew Buckiee feel that the coffee house should remain a student-run organization. "The time for this place to be taken over is when you have a $10,000 debt not a $3100 profit. We've already paid half of the debt for last year," said Treuth. "I worked as a manager last year and it needed a drastic change," added Buckiee, "The students put a lot into it and now it's successful again. It's always been student-run and always should be."

The main question now is why take it away from people who are doing the job right. "It seems that the college has realized, after a good semester, how much money they can take in," said Buckiee. "No one wanted this place last year," added Treuth. "Now everyone wants it," continued Buckiee.

To the two managers the administration seems to have made up its mind, "whether students like it or not." The students involved had not been informed of the details of the entire operation until a meeting with the administration the Friday afternoon, after the Elm had gone to press.

"We heard rumors that there would be adult supervision. As the semester goes on, it has gone past mere supervision to total supervision where the cafeteria will be in charge," said one of the managers.

Jeff DeMoss, assistant food director, said, "If the food service did administer the operation, it would still be 90 percent student-run and only 10 percent supervision. There will be a committee with members from sudent affairs, the SGA and possibly the presidents of the classes to decide on rules and regulations."

DeMoss is hoping for the possibility of a work study for student workers. This could permit the establishment to be open from 10:00 a.m. to 12:00 midnight.

Still there is a question of why supervision is needed at all. DeMoss said, "The adminstration will be in charge of hiring and firing, ordering, and setting up rules and regulations."

Treuth feels that the students can handle these responsibilities. "The coffee house is being run properly now. Anyone is welcome to see the business sheets," he stated.

"Court and I made a change which turned out to be a successful change," remarked Buckiee. "The administration praises us, but that's not enough. We could have another good semester in the spring."

"If the adminstration takes over, I don't feel that there will be the same amount of cooperation from the students," said Treuth. "There won't be the same amount of enthusiasm," added Buckiee, "It'll be the same as walking into a Chestertown bar."

Buckiee also stated," We put a lot of unpaid hours in here. We're the highest paid students on campus, while we work." The managers are responsible for much more than just their duties during working hours. They are required to attend meetings and to order, as well as to follow up on late orders. "If you break it down," continued Buckiee, "we're the lowest paid job on campus."

Since the coffee house is making a profit now, the money is being used to pay off last year's debt. In the past, the profits have been used to provide scholarships to the school. "The money left over is used for repairs in the coffee house.

The managers are wondering what the adminstration will do with the profits. "Everyone's judging us on the past five years not the past ten. Now it seems like it's not for the students anymore, but the college," said one of the managers.

With the coffee house finally "profitable, student-run establishment, many students feel that it should remain this way. Treuth summed it up," Isn't it time for the administration to have a little confidence in the students?"

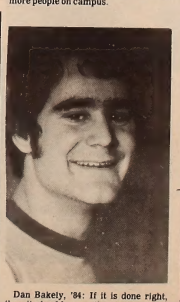
Student Center?

Question: What is your opinion of the new student center that is projected for construction over the Christmas break?

Photos and Reporting by Alex Hodge

Sally McAlpine, '83: I approve!



Donald Alt, '83: It's a good idea. Students need a place to get together and have fun. It will take longer (than the Christmas break) to get it done.

Jeanmarie Fegley, '84: It will keep more people on campus.

Jeanette Shafer, '83: It's pretty good. It's a nice place for students to get together.

Dan Bakely, '84: If it is done right, then it should serve the students adequately. I'll believe it when I see it.

the past three years the W.C. ball team has lost only four in the comfortable confines of Gymnasium, and have not lost Goose Classic game. Tonight's as well as tomorrow's will most be the tests for this year's team. ay prove to be the most com- group assembled for the fourth classic, which is sponsored by inists Club of Chestertown. Shoremen will have to get good rances from their inside men, ye, Tom Keefe, and Jim Corey, mbined with one of the better urts in the league should pro- e squad with a margin of victory. Langwost must come up with the play that earned him all-tourney both two years ago and at the Susquehanna tournament last week.

The past two weeks have seen the team play good consistent basketball, perhaps the best effort was in the first half of the run-away win against Gallaudet last Tuesday when the cagers jumped out to a 45-16 lead at half and never looked back.

If the team, and it will have to be a team display not just individual efforts, can put together a game that is consistent as the Gallaudet game and the first half at Widener (a 74-61 loss) they should be able to pull off a fourth straight goose championship. John Jay and Salisbury are both good clubs however, and considering the rivalry with Salisbury, the cagers have their work cut out for them.

Poet to Replace Day Next Semester

by WILLIAM MORTIMER
Assistant Editor

Elizabeth Spires has been hired to replace Mr. Robert Day, associate professor of Creative Writing, while he is writer in residence for the graduate Writer's Workshop at the University of Iowa during second semester.

"She is a graduate of Vassar and has done work in creative writing at the University of Iowa and Johns Hopkins," said Dr. Nancy Tatum, chairman of the English department. Spires holds her Bachelor of Arts from Vassar and her Master of Arts from Johns Hopkins. She has also worked as "a teaching assistant at several colleges," Tatum said.

Spires and another candidate, Cleopatra Mathias, were chosen by the English department to come to the campus and lead a sample student workshop. The two candidates were chosen from approximately fifty applicants. "We had a whole row of candidates but invited two," said Tatum, who added that "all of the members of the English department were willing to consider the two." After having narrowed the list down to the two candidates, the Committee on Appointments and Tenure approved them, and they were invited to visit the College.

"We thought she was an excellent poet and that she would be a good teacher for both the poets and the novelists" on campus, said Day. He added that Spires has "a good education and she is good in editing poetry. . .she has poetic sensibility." Tatum said that "there was a poem by Spires in the September 22nd issue of The New Yorker magazine." She added that Spires has "been published a good deal."

While Spires was on campus she led a sample writers' workshop to "see how the person works with students and to invite student reaction," said Tatum. Students and faculty reaction was then solicited informally. "We asked people to tell us what they thought of the candidates, then put student reviewtogether with faculty views, and reported them to the Dean," Tatum said.

While teaching at Washington College, Spires will live in Chestertown. She will be teaching one creative writing course and one special topics course which will probably deal with contemporary poetry. "Basically," Tatum said, "she will be working with the Writer's Union while Mr. Day is away." Both the editors of Broadside and the Washington College Review will be working with her on the publications.

"She was awfully interested in coming here," said Tatum, adding that "both poets who came were complimentary to the students and their work." When phoned by Tatum with the offer of the job, Spires was "very enthusiastic about coming to the college second semester and working with the students here."

One of the people who recommended Elizabeth Spires was noted poet W.D. Snodgrass.

Sophie Kerr plans for Bicentennial

by WILLIAM MORTIMER
Assistant Editor

The Sophie Kerr Committee, preparing for the upcoming Bicentennial year, has been discussing the possibility of sponsoring special literary events during the 1981-82 school year.

According to Dr. Nancy Tatum, chairman of the English department and the Sophie Kerr Committee, "we've been talking about plans to bring some extra special writers to the school; there are also plans for a literary festival, bringing different artists to the campus" during the Spring semester. Final decisions on the plans will not be made, however, until a meeting of the Committee next Tuesday. Mr. Robert Day, associate professor of Creative Writing who along with Mr. Bennett Lamond, also associate professor of English, proposed the plan said that "we'd hope to do in an extraordinary way what we've done—bring down the best writers." Some names mentioned as possibilities have been Walter Percy, William Stafford and Tennessee Williams.

The Committee has "been saving some money up to use for this," said Tatum, noting that it will be a fairly expensive affair. Tatum said that they will be applying for some grant money to bring the poet off. "A lot will depend on whether we can get a grant from the National Endowment for the Arts, from the Maryland Arts Council, and from a third group," Tatum said. After grants are received, the Kerr Committee will "probably have to match it," Tatum said. Depending on what the Kerr Committee receives, they will know what they will be able to accomplish.

The festival is planned for the Spring of 1982, although no specific date have yet been set. However, the Committee would hope "to bring the finest novelists and poets down during the course of the year," said Day. In the spring, the literary festival would be held, composed of lectures, readings and symposia for a week. "Mr. Day suggested asking some people who have been here before and also some new people. It is important, especially for a bicentennial, to look backwards as well as forward," said Tatum. She added that "there will certainly be some important writers from Maryland who will be invited."

This project, the Kerr Committee hopes, will generate some excitement on campus and further the writing program at Washington College. At present, however, there are "a lot of things that have to be ironed out," Tatum said.

Two Hundred Years of Chemistry Planned

by CHRISTY HOLT

Dr. Philip Wingate, in conjunction with the Chemistry Department and the Bicentennial Steering Committee, is planning a celebrations of "200 years of Chemistry at Washington College." Wingate, an alumnus of Washington College, is a member of the college's Board of Visitors and Governors, holds a Ph.d. in chemistry and chairman of the Bicentennial committee. He is planning an all day symposium of speakers, including Nobel Prize winners and eminent chemists.

The tentative date for the celebration is October 14, 1981. The featured speaker for the day will be Dr. Charles Suckling, the discoverer of the Fluotinane family of anesthetics, who will be speaking about anesthesiology. Two Nobel Prize winners are scheduled to speak also, Dr. Melvin Calvin and Dr. Glenn Seaburg. Dr. William Bailey, past president of the American Chemical Society, and Dr. Albert Zettlemoyer, incumbent president of the American Chemical Society are also scheduled to speak. Heading the list of prospective speakers is Dr. William Baker, an alumnus of Washington College, who is president of Bell Laboratories, a major chemical research laboratory.

The symposium will explore the past, present, and future of the science of chemistry. Dr. Wingate has been in contact with a number of major firms in hopes that they will participate in the celebration by contributing exhibits and giving displays. Dr. John Conkling, member of the chemistry department, described the department as "extremely excited about the prospects" of the celebration and said that he was "looking forward to meeting and hearing these people speak."

"To bring the finest novelists and poets down during the course of the year"

Directed by Milos Forman (One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest), with Treat Williams, John Savage, Beverly D'Angelo, and Annie Golden. Hair is an unexpected triumph. The play had emerged as one of the most logical representations of the lifestyle of American youth in the late sexties. And now the film also succeeds. Even today we can feel the clash of lifestyles and political beliefs from the moment Claude, a Farmer's son from the midwest, comes to NYC and meets a hippy band in Central Park. Claude's decision to join the army is at odds with the hippy "philosophy" of peace, love and non-violence, and his introduction to the world of drugs completes the feeling of culture shock. But above all there is the music which captures the spirit of rebellion and the divergent sensibilities we still experience.

Kelley, Legates Teaching at Local Schools

by ANYA LIPNICK

For the past eight weeks Washington College seniors Ted Legates and Bernie Kelley have been student teachers in the Chestertown school system.

Both students arrived at college on September 2nd to start classes. Student teachers are required to take a seven-week curriculum consisting of three courses. These were taught from nine a.m. to four p.m. Monday through Friday.

Legates began student teaching on October 20th. He taught two fifth-grade classes English and Social Studies.

He was only assigned to teach the fifth grade, but to fill the entire requirement for teaching he had to learn to deal with fourth and seventh graders also. With the help of Dr. Newell's two sons, from grades four and seven, Legates has, "learned a great deal from those boys about how they react to their grades and teachers," he said.

Legates has really not come across any major problems. He feels that a teacher must make it known to the students that he is teacher not parent. After that is established the class runs smoothly.

Legates has become so committed to his "kids", that he has become involved with their Christmas play, an adaptation of Hansel and Gretel.

Teaching made Legates aware of the fact that fifth graders are capable of really so much and cannot be pushed to learn more than that.

The hardest part of his job was to have the teachers themselves accept him, and to have the children accept a new teacher who would only be there for a short while.

Bernie Kelley, on the other hand, taught a combination sixth, of seventh and eighth graders. Each day he taught three classes of seventh graders, two classes of sixth graders and one class of eighth.

Kelley felt a little more at ease going into his teaching position because of his experience with children in the past, in summer camp.

He was left to teach by himself about fifty percent of the time. The only problem that he has run into so far was being sick and still going in to teach. He said, "It is easier to go to school when you're sick than to prepare classes for a substitute."

This experience has , "taught me a lot of ways to handle myself, and it has given me the first glimpse of what a real job would be like," he said.

Before this he had no idea how much work a teacher has to put in to prepare a class, all the paperwork, the meetings, and obligations to the P.T.A.

In all, teaching at the middle school has helped Kelley understand about the child-teacher bond, and how school affects the children he teaches.

Each student teacher has had his own experiences, but both agree that these children are perceptive about everything that has to do with their own teachers. The children tend to notice dress, attitude and physical appearance.

Neither of them are ready to say definitely that they will graduate from college to become teachers. All they can say now is that they have enjoyed this experience, and hopefully be able to apply it to their future.

Art Internship for Chearneyi in Baltimore

by TAMARA DUBIN

"It was fascinating to work with the objects themselves," commented senior Lee Ann Chearneyi concerning her internship at Walter's Art Gallery in Baltimore. The first of its kind, Chearneyi travels to Baltimore every Friday for a nine to five day at the Museum. This means she must miss Friday class. Asked if this schedule put her behind in her work, Chearneyi admitted, "Yes, it's been hard, especially now at the end of the semester."

Working with the director and registrar, Chearneyi is learning the duties of a museum curator.

She is instructed on how to exhibit, make labels, place the objects and light them. One of the exhibits she helped arrange was the "Masterpieces of Chinese Porcelain" of the Ch'ien Lung Dynasty. "I learned a whole lot of trivia about Chinese porcelain," she commented, "I really have a respect for porcelain now. It's more interesting to set up an exhibit of three-dimensional objects because there are more problems involved. Paintings do not have as many of the lighting problems."

Working with the 17th century curator, Chearneyi has hung a wall of "romantic drawings with Islamic themes, done by Gerene aue Dede." She has arranged a wall of Jacob Miller's watercolors. Now, she is researching for a catalogue and a Jacob Miller show. Often, she must go into storage and is allowed to handle paintings and porcelain, but, "this is rare," she admitted.

Chearneyi has always been interested in an internship. Her advisor, Robert J. H. Janson La-Palme learned of her interest and arranged for her job at Walter's Art gallery. The internship counts as a four credit course. Chearney must mect with her advisor once a week and write a final paper. She thinks that it was worth all the trouble to be "exposed to professional art exhibits. By the end of the Chinese porcelain show, I felt like I had a lot of old friends."

Commencement Speaker Not Yet Found

by WENDY MURPHY
News Editor

The top three choices of the senior class for commencement speaker have declined, and former Ambassador Anne Armstrong has been invited.

The Senior Class submitted to Dr. McLain at the beginning of the semester a list of ten nominees for speaker at the 1981 Commencement. Armstrong was not on that list.

McLain sent letters to the top three candidates, Gerry Trudeau, Art Buckwald and Andy Rooney. At the meeting of the Board of Visitors and Governors on December 6, McLain read the letters in which "all three declined very graciously." He stressed that there was not much time left and that a decision had to be made.

At that point, McLain asked the students at the meeting what he should do and they offered no suggestions. Then, Board member James Juliana, of Bethesda, suggested that Anne Armstrong be asked to speak. She is the former ambassador to the Court of Saint James.

At this suggestion, the students said that Senator William Bradley of New Jersey, should be asked to come because he was fourth on the list of Senior choices.

These names were discussed and some one else suggested William Simon be issued an invitation to speak. The latter suggestion was dismissed and a decision was reached.

After the Board meeting, McLain said "We will contact Anne Armstrong, one of the top women in politics and if she cannot come we will ask Bill Bradley. I'll have a letter to Senator Bradley drafted just in case Armstrong does not accept."

Apparently there was a misunderstanding of the final decision. The students thought that Bradley was to be invited first, but the Board seemed under the impression that Armstrong was to be invited first. McLain met with the students again on Tuesday, and it was decided that both would be asked.

A letter was sent to Armstrong on Monday asking her to speak at the commencement and receive the Award of Excellence. Tuesday, it was decided that Senator Bradley be asked to come and receive an honorary degree.

President Carter has also been invited for the 1981 Commencement. He was sent a letter before the election asking him to come whether he won the election or not. When asked about the possibility of all three accepting their invitations, Bennett Lamond said "That really was not said. I think that we would just have them all come and try to work things out."

operating efficiently on a volunteer basis, there may be a movement toward making a formal recommendation to the faculty that it be made a requirement.

•Hill Dorms renovation is on schedule for completion August 1, 1981, according to Vice President for Finance Gene Hessey. "There's no information that would lead us to believe they (the contractors) can't meet that deadline".

•Admissions announce that the number of applications recieved for enrollment of September 1981 is down by ten over this time last year. It was also reported that admissions for transfers coming in January is up by fourteen over last year's figure. Mr. DiMaggio said, regarding the enrollment of the Class of 1984, that most applications will be received in the early months of 1981.

Reagan May Speak at Bicentennial Graduation

Reagan by his PR firm. Last college year, one of the partners of his firm came down and looked over the campus. He was delighted with what he saw."

According to DeProspo, Reagan's aides will have completed his calendar for 1981-1982 by the end of this month. She said "that's why it's important to officially invite him at this time."

President of the College Joseph McLain said, "We had to get the request in as soon as possible but it couldn't be done before the meeting of the Board of Visitors and Governors on December 6. At that meeting, I read a rough draft of the letter which is to be sent to him. It was okayed and if he does come, he will receive an honorary Doctorate of Laws."

He added, "Via a grape vine, we have heard that Washington College is exactly the kind of college Reagan likes." DeProspo said, "Reagan is very fond of small conservative liberal arts colleges such as Washington College. He went to a small college himself (Eureka College)."

President McLain concluded, "We hope that he will be here for the 1982 Commencement. We have high expectancy of him accepting."

Cheryl Loss Named to All-Star Volleyball

by JEFF ALDERSON

Junior Cheryl Loss was recently named to the MAC All-Conference All Star volleyball team after a season of out standing play for W.C. "I felt shocked!" she said, "I had no idea at all. It was a total surprise."

Coach Penny Fall explained the selection procedure. "At the fall meeting of the MAC volleyball games committee a vote was taken among the coaches for the MAC All Conference Volleyball Team. Twelve girls were selected and Cheryl was one of them, chosen from about 300 girls playing from twenty teams." "I had no idea I was up for it." Cheryl remarked.

Fall feels that this was a well-deserved honor for Cheryl. "When came here as a freshman she had little experience," Fall commented. "She needed a lot of work. She put in a lot of time and effort for the techniques she has."

The fact that she works as hard in practice as she does during a game is a good indication of the type of competitor Cheryl is. "In fact," remarked Fall, "throughout the season, even when she was hurt, I had to calm her down, She doesn't know half speed." Fall feels that this is a tremendous quality and asset to the team and coach.

"Cheryl has a fine attitude." Fall said. "It doesn't matter if we're winning or losing. With her good attitude she played consistently well. I can't remember her having a bad game."

Fall feels that this was a difficult year to be part of the team Cheryl said, "I thought the season was disappointing for the girls in regard to the win/loss record, but I feel it was a definite learning year for everyone involved."

The two best parts of Cheryl's game were her hitting and passing according to Fall. "Her spiking can only be described as awesome," Fall said. "She really nails it to the floor. She also covered well and passed beautifully."

"I know she's very interested in working on her game for next year." Fall said, "She's not resting on her laurels."

Fall is looking for Cheryl to form the nucleus of the team with Anne Most next year. "If they keep up the good positive leadership attitude, with the enthusiasm of the freshmen and if Laura Chase keeps improving, we'll do really well next year."

Fall is delighted for Cheryl. "Miss Fall has been very very nice about the whole thing," Cheryl added.

Cheryl was one of the few players to be chosen for the all stars from a non-tournament team. According to Fall." Most all Stars are from teams in the championship tournament. The other coached only saw Cheryl during league play." Fall feels that this indicates more of Cheryl's impressive abilities.

Cheryl adds, "I'm hoping that next year someone else from Washington College will be honored for their hard work with this award."

Public Relations Firm Considered for Bicentennial

"To capitalize to the fullest on the 200th anniversary"

by CHRISTY HOLT

A proposal has been created to help publicize the Washington College by utilizing the services of an outside consulting firm, Deaver and Hannaford, Inc. The proposed objectives of Deaver and Hannaford are for the long range, "to identify Washington College as a quality liberal arts college to the broadest possible audience," and for the short range, "to capitalize to the fullest on the 200th anniversary of the founding of the college in 1782."

The proposal was originated by Dr. John Conkling, chairman of the publicity committee for the Bicentennial Steering Committee. Because Paul Bortlein, an alumnus of Washington College is a key executive for Deaver and Hannaford, Inc., the estimated cost for their services from January 1981 to May 1982 is $9,000—far below the normal professional fee.

Deaver and Hannford's strategy for publicizing the Bicentennial centers on building a media program around the three major events of the Bicentennial School year: the October 10, 1981 celebration of Washington College's link with Aberdeen University, Scotland; the Washington's Birthday Convocation in 1982; and the Bicentennial graduation ceremony on May 16, 1982. They plan to do this by promoting newspaper, magazine, radio, and television features of the College's Bicentennial. Deaver and Hannaford also plan to develop target lists" of consumer magazines and professional publications which might be interested in doing articles about the college. They will also assist the college in securing the President and the First Lady of the United States to participate in the climax of the Bicentennial School Year, Graduation.

Kathy Myrick DeProspo, director of Public Relations for Washington College said of the proposal: "Professional help in the area of public relations for the Washington College Bicentennial is absolutely essential." She explained that "Deaver and Hannaford, Inc. proposes to help Washington College achieve regional and national publicity in ways it would be impossible for the one-person public relations office on campus to do." Dr. John Conklin, originator of the proposal, said "the events going on during the Bicentennial will be of national interest," which our department of public relations "isn't designed to handle."

Myrick DeProspo feels that Washington

College will need students very badly in the coming years, and the first step in attracting students is to get the name of the college in front of the public in a positive way." This will be the task of Deaver and Hannaford, Inc. if the proposal is approved.

Student Judiciary Board Makes Appointments

by JEFF ALDERSON

On Monday night, December 8 the SGA held a special closed meeting to select members of the Student Judiciary Board. Positions were open for one chairman, five lawyers, and eight jurors.

Fourteen students applied. Although the applicants had designated which position they preferred, each was considered for all of them. Three people applied for chairman, one for lawyer, and ten for juror.

Each applicant was interviewed ibdividually before the entire SGA. The SGA had three set questions and allowed for one spontaneous question from the senate. The applicants for chairman were allowed to be asked as many questions as the SGA wanted.

After interviewing all three students for chairman, the SGA decided on Sue Chase. Chase was then allowed to sit in on the rest of the meeting.

The SGA will decide on the positaons of lawyer and juror by the end of the semester and the applicants will be notified when a decision has been made.

Hill Dorms Work Progresses

by GINGER KURAPKA
Editor-in-chief

Work on the Hill Dorms renovation is progressing on schedule, in spite of a few unforeseen problems.

"We've had a couple of problems that nobody could anticipate, because we couldn't see them," said Vice President for Finance Gene Hessey. The architect on the project is at present trying to find a way to make the brick lining around the windows in Middle Hall substantial enough to support the work. The openings of the interior stairwells of the buildings are not the same size, so measurements have had to be retaken.

"Right now things are going quite well," said Hessey, "Both the architect and the contractor seem to feel there shouldn't be any problem completing the buildings on schedule."

Sears Roebuck Gives Unrestricted Grant of $600

News Bureau

Washington College has received an unrestricted grant of $600 from the Sears-Roebuck Foundation, Chicago, Illinois. Representing the Foundation, Paul E. Wright, Store Manager of Sears-Roebuck, Dover, Delaware visited the College to present the contribution to college Vice President for Development George E. Hayward and Dean of the College Garry E. Clarke.

The Sears-Roebuck Foundation has assisted Washington College annually since 1973. Their reccnt contribution brings the total received from the Foundation over the past 18 years to nearly $11,000. Washington College is one of more than 1,000 private colleges and universities which received unrestricted educationai grantstrom the Foundation totalling 1.5 million dollars. Together, private colleges in Maryland and Delaware received more than $16,600 from the Sears-Roebuck Foundation this year alone.

In accepting the grant, Mr. Hayward stated, "Sears-Roebuck Foundation is to be commended for its philanthropic programs which focus almost exclusively on all levels of education throughout the country. Washington College is honored to once again be selected for a Foundation grant which further encourages understanding and respect for the free enterprise system between private education and such a prominent and concerned major corporation."

College Balances Budget for Seventh Consecutive Year

NEWS BUREAU

Washington College, in contrast to many private colleges throughout the country, has balanced its budget for the seventh consecutive year according to a joint announcement recently issued by college president Dr. Joseph H. McLain, chairman of the Visitors and Governors Louis L. Goldstein, and Chairman of the Finance Committee H. Furlong Baldwin. According to the statement, "Washington College is especially proud to have balanced its budget every year since 1974, particularly in light of serious inflation facing all aspects of college operations. The primary reasons for this financial success were stringent budget controls, steps taken to reduce energy consumption, and a commendable increase in support the College received from alumni, friends, private foundations, corporations and through bequests."

In an all-out effort to ensure continued financial solvency, the Board of Visitors and Governors recently announced the undertaking of a major campaign to increase the College's endowment by 10.2 million dollars. The campaign sets the stage for the College's 200th anniversary celebration to be held during the 1981-82 academic year.

According to President McLain, "to mount such a major fund drive inMe present economy presents a great challenge to Washington College, but we are confident that success is possible. The campaign is designed to take Washington College into its third century with reasonable assurance that we can continue to battle inflation to a draw. The thrust of the campaign is to seek major gifts to endow academic chairs, student scholarships, academic and cultural programs, and maintenance of the present physical plant."

As of June 30, 1980, Washington College closed the last academic year with an endowment of $7.8 million dollars. Its general and academic operating budget for the 1979-80 academic year was $5.2 million, up only 8.8 percent over the preceding year. During the last year, total gifts, grants and bequests to the College totaled $1.5 million, an increase of 31 percent over the 1978-79 academic year. Contributions from alumni set a new record by increasing 22 percent over a year earlier.

Washington College, founded in 1782, received the first collegiate charter granted in Maryland and the tenth charter granted in the United States. It will begin a formal yearlong celebration of its 200th anniversary year on Saturday, October 10, 1981, with an academic procession through Chestertown and a number of special events throughout the day.

Pipes freeze, break

Richmond House on Ice

by WENDY MURPHY
News Editor

"It was a very unfortunate accident when the pipes at Richmond House burst right after it was robbed," said Ray Crooks, Superintendent of Buliding and Grounds.

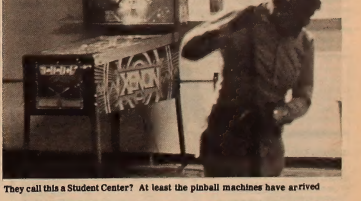
He added, "Everything was okay Sunday (January 4th) at 6:00, but when one of the mechanics went to check the house Monday morning, at 9:30, he noticed ice all over the lobby. All of the pipes had frozen and some radiators burst."

Crooks said that due to the extremely cold weather more oil was burnt than usual. Because the oil company operates by degree days, the burner ran out of oil and had been off all weekend. The cost of the damage was covered by the oil company's insurance.

He added that the Maintainence Department has a problem locating enough radiators for the replacement repairs to be done. "We needed to get eleven radiators." They began the work on Tuesday, January 6th, and worked for the balance of the week in order to restore heat to the building.

According to Crooks, "We were very careful not to break or damage anything. We had the maids houseclean the rooms where we had to replace the radiators. As far as we know, everything is working fine, now."

Student Center Snags



by GINGER KURAPKA
Editor-in-chief

It looks like a classic case of good news and bad news for the proposed Student Center. Once again cost estimates have come in above the budget, and it is taking time to cut any excess and to find alternatives.

"The estimate from Brohawn was grossly in excess of the budget," said Vice President for Finance Gene Hessey. The architect and the engineer on the project have been reviewing the proposal to try to decrease costs. The major expense was to be the modification of the mechanical system, however, "we think we've found a way to substantially reduce the cost," said Hessey.

It appears that the money which would have been saved by having Brohawn contractors work on the center since they are already on the site is not as significant as originally thought. The college is looking into the feasibility of sub-contracting the project out itself. "We felt we can do the major work and sub-contract out for those things our maintenance department can't do," said Hessey.

The good news is that the college has received a grant of more than $30,000 from an anonymous Delaware donor to help pay for the Student Center.

They call this a Student Center? At least the pinball machines have arrived

editorial

It seems like the rest of the world has started off the semester with a bang, while Washington College remains stuck in its quiet, if somewhat safer, rut. The release of the hostages should be gratifying to each of us, and the joy and relief we can all feel should stay with us longer than did the anxiety over their captivity. The real world arrives at WC once again, but this time it's not unwelcome. Descending to more immediate, if less momentous events, work on the student center has not begun, and this lack of progress presents again what seems to have become the classic dilemma for projects at WC. Should we be angry about the delay, or should we be grateful that we're not going off half cocked, before all the planning has been completed, all the materials collected, all the money available? To have demolished the Coffee House with nothing to take its place would have been stupid; but to have done nothing much beyond the addition of a couple of pinball machines outside the C-House seems almost worse than to have done nothing at all. The students who originally proposed the need for a student center over a year ago, will no doubt have graduated long before one is ever completed.

Another, more urgent problem has received more timely action over the break. People can feel safer on campus now that Jim Quinn has been named to head the campus security force. Aside from his extensive police experience, Quinn is also a student, which presents us with a unique and valuable opportunity, to know this person who's protecting us. Maybe we can learn from him how better to protect ourselves.

Six Employees Honored

NEWS BUREAU

Six employees were honored by Washington College during the All-College Christmas Dinner on Thursday, December 18.

Donald Chatellier, of the physical education department faculty, Madeline Howell, secretary to the Dean, and Rosanna Fletcher of the maintenance staff received awards for twenty-five years of service to Washington College. Richard Brown, chairman of the mathematics department, Nancy Tatum, chairman of the English department, and Betty Anne Connolley of the central services staff were honored for twenty years of service to the school.

College President Joseph H. McLain presented the awards which included certificates and gifts from the College, a congratulatory letter,and certificate of appreciation from State Comptroller and Chairman of the Board of Visitors and Governors Louis L. Goldstein, and a citation from Maryland Governor Harry Hughes. Dean Garry E. Clarke read the letters from Mr. Goldstein, which said, in part, "Your many years of contributions to Maryland's oldest chartered college is why Washington College is one of our finest institutions of higher learning. I only wish I could be with you at this time... Keep up the great work!"

Cafeteria Renovation Progresses

As promised, picture molding for the wall displaying of student photos and art work was nailed into place before the end of the Fall Semester. The Main Dining Room was painted before Christmas. An information Kiosk is under construction by the Washington College Maintenance Staff (Bill Colemas, Joe Calders and Ralph Russum) and will hopefully be completed by the first of February.

A meeting of the Redecoration Committee will be held on Wednesday, January 28th at 11:45 AM in the Private Dining Room. At this meeting, Mr. Dick Bishton of Elburn's Florist will present a general floor desing and specifications for the building of mobile room dividers. Also on the agenda will be discussions on how to finance the Main Dining Room renovation and how to acquire student artwork for display in the Main Dining Room.

The Writing Problem—Again

by GEOFF GARINTHER

The faculty is likely to receive soon from the Academic Council a proposal designed to deal with what has become known as the writing problem. After all that has been said about what professors should be doing for us, is there anything that studeqts can so to help themselves?

In The Great American Writing Block (189 pages, The Viking Press. $8.95), CUNY professor Thomas C. Wheeler provides some answers, and, in the process, hits alarmingly close to home on some subjects. For example: "Faced with the need to teach the unpracticed, colleges turn the 'mute' over to English faculties trained for literary scholarship, who are appalled by the new ignorance, and often temperamentally hostile to it." These faculty, he continues "once snobbish even about creative writing and journalism courses but finding fewer students interested in English literature electives, now find that they can stay in business by offering courses in nonfiction writing."

As his subtitle—"Causes and Cures of the New Illiteracy" suggests, Wheeler is concerned with a broader problem than that which concerns us. He devoted chapters to the need for an essay requirement on Scholastic Aptitude Tests to promote better teaching of writing in high schools; the failure of Open Admission programs, particularly in New York; and the deficiencies of writing that lacks a cultural point of view.

Much of what he says, however, is relevant to students here:

•On the need to read: "Certainly the reading crisis is one cause of the writing problem. Students who find reading a chore will inevitably find writing more difficult. When students enjoy reading, they gain not only a familiarity with language but respect for writing."

•On English professors who preach the doctrine, Never write as you speak; "To many academics, the speaking voice is a barbarous instrument, to be silenced in writing. But writing is not simply a transcription of the speaking voice; it is a heightening of it in that time that writing allows for thought. Even the illiterate, when they talk of something they care about, perform feats of grammar and thought—by the sentence, by the paragraph."

•On students: "They are not thought to have an ear or language of their own. They think they must use big words, and their writing becomes, predictably, tedious and impersonal." He provides as an example letters beginning, "It has come to my attention that..."

•O grammar books: "I have found grammar books useful as dictionaries of error to which a student may refer, but grammar books ignore the tactile and sensory aspects of writing. I have read current advice on writing which ignores grammar in the name of developing the senses, creativity. But grammar is not separate from the senses, but a form through which the senses find clarity."

•On American literature: "Surely come of age, American literature deserves to be the basic literature offered by American high schools and colleges, as a revelation of the inner life of a nation, as a study of American imagination and conflict. Shakespeare need not be lost, nor Donne and Marvell; they can be worked bade to, especially by those who have learned to care. The study of literature need not be the esoteric pursuit of the few that it now is; it can be the common property of us all, a record of our humanity and spirit."

Wheeler at times seems to feel guilty about his Harvard education. Many of the samples of writing by inner-city youths in his SEEK (Search for Education, Elevation, and Knowledge) program at CUNY, which he offers as an example of beautifully creative expression, are pure gibberish. In fact, his whole "colloquialism in writing" theory may be extreme— I feel more like I have chatted casually with Wheeler, rather than having read his book. But most of what he says makes sense—enough sense to make me want to write down some of my own rules for writing:

•Read a lot, and not just for classes. Much of what is assigned is written in "educationese", and will prepare us only for jobs in teaching (not enough pay) or government (not enough respect). So read newspapers (at least one a day) and novels (even trashy ones), but read critically. Be aware of what is good and what is not-so-good (just because it's in print doesn't mean it's good). There are many great readers who aren't great writers, but there are no great writers who aren't great readers.

•If something's got to be done often, it ought to be enjoyed, and nothing done in the three hours preceeding a deadline can be a labor of love. It's a Catch-22: If you don't like to write, you'll wait until the last minute; and if you wait until the last minute, you won't enjoy writing. Start far ahead of the deadline.

•It probably doesn't need to be said, but write about something you're interested in. Teachers can help here by being flexible with assignments.

•When you re-write (yes, you should re-write), read it aloud. If it sounds awkward, it probably is.

The Academic Council's proposal will be a necessary reform. But even if the faculty passes it, it will affect only a few current students. And it won't be a cure-all anyway. The best cure for our writing problem won't be found in the classroom.

Original Bricks Uncovered in Middle Hall Basement

by SUE JAMES
Fine Arts Editor

While the Hill Dorms renovation continued during winter break, some important archeological items were discovered: bricks.

According to Dr. Robert Janson-La Palme, Associate Professor of Art, some charred hand-made bricks were retrieved from a hole dug in the basement of Middle Hall. The bricks cannot be dated at present, but Janson-La Palme believes that the bricks may be part of the first edifice of the college which was begun in 1784. Middle Hall was constructed in 1844, so it is possible that the bricks may be those from the building of 1784. Dating of the charred bricks would be uncertain at present.

Also uncovered during the vacation were fireplaces located in the basement of Middle Hall, and very mysterious sixteeninch-thick walls under the basement. The fireplaces were previously hidden behind walls. Janson-La Palme noted that one of the fireplaces was used as a cooking and heating unit in a kitchen. Middle Hall was originally a dormitory as well as a classroom building. The students lived on the top floor of the building where it was extremely cold in the winter.

The mysterious walls discovered under the basement of Middle Hall have really kept Janson-La Palme stumbling. He is, however, somewhat displeased with the recent addition of cement over the archeological mystery.

Janson-La Palme is speculative concerning the recent findings, but he has some preliminary theories concerning the brickwork. The fireplaces are in good condition and the brickwork differs from that used on the exterior of Middle Hall. It is possible that the bricks were brought from other places for the construction of Middle Hall. All is uncertain and archeological surveys and excavations must be carried out before any conclusions can be drawn.

An excavation may be led by Janson-La Palme, who is also the Chairman of the Historical District of Chestertown. He has contacted archeological experts and the Maryland Historical Society about the recent Middle Hall findings. A recent private donation from a friend of the College has also broken some ground r the archeological excavation. Terms listed in the contract with the Brohawn Construction Company must be studied before any excavation of this kind can be started.

Article on Sophie Kerr Receives Wide Circulation

by BILL MORTIMER
Assistant Editor

Sophie Kerr, along with the bequest she made to Washington College at the time of her death, was the topic of a recent article by an Associated Press reporter.

The article, by Sid Moody has, presently, been published in thirty-five papers in nineteen states. The papers range from the American Republic in Poplar Bluff, Missouri to the Union in Sacramento, California.

"The article went out on December 7th," said Kathy Myrick DeProspo, Washington College Public Relations Director. She said that she is still getting clippings each day from various areas of the nation. "It really stretches across the country," she said.

Moody, who deeps his boat near Chestertown, learned about Sophie Kerr from his friend William Warner, who is a Pulitzer Prize-winning novelist from Maryland. Myrick DeProspo said that "Warner had aconversation with Bob Day two years ago" in which Day, associate professor of English at the college, mentioned the Sophie Kerr prize. Warner then talked to Moody who "said he had been intending to do the article for a while."

Such articles "are not the type of thing which Public Relations has control over," said Myrick DeProspo. She added that "you have to spark the Associated Press' interest somehow."

After having written the article, the Associated Press assumes responsibility for its distribution. Those papers across the country then become likely spots for its publication.

"The only way to get students here is to let them hear about the school," Myrick Deprospo said. She noted that many people across the country had sent her copies of the article, as well as adding their comments about it. "Everything that I've heard about this article has been positive," she said.

Moody spent several days at Washington College last fall. While here, he was hosted by Bob Day, invited to a poetry reading and an informal get-together with students living in Richmond House, the Writer's Union residence. To gain more information about Sophie Kerr pr', he spoke to President of the College Joseph McLain, chairman of the English department Dr. Nancy Tatum, as well as former Librarian Mrs. Miriam Hofecker. Then, he visited former College President Daniel Gibson, who was here when Sophie Kerr died and her bequest to the college was made.

The article entitled "Sophie Kerr's gift: Eastern Shore's writer never told why she left her fortune for students" as published in The Star-Democrat, tells a good deal about Sophie Kerr herself. She grew up in Denton, Maryland, the daughter of a nurseryman who was "enough of a dirt farmer to sell produce in town," wrote Moody. Kerr attended both Hood College and the University of Vermont. She never attended Washington College. However, in 1942, she was invited to the College to receive an honorary degree. At that time, the college was celebrating its 50th year of co-education, "All the honorees were women, the most prominent being Eleanor Roosevelt who reciprocated with a $25 donation. Sophie gave nothing, nor was it expected," wrote Moody.

The article follows Kerr to her death and the announcement of the bequest which followed. Her writing itself never made her famous. In fact, she once said, "I certainly have no message for the world. It's just light fiction." Her writing, unlike that of some of her friends, including Edith Wharton and Ring Lardner, is not how Sophie Kerr made her fortune in the long run. She published 23 novels and 500 short stories, most of which appeared in magazines. But Sophie Kerr's real accomplishment was in her editorship of the Woman's Home Companion.

When then President of the College Daniel Z. Gibson received a call from Kerr's lawyer shortly after her death, he traveled to New York, where Kerr had lived her adult life, to receive the award. Thinking the award would be at most $5,000, Gibson was astounded to find that Kerr had left the college hald of her estate—$573,000. Since then, the Sophie Kerr Committee has chosen, in accordance with her will, one senior whose writing shows ". . . the best ability and promise for future fulfillment in the field of literary endeavor." Last year, the prize given to Claire Mowbray amounted to $23,000, half of the interest of Kerr's bequest. The other half is to be used "for general literary purposes: books for the library, paint for Richmond House, funds for a literary quarterly and more frequent handbills of student writing," Moody writes. Funds are also provided to bring literary scholars to the campus to lecture and give readings.

Both Myrick De Prospo and Dr. Nancy Tatum, chairman of the English Department and the Sophie Kerr Committee, were pleased with Moody's account. Myrick DeProspo said that the results are "absolutly beneficial."

"On the whole, I thought that it was a very friendly article and that the person took into account what Sophie Kerr had in mind—that she wanted to do something unusual," said Tatum. Articles that take an interest in Sophie Kerr are beneficial to the College, Tatum feels, "A serious article of that kind is helpful," she added.

Over the past five or six years, various articles have been written about Kerr and her extraordinary gift to the college. Sid Moody is, however, the first one who interviewed the people involved with Sophie Kerr. "Mr. Moody 'did more ground work than the average reporter," Tatum said.

The Sophie Kerr prize is, like Washington College, one of the best-kept secrets in Maryland, and perhaps even the best-kept secret in the United States. The prize continues perpetuating the name of the benefactress who never went to the College. Slowly, it seems, word of Sophie Kerr is making itself known.

Sho'men Beat Hopkins, Tough League Schedule Ahead

by HARRY McENROE
Sports Editor

The Washington College varsity basketball team improved its season record to 8-5 with an impressive 74-54 victory at Johns Hopkins on Tuesday. The win placed the Shoremen at an even 1-1 in Middle Atlantic Conference play.

The cagers held a 34-29 lead over the Blue Jays at half-time and following an initial streak enjoyed an early 15 point second-half cushion. A tough, pressing defense forced Hopkins into numerous turnovers which led to several fast-break baskets for the Shoremen. The squad stole the ball a total of 16 times, led by sophomore guard Dave Blackwell, who had six solo thefts.

Blackwell also garnered Shore scoring honors with a gamehigh 24 points. Junior captain Joe Moye and senior guard Craig Longwost scored 15 and 13 points respectively. Forward Cari Fornoff added 10 points to the Shore rout which ended the rival Blue Jays' eight-game winning streak.

Head coach Tom Finnegan feels the crucial Hopkins victory, which places the Shoremen squarely in the running for a conference playoff berth, exhibited the squad's bench strength. Several such players contributed to the winning effort including freshmen Wayne and Scott Spurrier, Vince Gaslor, and junior Jim Corey. Finnegan said that "at this point, we are playing well as a team. Everyone is contributing. Before the season is over, everyone is capable of helping to win a game."

Tomorrow night the squad hosts Mary Washington College at Cain Athletic Center. The Shoremen hope to avenge last year's one-point loss in which a "phantom foul", called at the buzzer, provided the margin of victory. Following this contest, the squad faces a string of three conference games in one week. Tuesday the team hosts Ursinus, the favorite in the league race, while Swarthmore visits Chestertwon on Thursday, January 29. Finally the cagers will travel to Pennsylvania to meet Haverford on Saturday.

The Shoremen face a stern challenge in the quest to make the playoffs for the second time ever, since Ursinus and Widener have already built 4-1 and 3-1 records. Captain Joe Moye assessed the importance of these games by saying, "We have to win every conference game at home and, hopefully, three out of five of our conference road games in order to make the playoffs."

SHORE NOTES:

Preceding Saturday's varsity contest is a 6 p.m. game matching the Jayvee squad against a team of recent alumni basketball players, including Doug Byrne, Joe Wilson, and Steve Dickerson of the 1978-79 playoff-making squad. Tuesday's victory was the basketball team's sixth straight win over Johns Hopkins.

SGA Plans Bermuda Trip

The S.G.A. is sponsoring a trip to Bermuda in cooperation with the Connecticut Travel Agency (CTA) and the govenment of Bermuda. The program through CTA is called, "Adventures in Travel" and is totally student geared.

This student vacation package is offered to many East coast colleges. The rates remain low because of the large number of college students taking advantage of this opportunity.

Three different packages are offered, each including airfare, designated housing, free lunches, parties, nightclubs, tips, Taxes, etc. The least expensive is the beach house package for $320. For approximately $350 one can stay in an apartment with a kitchenette. For around $450 accomodations are offered at a hotel. This includes a five-course evening meal and a full breakfast.

Each package offers a full week's stay during spring break, March 7-15. The beachhouses, apartments, and hotels are all near activities included in the tour offered through Adventures in Travel.

Promotion will include a presentation about the trip given Tuesday night, January 27 at 10:00 in the Coffee House. From 10 to 11 draft will be 25¢, and at 10:30 a slide show will be given. The trip is S.G.A.-sponsored. The money for the trip is due soon after the presentation. For more information about this opportunity contact Tom Twomey.

Academic Group Hill Dorm Housing Recommended

by VIRGINIA KURAPKA
Editor-in-chief

The Student Affairs Committee, chaired by Dr. Steven Cades, has voted unanimously to recommend that the Hill Dorms be used to house academic interest groups.

The resolution is to be voted on next Monday by the faculty at their meeting, and will then go to President of the College Joseph McLain, who is requested in the report to send it on to the Board of Visitors and Governors.

The recommendations made by the committee are based on input formulated from a series of meetings and discussions with students and faculty. The proposal to house academic Interest groups originated with Professor Robert Day in April, 1980. The report states "His rationale, as we understood it, was that it was important for the College to "announce" that these kinds of activities (academic in nature) were the ones that the college community believed to be the most important to it, and that the Hill Dorms as "central buildings" would best be used for such a purpose." Several arguments, pro and con, emerged from meetings held with faculty and students. In another meeting with members of the Admissions Office it was recognized that Richmond House, as an example of an academic interest group housed together, was very beneficial in attracting students to the college and that "the expansion of the Richmond House idea to other academic interest groups would make Washington College more attractive to students with similar concerns—students whom the College presumably would wish to encourage to come here."

The committee then met several times, and agreed on four basic points:

"The development and encouragement of academic interest group housing is important to the welfare of Washington College: Fraternities serve an important social purpose at Washington College; it is desirable to provide group housing and chapter rooms for fraternities; tradition for its own sake is not an important consideration in establishing the future use of the Hill Dormitories."

On the basis of these agreements, the committee has recommended that the Hill Dorms be occupied by groups chosen on the basis of a competitive bid system, to be repeated every two years. The group must be defined by a common academic or cultural interest, must be presumed to be able to continue over a period of years and have "the support and involvement of sponsoring faculty member(s)."

Another criteria is that the activities of the group be shared socially with the rest of the college community. Cades said, "If the groups can't be cloistered potters...what they do has to be available in a person-to-person way. Otherwise they're simply operating to benefit themselves and that doesn't satisfy the spirit of the project."

The present chapter room areas are to be used as work and office space, "including offices of interested faculty members." Fraternities are to be provided with "joint living space and with chapter rooms." All groups applying for Hill Dorms housing will be subject to the same criteria.

The need for an area separate from the Student Center with a capacity of 300 people, to be reserved for special

Davis Resigns, Temporary Replacement Found

by BILL MORTIMER
Assistant Editor

Dr. Glenn Davis, professor of Psychology, resigned from his position on December 22nd. According to Dean of the College Garry Clarke, Davis resigned "right before things closed for Christmas." Because of the holidays, the Committee on Appointments and Tenure, along with the Department of Psychology started to work on finding a replacement on January 5th, leaving only two weeks for a replacement to be found.

Davis resigned because of a new position offered to him. "It was unexpected," said Dr. George Spillich, Acting Chairman of the Psychology Department. "He was a very good faculty member," a sort of expert in the field of psychological experience between architecture and social space.

Recently, Davis received coverage in the news through an article in the New York Times. "People who are good," said Davis, "have a high tendency of job mobility." Spillich added that Davis attempted to stay at the College until the end of the semester. "He asked that a new employer if he could work out the rest of the school year." Spillich said. Unable to, Davis was forced to leave before the end of the current school year.

Although he was forced to leave the Psychology Department seemingly shorthanded, Davis "left under very good terms, and we are all hoping the best for him," Spillich said. A replacement was found who was able to step into Davis' classes for the Spring term, Dr. John Owen.

With only a semester break to find a replacement, Spillich, along with the other two members of the department, called graduate schools, seeking the names of recent graduates who might fill the position. "We found John Owen through the University of Delaware," Spillich said. He added that Owen, one of the best people for the job, "was very well received by the people on Appointment and Tenure—we felt lucky to get him."

Clarke said "thanks to George Spillich and Jim Siemen things worked out quite well." Dr. Owen, Clarke added, "came down, was interviewed, and took the job for this semester." The full time position will have to be filled for next year. "Dr. Owen will be a candidate for the full time position," Clarke said.

Owen, who did his graduate work at the University of Delaware, graduated in 1976. "My training is in learning, memory and motivation," he said, adding that training means "what I did in graduate school." After his graduation, Owen taught at West Chester State College in Pennsylvania, as "what I'd call their acting social psychologist."

Called a week before classes, Owen was found by the department to be both available and interested. The immediacy of the need for a new psychology professor was "not all that tough," Owen said while at West Chester State he was on a semester-to-semester contract. "I've had short notice before," Owen said, "it's not easy, but not so difficult."

Courses were not changed to suit Owen's specific field, mostly because they did not have to be. So far, he said, there have been no problems.

"We are going to replace Dr. Davis in the regular replacement process," said Spillich. Hoping to fill the position by May, Spillich has placed advertisements in several psychology journals. Although Owen has expressed interest in the full-time position, and Spillich hopes he will apply, the regular process will be followed. "We will look at all the applications first," Spillich said.

Richmond House Robbed

by WENDY MURPHY
News Editor

"I had moved out for vacation, but I came back one night to get a book. I had been staying in Chestertown so I was close by. I noticed the front door was unlocked and thought it odd, I went in and there was glass out in the hall. Someone had busted the glass of my room door and left it open. I just came in and called the police," said Colleen Miller, resident of Richmond House, about the robbery which took place there over Christmas Vacation.

She continued, "I waited for the police cruiser to arrive. It took awhile because they didn't know where Richmond House is. When they got here, we went through the house. All of the doors were kicked open and the rooms were all ransacked. For all I knew, they were still in the house when I got there. I'm just glad I wasn't here when it happened. I think they came in through Nick Nappo's room." Miller said, "The only thing wrong with my room was the fingerprint dust and just things being out of place. Everything of value was with me." Others were not so lucky.

Kirk Folk, who lives on the third floor, seemed to be the hardest hit. His stereo was stolen, including a turntable, a cassette player, and two speakers. Other items stolen included a quilt and an amplifier.

Holli Mathison, who had only moved into Richmond House two weeks earlier, said, "I came back a day early (January 17) with my parents. I walked in and found a total disaster area. The main door to Richmond House was locked and so was my room. My floor was covered with summer clothes. They has been in a locked trunk that I kept under my bed. It (the trunk) was lying open with a can opener beside it I assume that's what they used."

"My dresser had been gone through and there were footprints on my bedspread. The robbers took my quilt, probably to wrap up my stereo that they stole. They also took a pillow case and some smaller things like perfume. I was going to take a picture of my room but my camera was stolen," she added.

Mathison showed me the lock which was broken when the robbers entered. "We must have flimsy locks if they break off this easily and just because of the fact that they got into nine rooms. Apparently it was not that difficult. Every other dorm has the outside lock changed (during Christmas Vacation) but not Richmond House."

She said, "The pipes had also burst so there was water in my room. Maintenance pushed my bed out of the way to fix the radiator but left my clothes lying in the water. Half of my summer clothes were mildewed. Student Affairs only seemed to have worsened the situation by not doing anything about it until we got back. Then we made our lists of everything that was missing. I think Jim Quinn (Director of Security) is really making an effort."

Bill Mortimer feels that "It basically deals with the handling of the entire writing program. Things here at Richmond House are fixed only out of necessity. The radiators burst, so the heating gets fixed. The ceiling falls, and then it is fixed. In view of how things have been going, it seems like more

Elm, Pegasus Relocation

by BILL MORTIMER
Assistant Editor

The Elm office, formerly located in the basement of Hodson Hall, has been moved to the first floor of Caroline House. The move was made necessary due to demolition for the student center, which should be under construction during the Spring semester or, at the latest, over the summer vacation. Both The Elm and the Pegasus office are located on the first floor of Caroline House in the two rooms off the main lobby. The telephone extension is 321.

The recommendation by the Student Affairs Committee to house academic interest groups in the Hill Dorms will be controversial. We hope everyone will take the time to study the recommendation and, as Dr. Cades said his committee did, to listen to all views.

Any fears on the part of fraternities should be laid to rest. The same route open to any group applying to occupy the Hill Dorms would be open to them. In the event that a fraternity's application were rejected, a pledge has been included, in the recommendation, to provide chapter rooms. No student should fear that the social life on campus would diminish (WC students have never been lacking in ability to find a party) because the additional social events sponsored by academic interest groups in the Hill Dorms will enhance social life. The concentration of these groups in one area may also make it easier for new students to mingle among several groups and to find more friends more quickly.

Those who agree should not celebrate yet, however. Economic and budgetary considerations are sure to be problematic, and efforts should begin to find the money for the additional facilities called for by the Student Affairs Committee recommendation. If the money is not available from college funds, grant money should be sought immediately. In the midst of the Third Century campaign, this project is clearly appropriate. It looks back to the heritage of our College and forward to the future of the College. It should be approved with enthusiasm by students, faculty, and Administration, and it should be acted upon as soon as possible.

Theroux to Give Reading

Phyllis Theroux, essayist, journalist and book critic, will give a reading and talk on Thursday, February 5 at 8 p.m. in the Sophie Kerr Room of Miller Library. The lecture, entitled Childhood: The Writer's Curse, Weapon, and Final Destination, is sponsored by the Sophie Kerr Committee and the public is invited to attend.

A native of California, Ms. Theroux now resides in Washington, DC where she writes and lectures professionally. She recently published an autobiography, California and Other States of Grace, which she will read from on Thursday evening. She also writed regularly for the New York Times and Washington Post, and is a contributor to McCall's, Ladies' Home Journal, and Readers' Digest. Next fall, Ms. Theroux will teach non-fiction at American University in Washington DC.

A reception will follow the lecture at the Alumni House on campus.

functions by any group was recognized. "There was no explicit proposal for this area," said Cades, "although perhaps the most obvious choice would be to rethink the purpose of the Hynson Lounge." This suggestion, however, was not part of the committee's recommendation.

Members of the committee include Dr. Steven Cades, Dr. Eugene Hamilton, Kathleen Milis, Maureen Keiley, Edward Maxcy, Susan Chase, Shannon Crosby, Frank Dirks, Duane Marshall, David Pointon, and Mark Simpson.

protection should have been provided. With the new security force, I thing it will be."

"It seems like it was calculated. It's just odd the way things happen. Maybe whoever robbed us knew who had what and where it was." he said.

Richmond House is not near any student activities so if anything were to happen, especially at night, the chances of someone being around to witness it are very slim. Due to the efforts of Quinn and the security force, some articles have been recovered, although the investigation into the crime is ongoing.

Letters to the Editor

Richmond House Robbery

To the Editor,

We, the residents of Richmond House, want to clear up several misunderstandings concerning the robbing and ransacking of our house which took place on January 4, 1981.

Jim Quinn, the new head of Security, and his coworkers believe that the thieves broke into Richmond House between approximately 10:00 and 12:00 p.m. on January 4th. According to Quinn, the thieves were on foot and made several trips in and out of Richmond House carrying the stolen goods.

No one claims to have seen them. Two windows were broken and nine doors were forced open, smashing the locks—no one heard them. It is probable that the thieves even turned the lights on, but no one noticed. Obviously, the former security team at Washington College was totally inadequate. Now, with Jim Quinn, there is an experienced security team here which is concerned about the student body. We should not have had to wait so long for such a team.

Ray Crooks, head of Maintenance, stated in the January 23rd. issue of The Elm "It was a very unfortunate accident when the pipes at Richmond House burst right after it was robbed." We appreciate the Maintenance Department's prompt attention in replacing our radiators. We were quite surprised, however, to read, "We had the maids housecleam the rooms where we had to replace the radiators." Judging from the floors, which are now scarred from dragging the radiators in and out, newly missing tiles, and; in one case, a large puddle which ruined clothes thrown on the floor during the robbery, this "housecleaning" was a little haphazard. Someone did not do his/her job properly.

Maintenance has always tried to help the residents of Richmond House live as comfortably as possible under less than ideal circumstances, but we feel it is important for Mr. Crooks to know that the lack of follow through in this particular case only made an aggrevating situation worse. Student Affairs, in turn, chose not to follow through by notifying the students of Richmond House about the robbery. We appreciate their concern in not wanting to spoil our vacations; however, it seems to us that we could have been of some help to the Security team and the police. They had no way of knowing if any property was stolen during the ransacking. We could have told them what should have been in our rooms, and where. Because we were not informed, a full two weeks passed before the police knew that property had been stolen. This waste of time might well mean the permanent loss of our possessions.

The purpose of this letter is not to point accusing fingers, but rather to focus on two points which everyone should consider. First, though Richmond House will probably be torn down this summer, the Administration seems to have forgotten that it is still a functioning dormitory, office, and headquarters for the Broadsides and Washington College Review right now. Because it is on the ourskirts of the campus and apparently easily broken into, Richmond House should be given more attention by Security, Maintenance, and Student Affairs. It has been treated as if it were and empty, useless building.

Second, the writers of Richmond House carry a spirit of pride and enthusiasm in their house and their work, a spirit which seems all too rare on campus. Our house is old and suffers plumbing problems, slanting floors, and bending ceilings. Yet each of the nine bedrooms has been painted, decorated and carefully maintained by the students who live in them. We are proud of the Broadsides the Washington College Review and our role as host to visiting writers. We are disappointed and angry at the Administration's lack of pride in both our work and their own.

Quinn Heads Revamped Security Force

by JEFF ALDERSON

"The three elements of a crime are: ability, desire, and opportunity. Without any one of these three a crime cannot be committed," stated Jim Quinn, the new head of security at Washington College. "We cannot control a criminal's ability or desire; however, we can control the opportunity by locking doors. 'Operation Identification' (marking valuables with the owner's drivers license number), and increasing the students' awareness of the potential of crime."

Quinn is originally from the Philadelphia area, Upper Darby. He spent four years in the army as a combat engineer sergeant with two years in Vietnam.

A 1976 graduate of Delaware County Community College, Quinn attended school at night while working as an insurance underwriter in downtown Philadelphia during the day. He received a degree in the administration of justice. During the summer after graduation Quinn worked as a policeman in Wildwood, New Jersey. In November he took a job with the Upper Darby Police Department.

"I was brought to Chestertown because of a joke," Quinn remarked. "A friend of mine sent me a 'help wanted Chestertown Police Department' ad as a joke. I decided to give up the frustrations of city life for the rural surroundings." In May of 1977 he moved to Chestertown and joined the police force.

In February of 1978 he was married. His wife, Linda, is also a graduate of D.C.C.C. with a degree in business management. Their "only child" is a golden retriever, "Mr. Beau Jangles." Quinn says, "I changed the spelling of his name to add a little French class."

After three and a half years with the Chestertown Police Department, Quinn decided to take the position as head of security on campus. "I've always wanted to get my bachelor's," he said, "It's hard to work shift work and get a degree. Then the opportunity came to work and get a degree." His prospective major is Sociology.

Quinn's ultimate goal is to become a state or federal agent, preferably dealing with juveniles. He is still a reserve officer for C.T.P.D. This, he hopes, will increase cooperation between the town and college.

Currently, Quinn is teaching crime prevention training courses at Kent County High School. He has certification as a training officer from the State of Maryland and wants to give seminars on crime prevention on campus, hopefully to be started by September. "I want to educate the students in crime prevention. The guards and police alone cannot control crime."

"We are here to help the students not to hinder them," Quinn said. "We're not looking for student crime, such as smoking pot. Our job is to protect their lives and college property." He emphasizes college property, "I won't tolerate vandalism." One of his objectives is to develop better relations between the students and security as well as between the college and the town.

"I also hope to make up some type of control of who's coming in these doors," he said. This could involve having an intercom system with someone stationed at a desk operating it. The student at the desk would call the student's room to announce the visitor. The student would come to escort the visitor to the room. This proposal is up for discussion and will not be forced on the students. Quinn feels that the female students will probably want this system because it would make sure that unauthorized persons do not wander the halls of the dorms. It would provide for some student employment also. During the course of a night several students can each work a four-hour shift

Another of his proposals is key control, involving strict records of people with school keys. There have been some problems keeping track of master keys with people dropping out of school or when they leave for the summer.

Currently Quinn is making arrangements to have 700 copies of "Basic Guidelines for Victims of Rape and Sexual Offenses", a pamphlet published by the Maryland Commission for Women printed for distribution. "We can't just forget about it (the rape). It'll keep happening again if it's forgotten," he said. "We need to know how to handle it"

"If we have one rape here a year chances are we have two possibly three," he stated. "Most rapes are not reported whether because of a fear of court or mentioning the subject. The only way to control rape is to start locking doors behind yourselves and have the check-in desks to keep anyone who doesn't belong out."

There are two main obstacles to Quinn's proposals. One is student apathy. "I need your support," he said. The other is what the college can afford to impliement these projects.

"The students are prey," he commented." I think last semester showed this. The worst crimes in town last semester were committed on the Washington College campus. The students are prey to the criminal element. They make the pickings easy, by leaving vaiuables sitting out in the open and by leaving doors unlocked."

Quinn feels that the students need to challenge people who they don't recognize. "The only ones who have challenged me were the cleaning ladies. Instead, 'I can I help you' or 'are you looking for someone' A simple, friendly approach is best," he said.

Now that the students of Washington College have a dedicated security force perhaps a safer feeling will prevail over the campus. However, in order for the revamped system to work students will have to cooperate with it. Quinn remarked," I feel that the students will cooperate and it will work".

Spires Replaces Day for Semester

by CHRISTY HOLT

This semester the creative writing students of Washington College have a new instructor, Elizabath Spires. She is replacing Robert Day while he spends a semester as a writer-in-residence at the University of Iowa. Spires will be taking over his creative writing workshops, and also teaching a special topics course, "The Long Poem since 1945." This course will be enhanced by at least two poetry readings by poets the course will cover. One of those readings is already scheduled for April and will be by poet John Ashberry.

Spires is originally from Ohio, but has been living in Baltimore, where she attended Johns Kopkins University as a graduate student. She received her Masters of Arts from Johns Hopkins in 1979. Since then she has been writing poetry and doing freelance work for an educational publisher, writing children's readers. She has finished a book of twenty two of her poems entitled Globe. The book will be published by Wesley University this spring. She also wrote a children's book about a sailing star which she hopes will be published this summer.

Spire's poetry has been published in several magazines including The New Yorker, Mademoiselle, Poetry, The Yale Review, The Parisian Review, and The American Review. She also has published a chapbook (pamphlet of poetry) titled Boardwalk, and The Paris Review will be publishing an interview she did with the late Elizabeth Bishop, a poet.

Spires said that she has been interested in writing since she was a child, and that she first began "attempting" poetry when she was in high school. She began writing more seriously when she was in college. She is also interested in writing literary criticism. What is after Washington College for Elizabeth Spires? She says she would like to "teach, finish a second book of poems, and travel."

Graham Wins Photography Prize in Kodak Contest

by GINGER KURAPKA

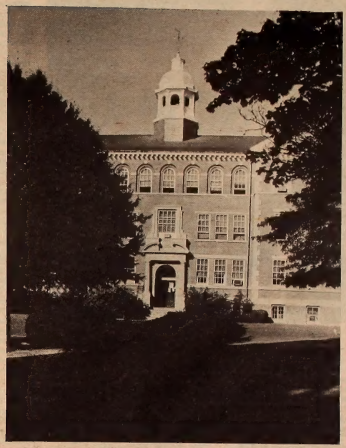
The picture is one of 800 selected from about 375,000 said Graham, was entered in the contest after winning in a Wilmington, Delaware News Journal Paper's contest. Graham received a $100 savings bond for the Wilmington Contest, and a $75 savings bond and commemorative plate in the Kodak contest.



The photo, says Graham, is a good example of a "decisive moment." "Technically, the picture isn't all that good, but after the goal, I just kept snapping pictures. This one was the last frame on the roll." Taking good pictures, according to Graham is a combination of finding decisive moments, and "having the technique and equipment in the darkroom. I see myself in a childlike stage in photography compared to people like Weston, Cartier Bresson and Adams."

Graham, a senior history major, has been taking pi tures since "sixth grade, but seriously since tenth grade, seriously meaning doing my own processing." Graham taught himself how to develop his film in High School by "reading the charts in the darkroom." Other than a sixth grade photography course, the only formal instruction he has had was a summer course at the University of Delaware last summer, which he feels was very beneficial.

Graham would like to see a photography course taught here. "It would be a great liberal arts course because you have to learn chemistry, composition and some art as well as other areas." He continued, "photography to me is really important because it gives me a chance to express myself."

The future's uncertain at the moment for Graham, but whatever field he ends up in, photography will be a part of his life. "Winning the prize is a great beginning. But I have to put it in perspective. It's just one stair in the staircase, and it's a long way up."

Fahsbender Studied, Worked in Spain

by JEFF ALDERSON

"When someone asks about a year and a half in Spain how can you condense it into a few words? You can't with all of the things you experience there," said Laura Fahsbender, a senior Spanish and American Studies major. Laura studied for a year at the Institute of European Studies in Madrid and then took a semester off to work in Madrid.

The students Laura went to school with were all Americans while the professors were all Spanish and the classes were taught in Spanish. "It would definitely have been better if I could have studied with Spaniards," she stated. "We weren't required to speak only Spanish outside of classes." If she had been required to speak Spanish outside class as well, Laura feels that this would have been a better chance to master the language.

Her main reason for going to Spain was to learn Spanish. She also wanted to travel and see some of her friends over there.

While in Spain, Laura lived with a family and took care of their children. "The mother and father worked. Two of the three children went to school so my main duty was to take care of the twoyear-old girl," Laura said. "I didn't participate in family life. They were together at nights and weekends but I wasn't there on weekends and rarely around at night." Yet, Laura was treated more like part of the family than like a maid. "I did have to make lunch and get the children off to school."

Laura attended school from September to May and traveled during the summer. From the September to December she had a job and lived on her own to improve her Spanish. Laura feels that the experience was a good one.

While in Spain, Laura taught English in private classes to anyone who wanted to learn. These people were mainly those who needed the basics in English for business, or as students, or people hoping to travel.

Some of the highlights of her stay included a rail trip through Europe and her last four months in Spain. "During those last four months I spoke a lot of Spanish and met a lot of Spanish friends ," she remarked.

"I had a fantastic time," she said. "I miss the easygoing life style, the openness of the people, and the day-to-day living." Her favorite aspect of Spain was the people. "They're very loving people."

Knowing a second language has its advantages as Laura discovered. "It's amazing to be able to converse with someone in another language," Laura commented. "I was sitting on a plane on the way back home and could speak to all these people because I know Spanish."

Christmas time proved to be the worst part of her stay. "I missed my family and the festivities and the U.S. and all of the wonderful things it has to offer."

Laura definitely feels that going to Spain was a very rewarding experience."I wanted to experience a different culture, a different life."

Innocence Abroad

The Ugly American in Paris

by PETER TURCHI

Here is yet another installment from our correspondent in Europe; Pete Turchi.

My last day in Paris was miserable. In the afternoon I was standing on the second floor of the Rodin museum when I noticed it was raining. Later, when I walked around the gardens to see The Thinker (smaller than the one we had seen in the tour of Walters Art Gallery in sixth grade) and Gates of Hell, it stopped, so I decided to walk over to the Eiffel Tower. I had promised a girl I would write to her from Paris, and I wanted to send her a souvenir. As soon as I passed the subway station, though, when I was in front of Invalides, where Napoleon is buried, it started to rain. I didn't have an umbrella, so I just walked a little faster. It rained harder.

In a few minutes my jacket was soaked and I was freezing. I stopped in a bakery and ate something I couldn't pronounce. When I went back out it was still raining, and I had lost sight of the tower. The largest landmark in Paris, and I couldn't find it. On my way through an empty park I saw a phone booth, so I ran inside to get out of the rain. The rain didn't slow down, but at least I wasn't getting any wetter. In a minute, though, I saw a man across the street, coming over to use the phone. I started to wipe my glasses on my shirt, but it was saturated. The man was across the street, just a few steps from the phone booth. I turned around and picked up the receiver. Suddenly I had an idea. I looked at my watch—2:30. 8:30 in the morning at home. A girl in the subway had told me that for one franc, about 25¢, you could call the United States for ten seconds.

I immediately thought of a friend I wanted to say Merry Christmas to, so I took some change out of my pocket, put one franc in the slot, dialed the international exchange, another number, the area code, and the phone number. The man from across the street, a businessman in a hurry, stood with a standing outside the door of the booth, under an umbrella. He was standing in a puddle.

The phone rang. I waited. Ten seconds isn't very long. The phone rang a few more times. Somebody had to be home. The man outside didn't look happy. Finally, someone picked up the phone.

I had my watch in front of me. "Nick? Nick?" Eight seconds left.

"What?"

"Merry Christmas, Nick!" I paused to let him respond in the last three seconds.

A man answered. "Nobody named Nick lives here."

He hung up. Some stranger had the nerve to hang up on an international phone call. I resisted the urge to give up—it was still raining. I thought for a minute. I must have dialed the wrong number—the voice on the phone was definately American, definitely from the Eastern Shore of Maryland. I poked another franc into the slot and started dialing. The man outside sneezed.

The phone rang eight times. As soon as I heard a click I started talking.

"Nick? Nick?"

There was a pause, then the same voice, angry. "You better stop ringing this goddamned phone, boy!" With that he dropped the receiver, probably on purpose.

I grabbed my change and slammed my way out of the phone booth, past the man in black, cursing out loud at some redneck 3500 miles away. I stomped through the puddles to the Eiffel Tower, ignoring the rain and cursing at the people passing by. A women on the sidewalk pulled her child to the sidewalk. The people standing under the canopy of the souvenir stand got a big kick out of it, even though I couldn't understand what they were saying. A big black man threw me a franc and soon we were all laughing, and I went to the stand and bought the souvenir, then went back out into the rain, laughing.

It's hard to stay mad in Paris. It's a wonderful city, with the museums and monuments of Washington D.C., the life of New York, and the music and here-we-are-at-one-of-the-corners-of-the-earth feeling of San Francisco. Despite what people had told me to expect, the people were friendly, even though I rarely knew the bad syntax I was using in French, and a few select words including cafe, boutique, cul-de-sac and brassiere.

The Latin Quarter is cheap, made for students and other polite derelicts, and the bakeries are wonderful. There is always a warm loaf of french bread for 50¢, or any one of a hundred beautiful pastries. And the wine is cheap, cheaper than milk. It would be easy to retire to Paris and feast in a small room in Odeon, if it weren't for the fact that Paris will not let you stay in your room. The Louvre alone demands the constant attention—Winged Victory and the Venus de Milo and the Mona Lisa may steal the headlines, but the hundred of other paintings and sculptures fight for your attention. And, on a smaller scale, the short, ugly Jeu de Paume, the museum of impressionism, houses incredible paintings by Degas, Monet, Pissaro, Renoir and Van Gogh. It ain't bad when the worst thing to Paris is a Catholic who has never been to church.

And art is only a small part of Paris. The monuments along the Champs Elysee are the pride of a nation. At one end is the Arc de Triomphe, in the middle of a huge, busy traffic circle where insane European drivers make 270 degree turns at over 60 miles per hour. The arch itself is very large, with a convenient aisle where you can watch an eight-minute film in French or English. Back on the street level are an eternal flame and a grave of unknowns which are constantly changed. On the sides of the Arch are long lists of names, probably of the people killed trying to cross the traffic circle.

All the monuments and museums are as wonderful as those high school French teachers say they are. And on the Moulin Rouge the signs and stores are blatant, like the women in fur coats standing in the doorways. There is a seamy side to Paris, but even that is self-conscious: the whores aren't sad but smiling, and the shopkeepers in the red light district are like shopkeepers anywhere else, and in the middle of the Moulin Rouge is an amuser.sent arcade with shooting galleries and three-for-a-bursting booths and fortune tellers. The difference between the Moulin Rouge and other amusement arcades is that every third booth is a peep show or a strip show, open to anyone for five francs (hail price for members of the military and students).

The time I most enjoyed Paris, though, was one afternoon when the friend I was travelling with and I went to Montmartre. There is a famous cemetery there, and we say it but couldn't find a way to get in, so we walked around the ten-foot-high walls for a while. On the way we got a large bottle of Fanta orange, the international soft drink, and within an hour we were back where we started, just as we were about to give up and go to the Sacre Coeur, I spotted a stairway. We went down to the street below and found the entrance.

Just inside the gate we were stopped by a guard, so I used my complete French vocabulary to tell him that we were American tourists who didn't speak much French, and that we just wanted to look around. He was alone in the guard house and, without saying anything, he walked out, across the entrance, to where a map hung in a glass case. He pointed to a line in the middle of the cemetery and started talking.

He talked for nearly an hour. He told us about composers, and poets, and the brother of the secretary of the treasury for Napoleon—all the famous people in the cemetery. We could barely understand a word, but he made us help him act out the stories about the writers and the cabaret show-girls, and he laughed when we were supposed to laugh, and when he pointed to us we acted out the whiskey and cigarettes on his breath.

He finally sent us off, and we headed in the direction he had shown us on the map. The names didn't mean anything but the sepulchres and monuments were huge—the largest were the size of small buildings. On the whole the cemetery was a small city, a memorial above ground to those below it. We walked in the shade for a while, and at one point we stopped to read the inscription on a moss-covered stone. When we looked up we saw three cats sitting on the monument next to us, but when we moved towards them they ran away. Some of the sepulchres were small rooms, where you could go in and say a prayer for the dead, but most of the stained-glass windows were broken, and the doors were rusted. In one there was a chair with the springs hanging down to the ground.

A little while later, at the west end of the cemetery, we saw a cat sitting in a flower urn. I stopped to take a picture. When I looked up after winding the film we were surrounded by over a dozen cats, some black, some white, all keeping their distance. We sat down on a bench and their leader, a thin gray mutt of a cat, came up to greet us. We played with it and offered it the last drop of our Fanta orange, but he wasn't interested. We got up and the gray cat followed us for the rest of the afternoon, but none of the others would come to us. Once in a while we would turn and there, balancing on the elbow of a member of the Legion of Honor, would be one of the cats, watching us from across the lane.

We saw the tomb of a Polish poet, with a sash from the Polish embassy in France around some fresh flowers, and Alexander Dumas' grave, which had a life-size sculpture of him lying prone under a canopy. On the underside of the canopy was an inscription he had written, in French, something to the effect that he lived, and now was buried, where he was happy. We were walking away from his grave when we heard the first sound of the afternoon caused by something aside from the wind or a clumsy cat—some workmen were coming towards us. We looked down the lane and there was a black van, followed by about twenty cars. Someone was being buried at Montmartre. We saw the friends and relatives, fifty or so of them, and the widow, supported by a man and another woman, as they each passed the grave and put a flower on the plain wooden casket. After a while my friend and I and the gray cat left our post, behind Hector Berlioz' tombstone, and walked to the gate of the cemetery. The guard was busy talking to one of the men from the funeral parlor in the guard house, and the cat disappeared behind a world-famous aviator.

All in all, it was a wonderful afternoon—three weeks later I was back in Paris and I stopped back at Montmartre with a girl I know and we had bread and cheese and red win deep in one of the corners of the cemetery. And unless you're a little macabre, or a character in Dostoevsky's dramatist short story, it's hard to have a good time in a cemetery. And maybe it just couldn't happen anywhere else.

If I sound a little crazy about Paris, it's because I am. The night before I left the city to go to the Riviera my friend and I and a girl we met on the subway went to Notre Dame, a beautiful cathedral, to hear Christmas carols. That's when I realized that I was irrationally in love with Paris. I'm poor and I don't know French, but Paris has treated me like one of her finest suitors. She's easy to love; she is the coy, knowing seductress of the Moulin Rouge, the maternal embrace of Notre Dame and the Sacre Coeur, the proud displayer of the Arc de Triomphe and La Place de La Concorde, the cultural sophisticate of the Louvre, the philosopher of a quiet afternoon at Montmartre, and the warmth and friendliness of the family who owned the Hotel Flatters in the Latin Quarter. Paris is a group of Frenchmen laughing with an American singing in the rain under the Eiffel Tower. She is never a liar and never innocent, but always romantic and tempting, refusing to reveal all of her charms. Paris is everyone's favorite girl; all the boys will come to her wedding to give her away, but every one of them will wish they could be the one taking her home.

Shoremen Edged in Two Conference Games

by HARRY MCENROE
Sports Editor

The Washington College basketball team hosted three opposing squads at Cain Athletic Center this past week and managed to defeat only Mary Washington, as the Shoremen lost two Cliff-hangers to conference rivals Ursinus and Swarthmore.

In last Saturday's 88-61 drubbing of Mary Washington, the Shore cagers won sweet revenge over a squad dominated by thesame lineup which had edged them the year before. Sophomore guard Dave Blackwell led the winning effort with 22 points, while junior captain Joe Moye contributed 15.

On Tuesday, following their two best efforts of the still-young season against Johns Hopkins and Mayr Washington, the Shoreman suffered a heartbreaking 70-69 loss to a veteran Ursinus team. Although the cagers held a seven point half-time lead, the combination of a tough Ursinus game and the Shoremen's failure to get back on defense enabled the Bears to take the lead. After Ursinus's two senior guards, Dave Mobley and Mike Brophy, both missed on foul shots which could have put the game away, the cagers failed to capitalize on their opportunity to win the game when they missed foul shots in two crucial one-and-one situations in the closing seconds. Joe Moye, despite being plagued with foul trouble, led the Shoremen with 18 points.

Last night the Shoremen lost their second straight home game—a rare and disappointing feat—to another conference foe, Swarthmore, 89-83 in overtime. Again, in this contest the Shoremen surrendered a half-time lead and had to battle back in the closing minutes. The Shore cagers had the ball with 15 seconds to play but failed to score, as a tough Swarthmore defense forced Dave Blackwell to launch a last-second desperation shot which fell short, enabling the Quakers to go into overtime, where they rolled to victory. Blackwell led the home squad with 18 points, whild Joe Moye tallied 15.

SHORE NOTES:

The conference playoff situation looks dim at this point. Following last week's twin setbacks, the Shoremen MAC record is a disappointing 1-3. The Alumni game ended in a 91-91 tie. Saturday the squad faces a must-win situation at Haverford.

Blackwell Gives Cagers Boost

by BOB STRONG

If you haven't been attending our basketball games this season you're in for a pleasant surprise. This year coach Finnegan has hammered out a winning team quite worthy of support and attention. One of the key reasons for the Shoreman's winning season is a five-foot, eleven-inch sophomore named David Blackwell.

When Blackwell comes off that board with a rebound things usually happen—right now. Powerful and agile enough to out rebound players much larger than himself, David is a key factor in the aggressive, pressing tactics that the Shoiemenhave used this season. According to Hurst Deringer, editor of the Kent County News and longtime fan of the Shoremen team, Dave Blackwell's ability to get up into the air, for a man his size, is nothing short of phenomenal.

Handling a basketball is not new to Blackwell. This sport has been his passion since he was eight years old. While attending Calvert Hall High, he was given the kind of coaching he believes is essential for any maturing athlete. It was there, Blackwell admits, that he learned what being a member of a team really means. In Dave's opinion, only when one's natural desire to excell is complemented by a true team spirit does one make that first giant step toward maturing as an athlete.

Even though teamwork is a must in this sport, there is no doubt that the particular chemistry at work is enhancing Blackwell's talents. He is averaging thirteen points per game with an individual high of twenty-four points. Unquestionably, Blackwell owes much of his success to backcourt partner Craig Langwost's ability to get the ball safely down court and initiate plays that often take advantage of Blackwell's consistent accuracy within fifteen feet of the basket.

At least partially due to Dave's exceptional speed, the team has had remarkable success with high-speed, pressing tactics. Coach Finnegan explained, "By using our over-all team speed everyone, especially David, has more opportunities to perform when the floor is open and spread out. Dave's primary contribution this season has been his ability to play within our total team concept, both offensively and defensively."

When asked what were his strongest and weakest points, Blackwell said his best skills involve rebounding and consistent accuracy when shooting within fifteen feet of the basket while his weaknesses lie mostly in his defensive posture. Even though his stealing abilities led the Evening Sun to label him an outright thief, Blackwell still believes his defensive game needs the most work.

In regard to Blackwell's personality, on and off court, Associate Dean Ed Maxcy probably represents a consensus of interviewed opinion: "Dave is a special person because of his sportmanship and courtesy. He is agood athlete, and a good person. I wish we had more like him around here."

It should be pointed out that Dave Blackwell's achievements as well as those of the entire team, are the results of an enormous amount of dedication, hard work and self-sacrifice. Student-athletes at Washington College are special people in that their performance and image represent the entire college community to the general public. Their devotion to their performance, each other and Washington College should be a source of personal pride for everyone.

SGA Town Meeting

by WENDY MURPHY
News Editor

On Thursday evening, February 5, the SGA will hold a "Town Meeting" at 5:45 p.m. in the Dining Hall, the main topic of which will be "the redecoration of our scaled-down Student Center," according to Jay Young, SGA President.

A few pin ball machines have arrived and are getting a lot of use. The money received from these thus far will be used to buy paint for the area. The SGA hopes to get students to do the painting and cleaning up of that part of the Hodson basement which has been cleared.

Young called the area "a seperate entity," and said that both the college administration and the amusement company, The Downs Company, would like to see the area supervised. The SGA has a Student Facility Committee which will handle hiring a manager and workers to supervise and service the area. Service is required due to the equipment changes and the nature of the games.

The chairman of the Committee, Frank Dirks, will supervise and provide the equipment changes. Other committee members include Liz Edwardson, Ed Nordberg, Doug Brown, and Walter Foraker.

They plan to get more pinball machines, ping-pong tables and pool tables. The revenues from the area will go into the maintainence required and salaries of the workers. Any remaining funds will be put toward the construction of the Student Center. Hopes are that the Center will be completed by the end of this summer.

39 transfers this semester

Attrition rate up slightly over last year

by KATHY STRECKFUS
Assistant Editor

The rate of attrition at Washington College this year is slightly higher than last year, according to Registrar Ermon Foster.

Out of 697 full-time students last semester, 74 have not returned this semester. This is a 10.6 percent loss, about 2 percent higher than the 8.3 percent loss last year after Fall semester.

This number included 17 students who completed course requirements for graduation last semester, though their senior obligations have not necessarily been completed, Foster said.

Eighteen students were dismissed for academic deficiency last semester, 3 more than last year. Eleven were sophomores and six were freshmen.

The rest of the students withdrew for various other reasons, such as transfer to another college, loss of financial aid, or personal reasons, Foster said.

The loss this semester consisted of 26 freshmen out of a class of 220, 21 sophomores out of 203, 11 juniors out of 129, and 17 seniors out of 145.

"We're graduating slightly over 50 percent of each original class," Foster said.

New Students offset loss

"You lose some, but you get some in," Foster said. There are 39 new full-time students this semester. The group of transfers and returning students consist of 14 freshmen, 12 sophomore 9 juniors, and 4 seniors.

Although 74 students left the college for various reasons, the net loss is only 35 because of incoming students, Foster said.

The full-time enrollment this semester is 656. The total full-time equivalent, including part-time students, continuing education enrollment and more able High School students, is 672. The full-time equivalent last semester was 716.

Reasons for withdrawal

Dean of Students Maureen Kelley is studying the reasons why students withdraw from the College.

Retention Committee looking for answers to attrition

by KATHY STRECKFUS
Assistant Editor

"We want to find out if the students have any reservations about Washington College, and if we can do something about it, we want to do it now," says Jody Dudderar, Associate Director of Admissions.

On Post-Freshman Day, students will discuss what they expected from the College before they arrived as freshmen, and whether or not those expectations have been met, said Dudderar.

The Admissions Department has two major objectives for Post-Freshman Day. Director of Admissions Mickey DiMaggio said, "It's for recruiting purposes. We want to see if we're telling people what Washington College really offers."

A second objective is "to study retention, to study why students stay here," he said. "We want to follow up, to find out what students that we recruited and enrolled have to say."

The discussions will be beneficial to the students as well as to the Admissions Office, according to DiMaggio. "We want to find out how the College can improve," he said.

Detailed questionnaires designed to obtain student reaction to various areas of the College were sent to freshmen through student mail along with invitations. Questionnaires, however, do not substitute for talking to the students directly, said Dudderar.

In Minta Martin Lounge Sunday from 6-8 p.m., the Admissions Staff will divide the freshmen into four smaller gouups. Each member of the staff will lead one of the four discussion groups.

To follow up the discussions, the Admissions Staff will meet in their office in Bunting Hall to "write it down when everything is still fresh in our minds," Dudderar said.

Later, they will present the results of the questionnaires and discussions to the new Committee on Retention, "and see what they can do about it," Dudderar said.

The Committee on Retention was formed as a response to inquiries from the Board of Visitors and Governors about an attrition rate that nears 50 percent over a four-year period.

The Committee consists of DiMaggio, Dudderar, Dean of the College, Garry Clarke, Deans of Students Maureen Kelley and Ed Maxcy, Vice-President for Finance Gene Hessey, and Registrar Ermon Foster.

The Committee also plans to attend a seminar in Washington, D.C. on Feb 14 on "Reducing the Drop-Out Rate."

An says hostage release imminent

Bush and Carter are frontrunners, but Reagen and Kennedy are still in the race, says faculty

by GEOFF GARINTHER
Editor-in-Chief

Although they all agree that unseating an incumbent president is difficult and that George Bush has momentum and the media behing him, no one in the Political Science Department is counting either Ted Kennedy or Ronald Reagen out of the race for the presidency in 1980.

In fact, all four members of the department say the only thing we can be sure of is that it is still too early to tell what will happen before the nominating conventions this summer.

"I think you have to wait until after the Southern primaries," said Associate Professor Dan Premo.

Assistant Professor John Taylor agreed that any predictions would be premature. "The presidential race is a process of elimination, and I think you'll know sooner who's not going to be in it than who will be."

"Too early to count Kennedy out"

One candidate no one is counting out of the race—yet—is Kennedy.

"I was very disappointed in Kennedy's initial showing," said Taylor. "I thought he offered virtually nothing.

"(But) I think it's too early to count Kennedy out of it ... I think he's going to give Carter a run for his money."

Dr. Tai Sung An, Chairman of the Department, said, "I'd never underestimate Kennedy, but he's in big trouble." Meaning that Carter is the clear front runner for now.

And Assistant Professor Howard-sSilver said "It takes something of major proportion—something cataclysmic or catastrophic—to defeat an incumbent. (But) to predict that Carter's got it locked up and that Kennedy's finished will depend on events."

Release of hostages imminent, says An

One such event, according to An, would be the release of the 50 Americans being held hostage in Tehran.

"I think they may be released in the near future," he says. That, he adds, would trigger a barrage of criticism directed at Carter's foreign policy from other candidates.

"His present popularity stands on a very shaky foundation," said An. "I'm disenchanted with Carter. His domestic economic policy is a disaster and his foreign policy has many holes."

Taylor is more sympathetic to Carter. "Certainly he's not a magnetic politician, but I think he's been trying to tackle the right issues."

Taylor agrees with An, however, concerning Carter's shaky footing in Iran and Afghanistan. "I like the comment George Will made, that Carter may have difficulty in sustaining for nine months the feeling that Iran and Afghanistan are foreign policy victories for the U.S."

"On-the-job training" for Carter

Silver, too, attributes Carter's current popularity to his handling of the foreign crisis, but says he may remain popular on his own merits. "I had the feeling when Iran started that Carter

Facing realities

Big things are happening in the Academic Council, things that may significantly affect students as early as the year after next. Nothing is more important—or likely to be more controversial—than the Council's proposal requiring students to demonstrate competence in mathematics in order to graduate.

Under the current proposal, this competence could be demonstrated in one of three ways:

(1) By receiving a high score on the Mathematics Placement Examination administered to all freshmen (a "high" score would be defined by the Math Department).

(2) By receiving an A in either Computer Science 101 or Mathematics 103 or 109, or a B in Mathematics 111 or 112.

(3) By passing a Competence Examination in Mathematics administered by the College; students would have three chances to pass, with remedial help available after each unsuccessful attempt.

The proposal still must go before the faculty, where it may face tough opposition. But the costs of this requirement—extra work for everyone from students to the Registrar—are justified by the guarantee that graduates will have at least minimal competence in mathematics.

Still to come from the Council is a proposal for improving competence in English. The College is finally facing what many academicians have for some time seen as a reality—the need to get back to basics.

was going to get re-elected. But I also think in some ways Carter has learned a lot in four years. He's had on-the-job training.

"He also may have overcome the leadership question that was so prevalent last summer. The polls seem to suggest that he has caught Kennedy in terms of his leadership capabilities."

Silver says Carter may have one more advantage over Kennedy.

"I don't think Kennedy's as bright as Carter. Carter's one of the more intelligent presidents we've had."

Republican's "inscrutable"

The other race appears even less clearcut than the Democrat's. The Grand Old Party, says An, "is inscrutable."

"Bush has momentum," said Silver, "buy I'm not so sure it's over and that he's the nominee and that Reagen won't bounce back.

"The thing that Bush has going for him," added Silver, "is, his 'electability'" That is his ability to defeat the Democratic nominee in the general election—giving Bush the advantage over a hard-line conservative like Reagan.

Silver says both Bush and Howard Baker, despite their moderate reputations, "can only be considered moderate in the narrowest sense of the political spectrum.

"I think all of the Republicans are very conservative, with the exception of John Anderson, and unfortunately he'll win the nomination."

Carter not "a real Democrat"

As for predictions, Taylor and Premo both say it is far too early. An says he would sooner not vote than cast a ballot for Carter or Reagen, and Silver, a Democrat, is "distressed" by the whole process.

"I buy Arthur Schlesinger's argument," he said, "that Carter is not a realDemocrat domestically. And I have real problems with Kennedy's character."

that the largest single reason is transfer to schools that offer business-oriented programs that Washington does not offer.

"But some leave for reasons that have nothing to do with the academic program." Some of these reasons are the small size of the College, its rural location and the social reasons.

Kelley said that some students, especially women, leave because they dislike the social atmosphere. "If you're not comfortable at large parties and dances, there aren't too many alternatives. The social life here depends on a party format," Kalley said.

Post-Freshmen Day

In an effort to investigate why students leave the College, Director of Admissions Mickey DiMaggio has formed a Committee on Retention.

The admissions staff will offer "Post-Freshman Day" this Sunday from 6-8 p.m. to discuss freshmen reactions to their first semester here. All freshmen are invited.

Applications down, acceptances up

Although the Admissions Office has received fewer applications in comparison to this time last year, the number of acceptances is slightly higher, according to Director of Admissions Mickey DiMaggio.

This year, 357 applications have been received and 153 have been accepted. Last year, 143 applications had been accepted out of 404 received.

The number of female acceptances is higher this year. Eighty-four women have been accepted in comparison to 65 last year. DiMaggio said he is "delighted" about that increase.

Eleven of the accepted applicants have paid their deposits compared to 17 last year.

DiMaggio said that the number of paid deposits is the most important factor after the May 1 deadline.

The drop in the number of applications, DiMaggio said, may be because "last year was an unusually big year in applications.

Notes on Off The Wall

"Chocolate Milk and Batteries (TO GO)"?

By SUE JAMES

An unusual album title? Not for Baltimore-based rock band, Off the Wall, which jammed the night away in Hodson Hall last Saturday with an energetic crowd of approximately one hundred people, many "feeling no pain" from the 25¢ drafts that were available.

Off the Wall is not an unheard-of band. In a recent issue of the Unicorn Times a Baltimore-Washington newspaper for local bands, Off the Wall placed in seven categories in the listing for Best Local Bands. Their awards included second best Original 45, second best Vocalist, Best Drummer, Best Bass, and Best Guitar.

Steve, a member of the band, who performs vocals, percussion, and the harmonica for Off the Wall said, "We've been together for four years, with the exception of Dayton (the drummer)." Before Dayton joined the band, finding the right drummer was a major problem. Dayton was apparently the right choice as Steve pointed out that no less that fifteen drumming auditions were held.

There is a variety of instrumentation in Off the Wall. "There are really no leads in anything," Steve remarked. They are considered a variety rock band, playing from hard to mellow rock with some jazz; the instruments range from Yamaha acoustic grand piano to saxophone.

Rock will survive"

Rock in the long run will survive," Steve said. "Punk and New Wave are 'fad' rock, but they are the cause of disco going down hill. Now the popularity of disco will continue, and I don't mean to put down punk and New Wave. Actually, what I feel about New Wave and Punk is an irrelevant question. Rock will survive them all."

Off the Wall played a lot of original material during their sets. The quality of this originality may make their name known in the rock industry. "Chocolate Milk and Batteries(To Go)", is scheduled for release this summer. A brass section, included in the studio arrangements, will produce a jazz, rock, and blues combination. At the very least, the popularity of Off the Wall should bring them back to Chestertown sometime soon.

Hard work spells S-U-C-C-E-S-S for cheerleaders

by PETE TURCHI
News Editor

It is six on a Tuesday in Cain Memorial Gym, but it could just as easily be any other day of the week between late October and early February. Two young men in shorts shoot baskets at the far end of the gym as two hunters stand against the bleachers, talking to them. They are not alone, however; ten girls in pink T-shirts and red shorts are seated in the middle of the gym floor, doing various stretching exercises. They are the Washington College cheerleaders.

An older girl in sweat pants and a gray sweatshirt sits a little bit outside of the circle, against the bleachers. She is calm and relaxed, as are all the girls. The general atmosphere is that of a group of friends at Miss D's, or possibly sorority sisters before a meeting. The girls are laughing and lounging on the floor. A blond talks softly to herself, barely moving her arms and legs, trying to recall one of the cheers.

Jani Gabriel, the captain of the squad, stands up to officially begin the practice. Like all of the practices, this one will last between one and two hours and will consist mostly of trying new cheers and adjusting positions for one less or one more girl.

The older girl with dirty-blond hair and soft eyes is Cindi Patchen, a '78 graduate who was an active athlete at Washington and, currently coaches for the volleyball and softball teams. Six girls cheered full-time last year, five of whom returned for a second season. The full turnout for tryouts this year, however, was eighteen girls.

Cindi stands up and the girls gather around her. Today they want to try to build a ten-man pyramid, but some of them are hesitant. After some joking around four of the girls get on the floor to form the base. The second three girls climb on. "Ow," someone says, "that's my back."

"Hey, watch your knee."

"Hurry!" Julie Scott, the smallest of the girls, climbs on top of the pyramid.

"Oh my God," one of the girls on the bottom says. Julie slips off and the others quickly leave their positions. It does not look like the pyramid is going to be very popular.

"My back, I think you broke it," the blond complains. The scoreboard on the far wall of the gym lists the team rosters for Washington and Swarthmore. Below those the board says, "NEXT HOME GAME FEB. 9 URSINUS SAT. 7:00"—the basketball team's last home game and also, unless the team makes it into the playoffs, the last time the girls will be able to cheer in front of a crowd.

The basketball players and hunters have left, leaving one freshman who has gotten bored with his basketball and comes over to talk to the girls. He is enlisted to get on the bottom of the pyramid as they try again. This time they are not as successful; Julie only manages to stay on top for a second.

"Let's try a 3-2-1," someone suggests.

"The knees on the floor are the killer," someone else says.

Jani Gabriel is captain this year because, in her own words, "we needed someone to start the cheers and to organize things on the floor. Last year I saw one of the signs Cindi put up and I thought it was a shame...that there weren't any cheerleaders, so I called Julie and we went out." When asked about the cheers Jani says that the crowds' favorite is something called "The Victory Dunk." "We stand in a line going toward the basket," she says. "The line gets higher and higher, and at the end is a girl sitting on another girl's shoulders. We pass the ball down and the last girl is supposed to dunk it, but we almost always miss. But the crowd yells for it." She is tired and finds it hard to explain the cheers without actually doing them. "We have two 'success' cheers," she says, "and some from high school, but a lot of them we made up ourselves."

The girls have decided to try one girl in front, followed by a three-man pyramid, behind which is a six-man pyramid. They count and realize that this combination uses exactly ten girls, and some of them call out, laughing, while others complain about this new variation. Cindi sees a basketball nearby and heaves it toward the backboard.

"I'm not sure what you'd call me," she says. "I feel like I don't do anything. I cheered my freshman year, but after they didn't have them in my senior year I wanted to get them back together. I think cheerleaders are fun to have. Sometimes the guys hear 'em on the court, and it adds someting to the sport." Cindi is most insistent, though, when she says, "The girls are really dedicated. They practice five days a week, and they're a lot of fun. Sometimes I don't think they get enough credit. It would be nice for someone to say, "Hey, good job,"'

The cheerleaders, all freshmen and sophomores, have been practicing for over an hour and they have to move out of the main gym. As the practice continues the girls decide that the new cheer will have to wait until next year. One of them protests. "Next year? We did all that for nothing"!

Duncan's journey into the "real world"

By NICK NAPPO
Fine Arts Editor

Every Tuesday and Thursday morning before the batter hits the griddle, senior Bonnie Nelle Duncan is up and out, heading—in "a 1977 white Monte Carlo with maroon interiors"—for the Annapolis headquarters of Maryland Magazine.

Talking about her journalism internship at Maryland, Duncan will plunge right into offbeat descriptions of her car; her stint as Elm editor-in-chief, or of the College in general. After all, she's a writer, or would like to be.

"My goal is to write the great American novel," she states flatly. "I consider myself a creative writer—awful phrase—rather than a journalist." But other writers whose footsteps she wouldn't mind following have started in newsprint, and two years with this paper (and her present position as Pegasus editor) lead Bonnie to call herself "the closest thing we have to a journalism major." So when the magazine asked a number of Maryland colleges last October for internship applicants, she was Washington's natural candidate. After the initial contact, she was selected over the other applicants.

"We're pleased she was picked. It will be good for Bonnie, good for the College," says English Department Chairman Nancy Talum; "but most of all it will be good for the Department. We want students to know that reading and writing are viable skills in the world out there."

"The Maryland program is my sojourn into the real world," echoes Bonnie. Running the Elm was a little unreal. I felt like I was going for a Masters in Abnormal Psychology. At Maryland's other journalism intern, she notes, is a 43-year -old wife and mother, as well as a practicing psychiatrist.

"Seriously, the Elm editorship gave me good background in most phases of production except working with color and direct marketing—which I'm learning now."

The two interns join a full-time staff of seven, all of them women. Maryland Magazine, a quarterly, is the publication of the Maryland Department of Economics and Community Development. In print eleven years, it has about 30,000 paying subscribers and recently won an Award for Excellence from the Atlantic Press Association. Bonnie thinks it is one of the best regional publications she's seen. The copies in Miller Library are glossy, full-colored and handsomely crafted.

When Bonnie arrived at the magazine she was given the title of Projects Coordinator, and the projects to go with it. She must design a demographic survey of readership for an upcoming subscription campaign ("fortunately Dr. Brown's statistics course is fresh in my mind"); she has to run a photography contest; she will supervise production of the magazine's 1981 calendar.

Hard work, but not without its excitement. Bonnie reports meeting "lots of political types," she lunched with the chairman of the Maryland-Delaware Press Association, and she will attend a debate on the magazine's financial status at State House. Various writers, artists, and photographers come over to discuss work. "James Michener dropped by the office on Tuesday."

What all this has already taught her is that the business of running a magazine is business. "So much depends on packaging and promoting a saleable product. My editor calls the actual literary and editorial duties 'the icing on the cake'."

Since Bonnie is the first Washington College student the program has taken on, she won't be getting stipend or salary. The English Department is meeting expenses for the trips there and back.

When that big old 1977 white Monte Carlo returns in the evening, as dinner is ending, Bonnie is always struck, she says, by the contrast between the College and the place she's just left. "The contrast should not be quite so evident, considering that the expressed purpose of this kind of education is to prepare you to cope with life outside. Sometimes I think this place is a four-year playground for the overprivileged." She pauses, and mentions that she's applied for the Masters program of print journalism at American University. "Of course," she adds, "there is a handful of people here who have a sense of who they are, and where they are going."

"Dreaded road disease" afflicts MAC

Shoremen take 3 of 4 during homestand

by RICH SCHATZMAN
Sports Editor

"I can't understand it," said Captain Joe Moye after the Shoremen's Monday night trouncing of Swathmore College. "We are really tough at home, but we can't do bleep on the road." WC holds a 2-6 record in other gyms while they are 6-3 in Cain Athletic Center. During their four game home stand that concluded Monday night, they were 3-1, losing only to Western Maryland.

The final score of the Western Maryland game was 74-65—a large improvement over the 95-64 game played earlier in the year at the Green Terrors gym. In the second defeat, last Thursday night, the Shoremen played fine defense, but shot only 43 percent from the field. Moye led WC with 15 points and David Blackwell added 14.

Last Saturday night the Shoremen hosted Delaware Valley College of Pennsylvania, and the result was a 91-75 WC victory. This was caused by a combination of some fine offensive punch by the Shoremen and a shabby man-to-man defense from Delaware Valley. Six Shoremen scored in double figures led by Blackwell's 16 points. However, the highlight of this game was Paul Hynson's surprise 12 point performance off the bench. Hynson had seen very little action until then.

Monday night was the Craig Langwest Show as he turned in his finest performance of the season. Craig shot extremely well from the field, played a fine floor game, and led the Shoremen with 20 points in their 88-62 blowout of Swarthmore. Blackwell and Jim Corey added 14 apiece and Joe Moye had 12 to pace the attack. For all those calling Hynson's performance against Delaware Valley a fluke, you'll have to wait for another game. He came off the bench to get 9 this game and also grabbed his share of rebounds. The 26 point victory was a far cry from the 16 point defeat WC suffered at Swarthmore.

CAGE NOTES: In the Western Maryland contest, Rich Dwyer caused a little excitement by squaring off with Lester Wallace (WM) with one second left. This caused both benches to empty, but the fight was controlled quickly. The highlight of the fight was when Carl Fornoff fell down and took the WM Coach with him.

All the teams in the MAC suffer from the dreaded road disease. Having played on the Washington College basketball team for the last three years, I think I can explain the problem. First of all, a long bus ride not only drains a player physically, but also emotionally. It is extremely difficult to get loosened up in the twenty minutes allotted and even tougher to get the adrenaline flowing. Therefore, a slow startis inevitable. Combine this with the extremely low caliber of almost every official in the league and it causes a problem. Four of the six teams in our division come from Pennsylvania, the other two from Maryland (Hopkins and WC). When a Pa. referree sees WC get off to a slow start they automatically feel that the Pa. team is better than us. Therefore, the rest of the game is called in exactly that fashion. Widener, Haverford, Ursinus, and Swarthmore get away with things they could never attempt to do down here. Of course, Maryland officials are no better. It is my opinion that something must be done very soon to correct this outrageous situation.

Carl Fornoff, the team leader in blocked shots, got another one last Thursday against Western Maryland.

With four games left, the Shoremen have a good chance at reaching the playoffs, for the second year in a row. Four wins will guarantee a spot while three will put them in fairly good shape. However, three of the games are on the road. By the time this article is read, the Shoremen will have played Haverford away. Tomorrow night they play Ursinus at home and next week they travel to Widener and Hopkins.

PREDICTIONS:
A HAVERFORD—Pa officiating gives Fords a 74-66 H win over WC
H URSINUS—We're at home—WC 84-U-76
A WIDENER—We never play well there—W81-WC-68
A HOPKINS—We're better than the Blue Jays anywhere—WC78-H-70

Bicentennial Committee Holds T-shirt Contest

by WENDY MURPHY
News Editor

The Bicentennial Steering Committe is holding a T-shirt contest as "a good way to not only celebrate the Bicentenial within the College community, but also as a vehicle for advertisement of the Bicentennial", said Dave Pointon, leader of the project.

The entrant is to design a T-shirt with either a humorous or serious original saying or drawing which depicts the Bicentennial.

Smith College, an all-female college in New York held a similar contest recently in celebration of their first 200 years. The winner was "200 years of women on top."

The winner of Washington Colege's Contest will receive a grand prize of $100 and the SGA will automatically gain all concession rights. The money taken in by the sale of the shirts will be used for there modeling of the Kent Quad. The SGA hopes to be able to hire a professional landscaper for the project.

Please submit all entries to Dave Pointon through the innercampus student mail no later than February 27.

Committee to Study English Proposal

by BILL MORTIMER
Assistant Editor

A sub-committee of the Academic Council has been formed in order to quicken the proposed changes to the English department.

"We are awfully close to something," said Dean of the College Garry Clarke. Clarke decided to form the sub-committee in order to study and change or revise, the proposed changes to the English department made by the Academic Council. The package has to be a viable one before it can go to the faculty for a final vote.

So far, Clarke said, "the sub-committee has met in two long meetings." Clarke will now draft the proposal for discussion by the Council at its meeting this coming Monday. The proposal "consists of a number of facets that will be, in essence, a freshman writing program," Clarke said. The council and sub-committee have both felt the need for required writing for those students who need it. Also included in the proposal will be a revised course in Forms of Literature and "a Forms of World literature course which will, hopefully, be taught by the Modern Languages Department." Clarke said. He added that "we also hope to expand it (the concern for students' writing skills) to other department."

The sub-committee was formed because, Clarke said, "We thought if a smaller group could work on it, a good deal more could be accomplished." The Council also felt the need to get outside opinions. Dr. Nancy Tatum, Chairman of the English Department, Dr. Richard Gillin, assistant professor of English, and Dr. John Miller, associate professor of Philosophy were asked to serve on the sub-committee.

The formation of the sub-committee "was a big relief," said Dr. Tatum. "Things have been slow and difficult," she added. The sub-committee, she feels, has been productive.

Originally, the proposal "had a lot of problems which the council gradually recognized," Tatum said. One major problem which Tatum and the sub-committee found was "how to handle the number of people involved with the limited staff," she said. In order to make the Forms of Literature and Composition classes smaller, which would be desirable, additional course sections and a greater number of English professors would be required. However, Tatum said, the department was "refused permission to add sections to existing programs...a way had to be found out of that dilemma."

Although definite terms of the proposal are beign withheld, Tatum said that she feels "the proposal will be ready for the March meeting" of the faculty. Clarke said that he feels the Council and Sub-Committee have reached "a cohesive solution to a problem which has recognized on campus."

Student Help Improves Game Room

by GINGER KURAPKA
Editor-in-chief

The Student Center progresses slowly but surely, the latest amelioration being a new paint job and some graphics.

In a project coordinated by Frank Dirks, chairman of the SGA facilities committee, approximately 20-25 student volunteers helped paint the former mailroom outside the Coffee House last weekend.

Until work can be started on a more complete Student Center as approved by the Board of Visitors and Governors, space in the Hodson Hall Basement is being used a a game room. "Three ping pong tables are being regained," said SGA President Jay Young. "We're hoping to get a pool table, some dart boards and foosball." These additional games would be located behind the Coffee House in the are formally used by the *Pegasus*and the ELM.

The pinball machine area is currently supervised in the evenings, and Young hopes that supervision can be expanded, "that back room will be locked during the day then it's unsupervised."

The paint and other supplies used were both with profits from the pinball machines, "with plenty to spare" said Young. Frank Dirks included, "The students in their great effort over the weekend have proved they can rely on themselves and the faculty can rely on them for productive activities and anew vitality to help direct the college in the coming year."

Sophie Kerr Committee Sets Bicentennial Plans

by BILL MORTIMER
Assistant Editor

The Sophie Kerr Committee, in the first steps of their proposed Bicentenial project, has "sent out a series of letters to well-known literary figures," said chairman of the English department and of the Kerr Committee, Dr. Nancy Tatum.

So far, no replies have been received although it is still too early to tell which authors may or may not respond. "Other plans are still up in the air," said Tatum. She added that the Kerr Committee has "been waiting for word from the Central Bicentennial Committee as to when we can go ahead" with plans for the proposed series of literary events for the 1981-1982 school year.

Letters were sent to "people we would hope would come to the college...notable writers of poetry, novels, and plays," Tatum said. Although she declined to specify any names she did say that "John Barth (the novelist and a professor at Johns Hopkins is certainly one of then—he has been to the college before (in the Spring of 1979)." Other notable Maryland writers have been invited as well.

Funding for the project is still a matter which the Kerr Committee will have to face. "We won't know about fundings—federal money, for instance—until next fall," said Tatum. Request for funding for the next school year cannot be made until later in the current year. Tatum said that the Committee has drafted a letter, to be sent to various agencies, saying that "unless we get help from federarl agencies, our plans will have to be reduced."

SGA Meeting Notes

by GINNY KAMMER

The SGA meeting held on February 9th discussed the following:

•It was brought up that something should be done to beautify the area where Little House was located. Building a regular parking lot was one of the suggestions.

•Vice President Geoff Garinther presented an SAB report. Three subcommittees have been created, each with its own topic. The topics included leadership and its purpose on campus, economics and its effects on enrollment, and morale; and academic standards. There will be three meetings in which the subcommittees will present their information. On April 6th a report will be put together detailing the findings of the meeting.

•The SGA allotment for this semester will be $9250.

•The Bermuda trip planned for Spring was discussed. There is no minimum booking for thistrip and it was emphasized that the prices for the trip are very reasonable.

•The SGA is sponsoring a T-shirt contest for the Bicentennial celebration. One hundred dollars will be awarded to the person with the best design or slogan.

•SGA advisor Dr. H. Robert Fallaw requested student ideas on how to celebrate the school's Bicentennial. Students response to Bicentennial activities that have already been planned was also requested. See Dr. Peter Tapke with any comments or suggestions to offer.

Academic Hill Dorm Housing

The discussion of the future occupation and use of Hill Dormitories has reminded me of an experience which may be of interest to the students, administrators, faculty and friends of Washington College. The information provided here may offer a suggestion or two about the general use of the renovated dormitories as well as an alternative to the concept of assigning all or parts of the buildings to groups.

I attended the University of Virginia as a student in the Graduate School. During my second year on campus (1950), the University administration made a notable change in housing policy. The change affected the oldest part of the University, designed by Thomas Jefferson, "father" of the University. That area consists of the neo-classical Lawn and Ranges Buildings. It is beautifully landscaped, and has a central location in relation to virtually all university facilities. The Lawn rooms, adjacent to the Rotunda and the Pavilions, are particularly desirable. With their worn fireplaces and louvered doors, the Lawn and Ranges rooms betrayed more than a century and a quarter of occupation. The rooms were not particularly comfortable but they were obviously convenient. More important, there was a tremendous prestige associated with living in Lawn or Ranges. As of 1949, these rooms were reserved forhabitation by undergraduate students who were natives of Virginia.

In the following year, a new President of the University Colgate W. Darden, made residential access to the Lawn and Range rooms dependent on one's grades rather than on state of birth. Anyone at the university—no matter with what school or discipline he was associated—could reside on the Lawn or Ranges if his grades were high. Thereafter, the old area was peopled by students of the University's College and Professional School.

Students of medicine, law, architecture, engineering and graduate studies were thus represented as were undergraduates, both non-fraternity and fraternity men. The criterion that put all in their new and advantageous setting was academic achievement.

With the hindsight of thirty years, I do not doubt that President Darden made this move in order to place greater emphasis on the academic character and aspirations of the University. That emphasis was sorely needed in an institution whose commitment to the social side of campus life was proverbial and probably excessive.

I now realize that the move was also made to remind people of a little known fact, that Jefferson had wanted the university which he fathered to meet the needs of the nation and not simply those of the people of the state of Virginia.

A native of New York, I was able to take advantage of President Darden's policy and lived for most of my six years at the University, on the Lawn or on the Ranges. It was a great experience. I met students working in every academic area, and was exposed to an unusually wide range of perspectives, interests and values. The Library was only about five hundred feet distant.

I do not recall any particularly strong objections to the new housing policy. I presume the initiative for the move came from President Darden. He was a former governor of Virginia, a man of action and in the end, a builder who, in many ways, left a visible stamp upon the University of Virginia. It is indisputable that the University advanced academically in the post-World War II period. And it is healthy as it moves towards its own bicentennial. I have a hunch Mr. Jefferson would have been very pleased with the Darden policy.

Sincerely,
Charles R. Halstead
Professor of History

Fraternity Hill Dorm Housing: Pro

Dear Editor,

Discussing the fate of the Hill Dorms and the question of academic housing is becoming a fervor pitched pastime (sic) on Washington College's campus. Now that the question is becoming so controversial and the answer may well be near, it is time to ask a few questions about how the answer will be determined.

The faculty committee consisting of Dr. Cades, the recent Mr. Day, and others seem to have a tremendous impact on the decision. My question is why they are so close to the focal point of the discussion when in fact it will be students living in the dorms and not faculty who will be most effected. Since it will be students living in the dorms why doesn't the attitude of the question of the Hill Dorms' future by a referendum of the student body.

The question of occupancy must also be examined in determining the future use of the Hill Dorms. The Writer's Union claims to have the numbers to fill a dorm but they do not have these numbers now. They are simply stating thay they could hypothetically fill a dorm should they recieve permission to occupy one. At this time the only groups capable of filling a Hill Dorm are the existing fraternities. If a group promises to have the numbers to fill a particular dorm that organization could recruit people under the promise that they would live in a newly renovated Hill Dorm. Furthermore one can look back on the history of academic housing to see that no Spanish speaking students (or majors) lived in Spanish House in the past few years.

Tradition is a major factor in any institution. Washington College will soon be entering its third century with a fine tradition behind it. Last year the fraternities were asked to submit plans for their chapter rooms renovation. This was taken as a signal by the fraternities that they would get the buildings back, the buildings traditionally occupied by fraternities. Now a group of students who "claim" to be representative of the student body voted to not give the buildings back to the traditional occupants. If they were truly representative of the student body, and I don't believe they were, they would not have voted in this matter.

Finally I would like to address the question of academic housing specifically. If students of one interest, for example a common language or common grade point averages, are grouped into a building, it would seem that they automatically (sic) become isolated and ostracized by the remaining students. If these students do in fact group themselves in this fashion no one wins.

The exchange of ideas and social interaction is effectively cut off and no one progresses. Without interaction among all students, academicly (sic) elite or academicly (sic) average, Spanish speaking, French, black, or Green, no one will learn or mature.

Respectfully
Shawn Harman

Editorial

President Reagan has proposed to propose that, among other reductions, funding to the National Endowment for the Arts and public television be halved, food stamp and extended unemployment benefits be cut, and social security benefits for college students be eliminated. Effects of such cuts would undoubtedly be far-reaching, and not necessarily as beneficial to the economy as he and his budget-cutting supporters like to think.

There may not be many students here with social security benefits, but for those who do receive them, such a cut could mean having to borrow money, or having to transfer to a cheaper state school, or at the worst, having to drop out altogether. It's getting to be hard enough to stay in college, and possibly even harder for small liberal arts schools to stay in existence. Those who believe college is easily within the reach of average, middle class people today have been out of school too long themselves.

Other cuts would affect us indirectly. The profused reduction in support for the National Endowment for the Arts would make itharder for W.C. to sponser such things as art exhibits here. At a time when the college seems to be making a conscious effort to improve the quality of the intellectual life on campus, such a restriction certainly wouldn't help.

As for food stamps and unemployment benefits, it's become painfully clear that even a college education doesn't always get you a job. These social programs are no longer benefitting only the ghetto poor. Reagan's policies will reduce the quality of our lives while we're in college, and they threaten to reduce the quality of our lives after we get out of college too.

Commencement Speaker Choice Response

To the Editor: It was almost a year ago to the week that a senior wrote in a Letter to the Editor of The Elm that, "student opinion has once more been ignored by Dr. McLain ...(who) should never have arranged for a commencement speaker without considering the wishes of the graduating seniors as expressed by our representatives on the Honorary Degrees Committee." It was therefore with considerable outrage that I read in last week's Elm that Dr. McLain had scheduled as our commencement speaker Henry Cristopher Wallace—a name which not only was never recommended by the class, but which few of us even recognized. That initial anger was soon tempered, however, by the stoicism that one acquires after three-and-a-half years of dealing with our President. But it gave rise to what I feel must be considered a larger concern: If the President is unable to attract to our 191st graduation a speaker whose name the graduates will recognize, what does that say about the College's ability to attract the kind of talent, the kind of publicity, the kind of money that will be needed in the Bicentennial campaign and in the coming lean years? We have placed ourselves in the uniquely unenviable position of conferring prestige upon our graduation speaker, when in fact it should be the other way around. Washington College will remain a little known school tucked away on the Eastern Shore of Maryland as long as we continue to attract little known talent.

Sincerely,
Geoff Garinther
President, Student Academic Board

Forum Lecture on the Draft to be Presented

NEWS BUREAU

"To Draft or Not to Draft: Military Service in the 1980's" will be the subject before the William James Forum Thursday evening, February 19.

The speaker will be Dr. Robert Fullinwider, Research Associate at the Center for Philosophy and Public Policy at the University of Maryland. The draft has recently been Dr. Fullinwider's main object of concern at the Center.

The meeting of the Forum is set for 7:30 p.m. in the Hynson Lounge of Hodson Hall. All are welcome to attend the meeting.

Dr. Fullinwider is expected to comment on the class and race structure of the current U.S. armed forces, now one-third black and drawn from the lower strata of society much more heavily than in the past. Sex issues will also be discussed: do the armed services discriminate against women? Should women be drafted?

Other abiding problems pertaining to military service will be aired. What is a fair way to apportion military obligations? Are there religious objections to military conscription? What is the political duty of citizens to serve in the armed forces of their country?

Dr. Fullinwider is a graduate of the University of Kentucky and holds a Ph. D. degree from Purdue University. Before coming to the Center for Philosophy and Public Policy in 1979 he taught at the State University of New York at Albany and at Mary Washington College.

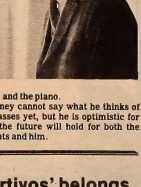
The Center for Philosophy and Public Policy, which sponsored a week-long summer workshop at Washington College last summer, was founded to engage trained philosophical minds in the evaluation of public policy. The Center has given considerable attention to such issues as human rights, honesty in government, nuclear contamination, and economic justice.

Chaney Joins Political Science

by ANYA LIPNICK

A new face this semester at Washington College is Dr. Bradford Chaney.

Chaney, who prefers to be called Brad, is replacing Dr. Howard Silver of the Political Science department.



He graduated from the University of California Riverside, and came to the East coast to teach at the University of Rochester in New York.

There he taught night classes of Congress, Presidency, and Methods.

Chaney was given the position at Washington College the day before Thanksgiving. "It made the Thanksgiving complete," Chaney said.

He lives here in Chestertown, and so far enjoys it.

His hobbies are playing ping pong, chess, and the piano.

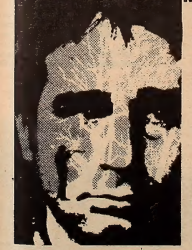
Chaney cannot say what he thinks of his classes yet, but he is optimistic for what the future will hold for both the students and him.

Rouse to Speak at Convocation

by WENDY MURPHY
News Editor

James Wilson Rouse, Chairman of the Board of the Rouse Company, will be the guest speaker at the Washington's Birthday Convocation on Saturday, February 28.



Rouse was born and raised in Easton, Maryland, and attended both the University of Hawaii and the University of Virginia. In 1937, he graduated from the University of Maryland night law school and was also admitted to the Maryland Bar. Prior to entering business in 1939 and creating the company now known as the Rouse Company, he had been employed by the Federal Housing Administration and the Title Guarantee Company.

The Rouse Company has financed more than three billion dollars in real estate development through its mortgage banking company, with offices in Baltimore, Columbia, Washington, Richmond, and Chicago. In addition, the Company has developed, or has under development, over one billion dollars in real estate projects in eleven states and Canada. Their largest project is Columbia, Maryland, a city built for 110,000 people on 14,000 acreas of land. Being located between Baltimore and Washington, it is owned by both the Rouse Company and the Connecticut General Life Insurance Company. The Rouse Company's Center City projects, such as Harborplace in Baltimore, The Gallery and Market East in Philadelphia, and Faneuil Hall Marketplace in Boston, have recently attracted much attention as new hope for downtowns. Through its subsidiary, The American City Corporation, the Rouse Company has been consulted by dozens of American cities that want assistance inbringing "new life" to particular sections and in finding solutions to their special problems.

Rouse was a member of President Dwight D. Eisenhower's Advisory Committee on Housing and Chairman of the Subcommittee which recommended the urban renewal program initiated with the 1954 Housing Act. He was one of the founders of the National Urban Coalition and the American Council to Improve Our Neighborhoods (ACTION) and served as President of the latter. He was President of Urban America and is a member of the Board of Directors of Jubilee Housing, Inc., a non-profit corporation which renovates housing for the poor in Washington D.C.

Rouse will receive an honorary Doctor of Humanities degree at the 2 p.m. Convocation which will take place in the Daniel Z. Gibson Fine Arts Center. The ceremony will be open to the public.

The events held on February 28, in honor of Washington's Birthday, will mark the 199th academic year at Washington College, making it the tenth oldest college in the United States. The day will be highlighted by the annual Birthday Ball which is to be held in the Cain Athletic Center from 9 p.m. to 2 a.m. The Moonlighters will provide the music for the black tie affair.

EMPRESA CINEMA INTERNATIONAL PRESENTS A JOSE LUIS BORAU FILM

FURTIVOS
(poachers)

Starring Jose Luis Borau, Lola Gaos, Ovidi Montllor and Alicia Sanchez

Directed by Jose Luis Borau with Lola Gaos and Alicia Sanchez. Borau's film is in many ways a commentary on Franco's remark that, "Spain is a peaceful forest." Instead, in Borau's dark, incisive vision, the deceptive tranquility of the forest hides traps of savagery, stupidity and repression. The interaction among the characters a series of bitter struggles, is meant to illuminate much of recent Spanish history. Furtivos was long banned in Spain—Obstensibly for reasons of excessive erotisism. When finally released it became the biggest grossing film in Spain's history and caused quite a sensation. In Spanish with English subtitles.

Correction

In the article about the graduate program last week, the ELM mistakenly reported that the program is entering its tenth year. The program is completing 10 years of service, and began in June, 1971. The ELM regrets the error.

"The Beginning of a Beautiful Relationship"

by PETE TURCHI

Prolific Pete Turchi has left Paris, and gone on to Morocco for this week's installment from our foreign correspondant.

It's 1:00 in the morning and I'm sitting on the floor in the corner of the train station in Safik a town on the coast of Morocco somewhere between Agadir and Casabianca, waiting for the 5:20 train. Only one train leaves Safi every day, and it leaves at 5:20.

There are two Moroccans in blankets in the other corner, and one sitting on a big box, leaning against the wall. Fred and Freeman, two of the guys I'm traveling with, are in their sleeping bags. They've been asleep for a few hours. Chasey was so tired that she finally fell asleep curled up against her backpack, and Sondra, a Chinese girl we met in Marrakech, is sleeping on top of my duffle bag.

The train station is cold, too cold to sleep in unless you're even more exhausted than I am, so I guess I'll just try to write all this down before anything else happens. I've probably forgotten a lot already.

It's freezing now, but in the day, when the sun is out, it's warm, warm enough to wear shorts and a T-shirt on the beach in Agadir and gape at the topless sunbathers and play frisbee. The problem with the floor of the train station is that it's not only cold, but it's dirty. Morocco is a dirty country. The trains in Spain never had toilet paper, but we figured it was just a problem with the trains. When we asked the shady, fat Moroccan who ran the youth hostel in Fes if he had any, he just laughed. They don't use toilet paper in Morocco, he said—that's why there's a little water faucet next to the toilet. The moral of the story is that you are never supposed to shake a Moroccan's left hand.

It's been over a week since we heard that, and right now we feel like pretty hardened travelers. Sleeping on the cold, dirty floor of the train station doesn't bother me, although we were all hoping we'd catch an early morning train. We took the bus up the coast from Agadir. There aren't any trains, and the bus service isn't exactly something Fred MacMurray would advertize. The bus stations are usually big dirt lots that all the bus companies share, and they fight to get you to use their bus. As soon as you so, though, as soon as you've bought your ticket, you get less respect than the natives got from Colonel Kurtz. They charge you as much as you'll pay to put your baggage on top of the bus, and they'll try to charge you for taking it down, too. They'll take everything you'll give them.

The ride up the coast was beautiful, once we got seats. For the first few hours we fought our way up the mountains, looking over the Atlantic. At 3:00 we turned in a corner and saw a semitrailer pulled over, with the driver kneeling on the ground behind it, facing east, praying. After dealing with these people for a week, it's hard to think of them as being devoutly religious, but a lot of them are. In the hostel we would be woken up by the Coca-cola truck with loudspeakers on top that drive through the city, calling the people to prayer.

After we got away from the ocean the scenery turned to something we had gotten used to—desert. Dry, red, desert, broken occasionally by a stretch of dry red houses with no windows. It's hard to describe Morocco to someone who hasn't read National Geographic, or watched Wild Kingdom because that's what it looks like, and nothing else. Morocco is hopelessly behind countries like England and the United States, if you call glass windows and refrigerators and toilet paper being ahead. The people in the villages line up at the train tracks and stare as the trains go by, and sometimes out in the middle of the desert, miles from anything, a old man will be walking with a cane. Just walking.

And the scenery is a little strange. Just as you first get used to the dry clay, not sand, of the desert, you can look in the distance and see snowcovered mountains. The buses stop every few hours to let everyone pry out of their seats and walk around usually while the bus driver gets something to eat out of the rear of the stop on the Jersey Turnpike. Almost all of these places have stands where you can buy sandwiches, warm meat stuffed into half a loaf of circular bread, for about 50¢. Not only is the meat warm, but at a booth right next to the grill you can look at the sides of meat hanging and point to what you want, and the butcher will cut it off and hand it to the cook. And, if you still have doubts about whether or not the meat is fresh, a little table in front of the booth displays the heads of the animals, eyes open, and covered with blood from the slaughter in the morning. (Alright maybe not so much like the Jersey Turpike.)

We piled back into the bus this afternoon and looked at more desert, and finally we watched a beautiful sunset slide down over the mountains, into the water. As it got darker we started to notice something different. There was no light. Anywhere. As far as we could see, everything was pitch black. There were no street lights, no electric houselights, no large cities off in the distance. Just headlights and the headlights of an occasional car. Once in a while the ticket taker, the tough guy who rides shotgun in the back seat, would clap his hands loudly and the bus driver would pull over and let someone out. Not at a bus stop, not near a house, just out there, in the middle of the dry blackness.

Just before we reached Sagi we were stopped by the police. We had been warned that all the buses were stopped a few times every trip to check for hashish, but we hadn't been stopped before. We weren't worried because we weren't carrying anything, and somebody had told us the police didn't care about a few grams, anyway, they were just looking for the big stuff, but as soon as the policeman stepped onto the bus the Moroccans who had been shouting and laughing a minute earlier sat up and grew sober. The policeman walked slowly through the bus, staring down at our faces and shining flashlights into the paper sacks on the luggage rack. We were in the back, the only Americans on the bus, and I had predicted that at least one of us would be searched, but the policeman walked past us and put a hand on the door. The ticket taker sighed. Suddenly the policeman turned and said something to Freeman. His face went white. The policeman said something again, this time in French, and Freeman stared up at him. Peter leaned over. "He wants your passport." Freeman took it out and gave it to him, and after a minute he handed it back. Somehow they can look at you and make you wonder if maybe you aren't guilty of something, after all.

There are a lot of drugs in Morocco, especially a lot of hashish, but it doesn't seem remarkable because there are everything in Morocco. For the right price you can get anything from hash to a handmade wool blanket to a brass plate to a brand new Adidas warm-up suit. Every city has an old section, called the Medina, where the marketplace is located. The best one, the most authentic marketplace, with the lowest prices, is in Fes, which is the home of the craftsmen of Morocco. The second best is in Marrakech. Marrakech attracts tourists, but that's because it has the Berbers, the people from the hills, the snake-charmers and dancers and gamblers.

We went to Marrakech from Casablanca. People had warned us that Casablanca, unlike anyplace else in Morocco, was nothing but a modern city, but after seeing the film last term we just couldn't resist, although finally I didn't look for Rick's Americain Cafe in the yellow pages because...well, usually it's better to just leave things that way.

The one good thing about stopping in Casablanca was that it meant we could take the Marrakech Express, of pop music fame. The train was new and modern, with comfortable seats, and we sat and played backgammon and watched the desert go by. About halfway through the trip I looked out both sides of the train and realized that there were no other tracks on either side. Trains can go either from Casablanca to Marrakech, or vice versa, but not both ways at the same time. I also noticed a little metal foot pedal next to each set of seats, and by the time we had pulled into the station I had figured the whole system out—when the train arrives in Marrakech they press down the little foot pedals and turn all the seats around put an engine on the other end and send the train right back to Casablanca.

We also met an authentic Moroccan student on the train: I was sitting on the armrest of a seat in the aisle at the end of the car, wearing jeans, a flannel shirt, and a western-style bandanna; and once when I looked away from the desert and down the aisle I saw a Moroccan, a well-dressed and young, leaning over to take my picture. I looked away and he took it, then he motioned for me to take off my glasses, and I did, and he took another picture of what he probably thought was a real live horse rustler. Later we talked to him in our broken French and he told us that he has always dreamed of living in the United States. We asked him where, but he didn't know, and didn't care. He just dreams of living in the United States.

That was unusual, but after a while, after getting used to the treatment given to any non-Moroccan, we began to notice that we were a strange sight to a lot of people who saw us on the trains and buses. One day on a bus I started to write something down and everyone on either side of us stared intently at the way my hand moved across the page, and when one of us changed film in a camera everyone in the train car turned forward to see what it looked like inside. The children were especially curious. For some reason it seems Moroccans don't wink, so we would wink to the kids and they would follow us around, trying to wink back. And one hot afternoon in Marrakech when Peter turned around and sang Christmas carols to them. Afterwards they showed us what they knew how to do—ask for money.

Everyone asks for money. All of the selling in the marketplace is bartering—no one ever buys something for the price that's initially asked, and the shopkeepers don't expect anyone to. Rugs and blankets and more expensive things usually take much more effort to bargain for, and the prices are so cheap you usually realize that you are only bargaining because that's what you are supposed to do, and you'll feel cheated if you don't get whatever you're buying for as few dirhams as possible.

We left Marrakech in the rain waiting for Peter outside of the post office in the Medina. I was leaning against the side of a dusty building and was getting tired of waiting when a short Moroccan man came up to me with a bag full of various trinkets. He held out an ugly sword in a bronze hilt and a metal flask.

"You like? he asked. If you really don't want what these people are selling, you soon discover, the trick is simply to ignore them. Any answer, especially "No", guarantees that they'll bug you for at least another five minutes.

I looked down at the man, then looked away. Peter wouldn't be around for fifteen minutes. "No", I said.

Look, very pretty," he said. He pushed them towards me.

I didn't look down. "The sword is ugly," I said.

He put the sword back in the bag and held out the flask.

"I don't want it," I said. I started to walk across the street, leaving him behind me. "How much?"

He ran to catch up with me. "Not much, not much. Look, very nice. For you, 270 dirhams."

I laughed. Two hundred and seventy dirhams is almost seventy dollars. We both knew he never got that much for anything in his life. "That's ridiculous," I said.

"Two-fifty."

We were in the middle of the street and the cars were coming at us. "That's too much, and it's ugly," I said. I ran ahead to cross the street. The little Moroccan got caught in the traffic so I waited for him. He caught up and I walked away.

"Are you a student?" he asked.

"Yes."

"Special student price—200."

"It's still too much." I headed for the marketplace.

"How much then? How much you pay for this?"

I saw mineral water in one of the booths ahead. I had to get some water for dinner. I answered the Moroccan without looking down. "Five."

He stopped as if a camel had sat on him, "Five? Five what? Five dollars?"

"Five dirhams."

"Five dirhams for what? Five dirhams to look? Five dirhams to touch?"

I stopped to watch his little show, then we kept walking.

"Alright," he said. "How much your final price—no 200, no 5. What's your serious price."

I stopped and looked at him. I picked up the flask and turned it in my hand, then gave it back to him. I felt around in my pocket. I turned and started to walk.

"How much?" he asked. "How much your final price?"

"Six."

Five minutes later I met Peter in front of the post office a little drained, holding the flask. Final price—eight dirhams.

Once you get used to bartering it's easy to have an urge to laugh at the people when they tell you their first price, or when they use the same lines over and over again, like, "Are you a student? Special student price," but you can't. This is their way of life, the only thing they do—you can laugh with them, but not at them. It's very strange. Everywhere there are hungry children and old ladies asking for money, and mothers carrying their children, wearing veils, pleading with their soft eyes. But you can't have a whole country, and after a while you realize that the people are tough, that they've been fighting for themselves for generations, and that maybe, in a way, they aren't as needy as they seem to be.

In Tangier, our last day in Morocco, we stood inside the bank changing our

by COLLEEN MILLER

Sophie Kerr lecturer Phyllis Theroux examined "Childhood: The Writer's Curse, Weapon and Final Destination" and read from her novel California and Other States of Grace Thursday February 5.

Introduced by English Department Chairman Dr. Nancy Tatum as a much welcome writer form "the other side of the Mississippi", Phyllis Theroux hails from San Francisco. She writes essays and art memoirs for the New York Times and also works on novels which deal with children.

"The greatest writers are those who write for children," declared Ms. Theroux, making a distinction between authors who write about children for adults and adults who write for children. Good writing can be difficult by its unpredictable nature, according to Ms. Theroux. "Writing is like the winds which fill our sails, unless of course the winds decide to fill John Cheever's sails that day."

The difference between serviceable and inspired writing originates in one's childhood experiences, explained Ms. Theroux, who drew an analogy between a childhood experience she had with a sewing machine, and her present inspiration as a writer. "As a little girl, I remember watching a repairman oil our sewing machine. As an adult writer, the first experiences in my childhood continue to serve as inspiring 'oil' for my writing."

The first impressions of childhood constitute both the writer's course and weapon, according to Theroux. The curse of childhood—those memories which encompass the emotional pain a child experiences—conflicts with the positive, "wonderous experiences" of childhood and, as the child matures, evolve into weapons. "I think we are all forced to childhood fears," declared Ms. Theroux , "It was a blessing that I was born with a good memory and can remember much about my childhood. I consider those memories weapons."

Theroux believes a child is born with a certain "thrust"—natural inclination toward art, a certain trade, or writing — which determines the child's personality regardless of negative outside influences. For instance, children who will become writers adhere to the characteristics of I the writer, rather than those of the artist of other occupations, "We have a strong compulsion to articulate," said Theroux.

The humble, accepting attitude of a child equals that of the old person, explained Theroux, and is the writer's "final destination." Cyclic in nature, the writer's experience originates in the "first impressions of life", which are "curses" blossoming along with "weapons" into a mature old age—a "final destination" similar to childhood, concluded Theroux.

"I often use children to prove adult points," continued MS. Theroux as she discussed the characters in her novel California and Other States of Grace. "And I use things my children say and things other children say. It is very helpful to keep a jounal. A journal is somewhat like the Grimm's fairy tale Hansel and Gretal, in that the writer is tossing "bread crumbs" or stories and anecdotes, on the trail to use again later."

Commenting on bow she became a writer, Ms. Theroux said, "You don't always feel like you're born again. I began writing during a very unhappy period of my life. I was thirty-four and I woke up in the middle of mhe night and thought, 'How'd I get into this fix'. There was an old typewriter that I'd always kept in my room there, so I just got up, sat down at the typewriter and started to write. It was just that I had something to say."

Theroux submited the article she had written that night to a magazine and, almost as if in a fairy tale, the article was accepted for publication. Since then, Phyllis Theroux has become deeply involved in "writing for children" and articulating the "thrust" of her first childhood impressions.

Life in Morocco

pesetas to dirhams while two little boys stared in through the plate glass window, looking hungry, holding out their hands and pointing to their mouths. After a minute, though, they broke into laughter and ran down the street. And in the Marrekech Express the Moroccan who wanted to live in the United States watched as Chasey and Freeman played backgammon, and when she won with a lucky roll she laughed, and the Moroccan laughed and shook her hand in congratulaitons, and soon Freeman started laughing, the Moroccan said something in Arabic and started laughing harder.

"What are we laughing about?" Freeman asked.

Chasey tried to catch her breath. "I don't know." She started laughing again, and turned to me. "What's so funny?"

And maybe that's the most important thing I found in Morocco—there may be poverty, and unclean conditions, and there is certainly a lot of desperation, but there is also a definite sense of humor. That's the kind of thing that gets you through long nights in cold, dirty train stations.

Chasey just woke up. Peter and Freeman look pretty warm, but my hands are freezing, so I think I'll accept the challenge I just got to play a best-out-of-five series of backgammon. We still have two hours before we catch the train for Tanger that will eventually get us to Spain and points north, and I need something to keep my mind off the cold.

I just learned to play backgammon on this trip, and I've started to learn the basic moves, but already it's driving my crazy. After this vacation I think I'll retire. But for now I think I'll play it again, just one more time.

Women's Spring Athletics Get Going

by JEFF ALDERSON

Although the fall season is over, Coach Penny Fall is having spring volleyball teaching practice. "This is mostly to work on technique changes needed in each person," she said. "We can just concentrate on the techniques without the pressure of a game. We can make mistakes."

When school resumes in the fall, the volleyball team only has two weeks to prepare for the first game. "This is the only chance we have to get the proper technique in our heads," Fall said.

The practices began right after the holiday break. The girls practice for an hour and a half, three days a week. These practices end next week. During this time, Fall has had an opportunity to work with the girls on certain aspects of their game such as changes in their serve, hitting, or blocking.

Fall is optimistic about the upcoming season. "With Julie Wheeler graduating we'll need a setter," she stated. "Karen Perkinson, Kamie McGlynn, and Ann Plummer are all possibilities. Cheryl Loss, Anne Most, Laura Chase, Christina Ragonesi, and Julie Skelton are all hitting better and they'll know more this fall. The enthusiasm is very good."

Tennis

The Washington College tennis team has begun practicing indoors. "If ever we had a rebuilding year this is it," said Coach Fall. "Of the six starters last year, none returned."

The team veterans include Holli Young and Shannon Crosby, both back from their junior year abroad in Europe, and Bria Beckman. "All the rest will be new," said Fall. "The freshmen will learn a lot this year. We'll be playing a tough schedule."

Fall hopes that the freshmen won't be discouraged by this season. Without seasoned veterans, Fall is placing freshmen higher seeded than usual. "In the past we've been able to start freshmen at lower numbers. We've been able to keep them out of the lion's den, but we can't do that this year."

The team and individual players are in for some inevitable defeats especially against such tough teams as Salisbury State, American University, and Catholic University. "We're going to take some bumps," Fall admitted, but we'll learn a lot. If we keep the enthusiasm up we can eventually build a strong team."

Crew, Softball, Lacrosse

"Women's crew looks to be THE veteran team this year," said Fall. "They have a very strong nucleus of girls. We can look for good things."

Head coach for the crew is John Wagner. Valerie Marsh is captain. This is her third year as either captain or co-captain.

"Crew has a nice group of girls. They're conditioning strong and have a good schedule. They may lose a few but they'll give everyone a run for the money," commented Fall.

The women's lacrosse club has a five-game schedule this year. "They're playing as a club rather than a conference team," said Fall. "I hope they'll have a good turnout."

Nancy Dick and Jody Dudderar are in charge of the club on a volunteer basis. "They did a nice job with it last year and it should be the same this year," she said.

There will be a softball organizational meeting on Wednesday February 18 at 6:30 p.m. in the Cain Athletic Center. The team will have a new coach this year, Jenny Butler.

Butler has had much experience as an umpire and coach. She graduated from W.C. two years ago and was a prime mover for getting the softball team started. "The team definitely won't suffer from a lack of enthusiasm from Jenny," Fall said.

"It looks like a good returning group," Fall said. "If all the girls come back from last year they should do a good job. They'll be playing a tough schedule, though."

As director of women's athletics at W.C. Fall has one main concern; "We have a lot of sports for a small group of girls. These can only be successful if the women are very serious and highly motivated and are extremely responsible to participation. If they give a half effort we can't build. To ensure that these girls remain loyal to their goals and their sport they need support from the student body and administration. This is a big part of the girls' college life and they get little recognition for their efforts. I'm very proud of the girls we have."

Pulled Muscle? Go See Tony

by BOB STRONG

Talk about a pair of hands. Strong but gentle. These hands massage, bandage, support and mold young people. Incredible hands which belong to Tony Dougal.

Watching Tony, Washington College's new athletic trainer, is more than an experience: it is a revelation. Wise counsel, patient expertise and affection are the grist for his mill. Nothing slipshod here. If that swelling needs alternate hot and cold hydrotherapy—you get it. If weight must be kept off an ankle for seven days— you do it. Trainer's orders are not open to appeal.

But a good trainer's responsabilities go deeper than pulled ligaments or even greenstick fractures. Tony is rapport. The endless platitudes that paper the training room walls are not empty cliches. They are Tony Dougal.

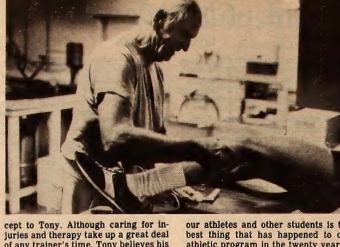
Watch him tenderly elevate a swollen ankle and remark with pride at the reduction in swelling; observe Tony insisting that more padding be placed over a leg abrasion—to prevent greater injury; notice this man come to his feet when a player—on either side— is down, and you will know Tony Dougal in a moment. Anyone can see, this man cares.

Raised in the Pennsylvania coal belt, Tony Dougal, wanted out. Sports were his passport to something better. Having demonstrated exceptional athletic talents while participating in high school sports, Tony was offered several collegiate scholarships.

Tony chose Temple University. When asked why, he simply said, "because they offered me the best deal at a time when the deal meant quite a lot."

The choice was good. Good for Tony; good for Temple. After two seasons, Tony was offered a contract with the New York Yankees. But Tony turned down this opportunity in order that he might complete his education. Later he did sign with the Boston Red Sox and put in a full season at Fenway Park.

Baseball was not Tony's only athletic talent; those hands could grip a football as well. Before returning to school for graduate study, Tony played for the Philadelphia Eagles, then a member of the infant NFL.



After receiving his M.S. in health and Physical Education at Columbia, Tony became head trainer and assistant professor of physical education as well as assistant football coach and head hockey and lacrosse coach at the University of New Hampshire.

From '47-'62 Tony was head trainer and assistant football coach at Dartsmouth. Then, in '62, he came to Boston University. There, in addition to his coaching and training duties, Tony taught athletic training and corrective therapy courses on graduate and undergraduate levels.

To list all of the professional awards that Tony has received would be an ambitious project in itself. Here are just a few: New England Sports Writers Trainer of the Year '64, National Athletic Trainer's Association selection for Hall of Fame '74, Sheafer Pen Award for Outstanding Contribution to College Hockey '76, Citation for over a thousand hours of volunteer work for the Red Cross.

Twice Tony turned down opportunities to travel with the U.S. Olympic Team as their trainer so that he could continue his duties at Boston University.

Duty seems to be an important concept to Tony. Although caring for injuries and therapy take up a great deal of any trainer's time, Tony believes his mission is teaching. Preventive care is his primary focus.

Officially Tony is employed part time by the college's athletic department. But only officially. When the team travels, Tony goes. When an injury requires attention at night or on weekends, Tony is available.

The importance that a trainer of Tony Dougal's caliber and experience represents to the success of a team is difficult to evaluate. Even though Tony just started at the college this year, this season alone Coach Finnegan attributes at least four wins to Tony's extraordinary ability to rehabilitate injured players. Probably Finnegan's remark on Tony's value to WC sports best echoes the opinion of the athletic department: "I think having a trainer with Tony's expertise, experience and genuine interest for the well being of our athletes and other students is the best thing that has happened to our athletic program in the twenty years I have been associated with the college."

When asked why he decided to come to WC Tony hesitated, then mischievously answered," don't tell anyone I said so, but it was because this school needed a trainer."

Should you enter Tony's office you will notice innumerable memorabilia. Please handle with care. Tony will gladly introduce you to each. He will pause with you, glance back lazily. But Tony has one chronic eccentricity—he looks forward, indefatigably. You may notice a pause and a momentary wistful countenance but there is boundless energy here that can't remain static for long. A limping player will come in and break that wistful glance and again those hands will perform. One gets the feeling Washington College is a better place with these wise and working hands around.

Cagers' Playoff Hopes Fade

By HARRY MCENROE
Sports Editor

After trouncing Delaware Valley on the road Saturday, in one of their finest offensive displays in recent memory, the Washington College basketball team suffered a pair of close setbacks at the hands of conference foes Swarthmore and Haverford. These losses dropped the Shoremen to a disappointing 2-5 MAC record, and destroyed any realistic playoff hopes.

The Delaware Valley game was a classic "run-and-gun", fastbreak-type affair in which neither squad bothered playing defense. The Shoremen breezed to a comfortable ten-point half time lead against their hapless host. Led by senior guard Craig (Langstein) Langwost, who tallied a game-high 22 points, and front-liners Tom Steele and Joe Moye, the cagers rolled to an easy victory over Delaware Valley, whose record fell to 3-18 following the loss.

In Monday's conference rematch at Swarthmore, the two squads engaged in another thrilling contest, but with the same unfortunate result, as the Quakers edged the Shoremen, 83-77. The cagers were unable to cool the hot hand of George Dougherty, who popped in 30 points to lead Swarthmore's winning effort. Dave Blackwell's 22 points and freshman Tom Keefe's 17 led the Shore scoring.

A porous Shore defense allowed a visiting Haverford team 45 first half points as the Shoremen fell behind early in another conference encounter. The Fords were consistently able to get the ball inside, where burly senior Mike Rauke dumped in 16 before intermission. Dave Blackwell and Joe Moye countered with 12 points each as the Cagers were down nine at the half. At the onset of the second half the Shoremen were unable to gain momentum, as Haverford capitalized on free throw opportunities after Shore fouls placed the Fords in the bonus situation. However, with about eight minutes to play, the Shoremen began a furious comeback in which they outscored Haverford to continually turn the ball over. With Jim Corey hitting on back-to-back jumpers, the Cagers rallied to knot the contest in the final minutes. Down one following a Ford foul shot, the Shoremen gained possession with 39 seconds to play. After several timeouts, the Cagers worked the ball to Corey, whose last-second shot had won the previous Washington-Haverford clash. His shot didn't fall, however, and a post-buzzer foul shot by Haverford sealed a 70-68 verdict.

Cheerleaders not just Cheesecake

by JEFF ALDERSON
Layout Editor

The Washington College cheerleaders have another week and a half left to "do their thing" for the 1980-81 Basketball season. "I am extremely pleased with the team this year, and that's an understatement." said Coach Penny Fall, "People don't fully appreciate the time and effort these girls put into this sport."

Fall emphasizes the word sport. "They put as much conditioning and hard work into it as is needed for any varsity sport," she commented.

Captain Jani Gabriel prefers the word "team" to "squad." "We are a team," she said, "We work just as hard. We sweat just as much."

"This group is on the sideline from the time starts until halftime cheering and again from after halftime until the game ends," said Fall. "When halftime comes or a time out is called, they're out on the court. They go constantly! They don't stop!"

"Cheering is something we put so much time into and then get so much out of it," said cheerleader Sue Watts. "I think the fact that we put so much work into it and love it so much says something for cheering."

Fall stated, "These girls are not ego involved. They really believe that their objective is to help the basketball team. When the team loses the girls get very upset. I feel that this has created an excellent rapport between the girls and the basketball team."

Problems seem to be rare among the eleven cheerleaders, "The only real problems we had were when Julie Scott was sick and when we lost #girl," said Gabriel. "We had to re-route some cheers. Thank goodness for Peggy Opsenowski coming back this semester. She's really helped a lot."

The excellent coaching of Penny Fall has added to the girls' enthusiasm. "Miss Fall has been such a big help," said Watts. "Every line of criticism helped so much. She not only cares for us as a team but for each of us as a person."

This year's cheerleading team deserves much favorable recognition. Gabriel admitted. "This has been the best season ever. There has been no enthusiasm problem." With the majority of the squad returning next year the outlook for the next season is very promising.

Registration Changes Proposed

by GINGER KURAPKA
Editor-in-chief

A proposal has been made to change registration procedures.

Dr. Richard Brown, chairman of the Mathematics department, has proposed that students register at the same time they see their advisors. The replacement of the old computer with the new Prime 550 eliminates the use of IBM punch cards for registration. This would not only replace the dining hall system, but also upgrade the registration process. "I find it a very good change," said Registrar Ermon Foster.

The proposal is still tentative, and advising days may be eliminated in favor of another process. "As always there has been a bit of controversy; some think the advising days excellent, and some do not," said Dean of the College Garry Clarke. For this semester however, students will be advised and register on the scheduled days. One suggestion has been to extend registration to several days or a week, in which seniors would be advised and register on one day, and that list entered into the computer, followed by juniors, sophomores and freshmen on successive days. Thus faculty members could have a daily list of the class registration. Professors could have greater control over class size.

Registration itself will be more accurate with the elimination of the dining hall system. "This forces the student to go back to the advisor to be re-advised, rather than just adding on a course," said Foster. Program cards filled out by advisors are often inaccurate by the time they reach the Registrar's Office, since the tendency is to change courses when scheduled classes are full without informing the advisor.

The only objection so far has been the fear that registration would become too impersonal. Professors would not have the chance as a whole to see students and perhaps advise them on taking other courses. "One concern was to not let the students become numbers," said Clarke.

Curriculum Requirements Proposed

by BILL MORTIMER
Assistant Editor

In a fourteen-page memorandum to the members of the faculty, the Academic Council submits their proposed curricular revisions today.

The proposal, which contains eight overall recommendations, each containing various ideas, has been studied by the Council since 1979. Recently, a subcommittee was formed to aide in finalizing the ideas proposed by the Council.

"Basically, what it is is a number of recommendations concerning distribution, and a writing program which will now be voted upon by the faculty at their March meeting," said Dean of the College Garry Clarke, who serves as chairman of the Academic Council. If the faculty passes the proposal in March, it would become effective during the upcoming school year.

Thoughts concerning changes in the curriculum have been discussed for a long time. "It's a complicated issue, " said Clarke. "There have been a lot of facets and many opinions as to what would constitute a writing requirement." Such a requirement is the main issue as proposed by the Council.

President of the S.G.A., Jay Young, said, "This is something which has been of great concern to the S.G.A." Both Young and Geoff Garinther, S.G.A. Vice President, have been concerned with the proposal itself. "We made every effort to communicate to the Dean that this was a top academic priority because we felt that it is a great deficiency."

Curriculum Revisions

In the time since the Council has studies the fourcourse curriculum and the system in general at Washington College, they were concerned with determining if such a system offered the students a sound education. After concluding that the system was a good one and should not be changed, specific problems were addressed, including "the distribution requirement, English and Mathematics competencies, and an honors program," states the Academic Council in their proposal.

Specifically, the Council looked at the fact that "Many students at Washington College require assistance in developing writing skills." In addition, problems concerning natural science studies, foreign language studies and new areas of study were considered.

Primarily, the Council recommends in their proposal a Freshman Writing Program. The Council states that "written expression of facility in writing is a central part of a student's academic experiences at Washington College."

A Writing Requirement has been recommended for consideration by the faculty at its March meeting. The Council has proposed several areas of change in regards to such a program. Under the proposal a student could have the option of three different choices in order to fill such a requirement. In each of the three components in which writing would be stressed, a student would have to achieve a level of C in written work. If such a level were not reached, the student would be required to take additional courses with the writing component.

The Writing Workshop

In connection with the writing requirement, the Council has proposed that the Writing Workshop be used more effectively for the benefit of students. By testing freshmen's writing skills it could be determined which students would benefit from additional help in writing. If passed, freshmen who are thought to need additional help would be required to meet with the workshop instructor for a period of one semester, completed by the sophomore year in order for the student to remain at Washington College.

Yet such work, the Council proposes, is not the sole responsability of the English Department. Instead, the Council hopes that "the faculty of Washington College is encouraged to make writing an integral part of each course."

General Recommendations

In three short recommendations, the Council suggests that "two semester courses from each of the four distribution groups plus two semester courses elected from each of two groups constitute the distribution requirement." It is also suggested that students may take two semester courses for distribution requirements in the Pass/Fail system.

The formal studies requirement, under a fourth recommendation, could be satisfied in six differnet ways. Each deals with courses in Mathematics, Computer Science, Music Theory, Foreign Laguages, and Logic.

Music Department Recommendation

The Council has also taken the advice of the Music Department in their proposal, in the suggestion of a modification within the four course system, which would suit the nature of music study. Since there are studies of music which do not fit into a full semester plan, the Course Credit System has been recommended.

Poll Taken on Hill Dorms Housing

by GINGER KURAPKA
Editor-in-chief

In a poll taken by the S.G.A. for presentation to the Board of Visitors and Governors, 67 percent of the 365 students participating voted that, "Hill Dorm Housing should remain restricted to use by the fraternities." One hundred twenty, or 33 percent voted that, "Hill Dorm Housing should be open to any interest group, as concluded by the Student Affairs Committee of the Faculty." Of the students attending the meals at which the vote was taken, 83 percent voted.

Birthday Ball Plans in Full Swing

by WENDY MURPHY
News Editor

The Washington's Birthday Ball plans are in full swing and the Ball itself will be held on Saturday, February 28 from 9:00p.m. til 2:00a.m. in the Cain Athletic Center.

The Moonlighters will provide the music for the black tie affair. According to Kathy Myrick DeProspo, Director of Publications and Public Information, The Moonlighters will cost $1025 as compared to the $3000 paid last year for Lester Lanin and his Orchestra. The proceeds from the Birthday Ball are used for the Washington College Scholarship Fund. Last year's profits amounted to $1500. "Because the band is costing us less this year, we are hoping to increase our profits," Myrick Deprospo said.

Myrick DeProspo expects about 1000 people to attend. Because the Maintenance Department is setting up enough tables to seat only 800 comfortably, she advises going early to get a good seat. The decorations will be provided by the Freshman Class. Refreshments will be on sale by the Washington College Food Service.

The Washington's Birthday Ball is the highlight of the annual celebration of the birthday of Washington College's namesake. Said Myrick, "It's our Founder's Day celebration, so to speak," Tickets are available in the Student Affairs Office and are priced at $6.00 per couple for students. The tickets for non-students are $15.00 per couple and are available in the Public Relations Office.

Editorial

The announcement two weeks ago that a relatively unknown, no matter how worthy, gentleman had agreed to be this year's commencement speaker gives another indication of the deep and major problem at this institution—lack of leadership.

That for the third consecutive year none of the speakers suggested by the senior class, without whom, after all,there would be no commencement could be attracted to the Washington College graduation is appalling. Why can't this administration deliver a figure of national stature for the most important event of the academic year?

Students have gradually realized that the best, often the only, way to get something done is to do it themselves. The need for a student center was recognized because of a student/faculty report, the initial plans and cost estimates were developed by students, and what little constructive work that has been done in the last several months has been done by students. The administration has depended on the students for all of this. Perhaps it has come to rely on student initiatives for everything.

The risk is that students will refuse to continue to involve themselves, that they will become apathetic, especially with the knowledge that they will get little praise and little help from this administration for their efforts. The students and faculty are both doing their share. It's time for the administration to do likewise.

Editorial Disagreement Rebuttal

To the Editor:

It has been a month since Ronald Reagan was sworn in as President of the United States. Since the first day of his administration, President Reagan and his spokesmen have made it clear that he intends to carry through on his campaign pledge to cut the federal budget. To do otherwise would be to betray millions of voters who supported him because of this pledge.

The editorial in last week's Elm described several of the programs that were going to have their funding reduced. It went on to suggest that reduced funding for these programs would adversely affect the quality of our lives during and after college. It is impossible to deny that any budget cut would have no short-term ill effects. It is important, however, to remember the reasons for which President Reagan wants to make these cuts.

This country faces some very real economic problems. Double-digit inflation is threatening many American's confidence in our economic system. American economy is not growing fast enough to provide jobs for all people who want to earn a decent living. Obviously changes are needed to get the economy back on track.

By reducing federal spending and taking less money away from Americans in the form of taxes and inflation, President Reagan hopes to foster economic growth. This growth would contribute to every citizen's standard of liveng. This is better than continuing to prop up individuals through the patchwork of federal programs.

It is not certain that President Reagan will get all of the budget cuts he asked for. Nor is it guaranteed that these cuts will have the desired effects. What is clear is that now is a time for bold action. President Reagan is attempting to attack our economic problems through budget and tax cuts. It's time to break out of the pattern of throwing money at our problems and start on a constructive path. We should support the President and work for real economic growth.

Sincerely,
Winston Elliott

Letters to the Editor

Academic Hill Dorm Housing

Dear Editor:

I am tired. I am tired of justifying an academic program which has meant more to me in my four years at Washington College than anything else. I am talking about the Writer's Union. I am talking about Richmond House. It is a fallacy that the Writer's Union could not, at this very moment, fill a Hill Dorm with students. It is a fallacy that the tradition of Washington College belongs with fraternities and not the liberal arts. It is a fallacy that academic housing would isolate the intelligent students from the rest of the campus. (It takes about 90 students to fill those three dorms—aren't there more than 90 intelligent and creative students on this campus? I think so.) The thought that the campus would ostracize students living in such housing (or vice versa) is absurd and opposes the very core of the proposal for academic housing.

I am growing annoyed with the statement that academic groups, specifically writers, do not fit in with the rest of the student body. Well, I am a student and I, too, am concerned about the future of our college. The life of this college depends upon the quality of the academic environment; not the glorification of fraternal social life. This is not a country club. Fraternities play a vital role in campus life that cannot be ignored and many intellectual and concerned students are members, yet the present apathy of students toward the liberal arts tradition of the college demands the attention of the SGA, Writer's Union, Ski Club, Fraternities and Sororities, Faculty, Administration, and Board of Visitors and Governors alike. Washington College can not continue to attract intelligent students to a college which refuses continually to upgrade the quality of education and related facilities.

Richmond House will most likely be torn down. This facility serves all students interested in the creative writing program at the college, a program that draws so many freshmen here each year. The office of the Writer in Residence is located at Richmond House for easy access to students who want help with their work. Two libraries contain texts, back issues of literary reviews, magazines, and small press publications for student use. Visiting writers, most notable Allen Ginsberg have come to the House to meet and talk with students about writing, about life. Poet John Ashbery will be visiting the College in April. The offices of student literary publications are in Richmond House. The potential to be found in the improvement of the existing facility cannot be so easily shrugged off. The House, as it is, is not physically adequate to deal with all of the students who want to be olosely involved—it can house only nine students and remain open to the rest. There are at least fifty student writers on campus. What will happen to the creative writing program when its only facility is destroyed? We have been given no tangible encouragement from the administration.

An academic facility, Richmond House, is thriving now at Washington College. Why not encourage academic programs encompassing a variety of disciplines and allow them to thrive within the heart of the campus, the Hill Dormitories, and serve all students—fraternity and non-fraternity? (It is a s u r d distinction is necessary)—whether they live in the buildings or not. Why not reassert the liberal arts at Washington College.

I am grateful to the English Department for supporting the creative writing program at Richmond House. Only when student writers the opportunity to make the process of learning much more than a classroom experience. It is a living experience. Please, do not let it slip away.

Thank you,
Lee Ann Chearneyi
Student

Dear Editor:

The question of who ultimately lives in the Hill Dorms when they are finished does indeed seem to be a major pastime on campus these days. All of the discussion, whether it be in committees of faculty or students over dinner, or in the *Elm*is basically a healthy sign of intra-campus concern and communication. I am a senior and don't have a strong opinion on the outcome of the discussion. But I am a little disappointed in the *Elm's*efforts to color that discussion unfavourable+y when the comments of a recent letter to the editor were perfectly reasonable and deserved more respect from the editorial staff; the same respect as that given to Dr. Halstead, or any other member of the college community wishing to take the time to express an opinionn through the college's only weekly publication.

If it is the policy of the ELM to inter-ject points of grammar or spelling into letters received by the editor they should proceed to do so without trying to discredit the author, simply to correct the material. If, on the otherhand, it is the policy of the *ELM*to present the letters as they are received they might do just that and not draw attention to spelling errors. Either policy would be valid.

I do feel that the editor is given ample opportunity for editorializing in the Editorial space of each issue of the Elm and should refrain from doing so in the course of presenting letters to the editor. Moreover, there may have been some over-zealous attempts to discredit Mr. Harman's views. The initial "(sic)" following "pastime" was underserved. I hope that I have not made some grievous mistakes, or that I may be shown more goodwill from the editors than I would if I belonged to one of the campus fraternities.

Respectfully,
Matthew T. Adrian

Dear Editor,

I have never been one to fight change when it is for the better. However, the recent removal of The Elm's old masthead is not a case in point. Please change it back to the original. The present one looks cheap and amateurish.

Conkling Took Christmas Trip to China

by WENDY MURPHY
News Editor

Dr. Conkling spent part of his Christmas vacation in China.

"I do a lot of work for the American Fireworks Association and was invited by the Chinese Government and The Hong Kong Exporting Association to hold seminars about pyrotechnics," said Conkling who left January 1 to teach fellow chemists.

After getting over the eleven-hour time change, he met with the exporters of Hong Kong for three days. From there, he went to Canton where he met with 120 representatives of fireworks industries from all across China.

He said, "I met four days with them.

"They really didn't understand what was being asked of them as far as our government regulations are concerned. Some of the chemicals which they use in the manufacturing of their fireworks have been banned in this country, and they wanted to know what they might be able to use as replacements for these chemicals," he added.

Dr. Conkling was recommended by the Hong Kong Exporting Association because of all of his experience in dealing with pyrotechnics. He and College President Dr. Joseph McLain have been working together for about ten years, and most of the present federal regulations governing the field of pyrotechnics were developed by them at Washington College. The representatives from Hong Kong "felt that I was the logical person to speak to them. Dr. McLain was pretty limited in spare time because of his duties as President."

On the first day we had a large session with everyone present. The other days were spent with each of the five provinces. (The Chinese system allows for five provinces in the fireworks industry.) They are somewhat in competition with one another so they wanted to ask questions individually about problems they are having. With the individual meeting they would not divulge any company secrets. It was interesting that in their society there is competition."

While in Canton, he was also taken on a tour of the city which included a visit to the zoo. Conkling was "very disappointed at the Pandas because they were all three asleep." He added, "They also took me on a tour of the factories. They are very modern and I could tell that safety was important to them because the factories are very well designed to protect the workers. Their factories are newer than most in the United States."

After a complimentary fireworks display, he flew back to Hong Kong for an additional four days in order to discuss what was settled in China. Conkling said, "They are all very interested in building their industry and are willing to go along with anything that is required of them. They were extremely attentive. They were probably the most attentive audience that I have ever addressed."

They also treat their guests with honor. For example, at banquets, Dr. Conkling was offered the head of the chicken and ducks, which is considered a delicacy. "I just passed. I did try some foods, however that I never thought I would, such as pigeon, Sea Slug and Sea Snake Soup. Other foods on the menu included Dog, Sea Turtle and Chicken's feet. The food was very good; I really enjoyed it."

Conkling received a surprise trip to Taiwan on his way home. After being over the ocean for about three hours, one of the engines on the plane malfunctioned causing the pilot to make an emergency landing. "We landed at 3:00 a.m. and had to sit on the plane for two hours. They had taken our passports, and we didn't have any visas, so we had to wait for supervising personnel to arrive. We were taken to a nearby hotel under guard and were taken care of at the expense of the airlines. We were in Taiwan for thirteen hours because they had to fly another plane in from Singapore."

When asked what he missed the most during his stay abroad, he said, "Other than my kids, the only thing is just to have Americans to converse with. I would have been lost without my Hong Kong interpreter."

Hartigan Exhibit, Lecture in Tawes

by SUE JAMES
Fine Arts Editor

Grace Hartigan, a leading figure in the Baltimore Art world, will be giving a lecture about her collage wouk and the problems of creative artists on February 25 in the lobby.

Co-sponsored by the Arts Exhibits and Lecture Series Committees, the affluent artist's lecture of her art display will be of interest to the "literary as well as visual artists," said Associate Professor of Art Dr. Robert Janson-LaPalme.

Hartigan was a prominent artist in the New York scene of the 1950's, and is a major figure in the art world at present. She has contacts with Abstract Expressionists in New York, and with such leading modern writers as Frank O'Hara and Saul Bellow. Hartigan also once headed the Graduate School of the Maryland Institute of Art. The artist is also involved in a wave of the Abstract Expressionist movement.

Students are encouraged to see the display of Hartigan's work in the lobby of the Tawes Theatre. The exhibit will be open to the public on Monday, February 23 from 1 to 6p.m. Hartigan's informal lecture on her display will be held on Wednesday, February 25 at 7:30 p.m. in the Fine Arts lobby.

Mills, Clarke To Present Recital

by SUE JAMES
Fine Arts Editor

Dean of the College Garry Clarke and Assistant Professor of Music Kathleen Mills will be performing in piano recitals at three locations in March.

Cecil Community College is first on their schedule of performances, with Denison University, in Granville, Ohio, as their second stop. Clarke and Mills will then give a performance at Washington College on March 24.

The program for the recital consists of selections from Mozart (Sonata for Two Pianos), Milhaud (Scaramouche), and Brahms (Variations on a Theme by Haydn). Clarke and Mills are also including a nostalgic "self-prepared", on which the two collaborated while students at Cornell College in Iowa.

Dean Clarke and Professor Mills selected pieces for their duo piano recital last June, and have been practicing since September.

The Washington College Chorus will be performing at the Birthday Ball Convocation at 2 p.m. on February 28.

Shoremen Drop Two Conference Games

by HARRY MCENROE
Sports Editor

After dropping a pair of MAC conference battles, the Washington College basketball team's record fell to 13-11, with a paltry 2-7 league slate. The squad's dual setbacks came at the hands of conference-leaders Ursinus and Widener.

Saturday the cagers faced the same Ursinus team that had edged them earlier in the season at Cain Athletic Center. The return engagement had quite a different outcome, as the Bears trounced the Shoremen, 100-69. A 44-37 halftime spread didn't accurately reflect the tempo, as the Ursinus bench saw much action against the Shore starters. Ursinus enjoyed balanced scoring as guards Dave Mobley and Mike Brophy scored 18 and 17 points respectively. Joe Moye led the Shoremen's lackluster effort with 15 points, while freshman Scott Spurrier added 10.

The hometown fans were treated to another thriller Wednesday but once again the Shore cagers came up just short, as Widener triumphed, 72-71. The Pioneers' Dave Smith picked up the slack left by the absence of his high-scoring backcourt mate and then some, as he scored an incredible 28 first-half points. Smith made ten of eleven from the field and shot eight of nine from the charity stripe, as the Shore zone was unable to contain this sharpshooting junior. Tom Keefe had ten first-half points as the Shoremen trailed by two, 42-40.

Despite having Smith neutralized by a tough box-and-one defense, Widener managed to establish a five-point lead late in the game until sophomore Carl Fornoff came off the bench to score eight straight points, giving the Shore cagers a 69-66 lead with three minutes to play. Widener came back to take a two-point lead with a minute to go after the Shore delay game failed to produce, leading to several costly turnovers. After the Pioneers missed several free throw oppotunities which would have put the game away, the Shoremen gained possession, behind 72-71, with six seconds on the clock. With the ball at midcourt after a time-out, the cagers could only come up with an off-balanced Jim Corey twenty-footer in hopes of victory. It didn't fall.

SHORE NOTES:

The Shoremen's final game of the year will be played here tomorrow night against arch-rival Johns Hopkins at 7:30 p.m. The cagers' record now stands 13-11.

Curriculum Regiurements

Under such a plan, the department of Music could be permitted to offer half courses, which are defined in the proposal as "courses meeting over an entire semester that involve appoximately one-half the meeting times and preparation of full courses at Washington College." Under a similar recommendation, changes would be made in the course of music offered under the category of applied music in pairs and to complete changes from full to half courses.

The Project Award Program

The final recommendation of the Council to the faculty is "that additional programs be developed, each having the purpose of increasing the intellectual atmosphere of the campus by encouraging scholarly and creative activities of our students." Therefore, the Council has recommended that a Project Award Program be instituted in order to allow outstanding students the opportunity to do research in individualized programs to augment the traditional learning offered at the College. Projects may be preparatory work for senior obligations, they may be done in any year at college, and they may be awarded to a group of students. Students who might take up this option would be asked to provide details of the project, a description, and a budget. Budgets would be required to be no greater than $2000.

Student Registration

Finally, in order to assure that students choose courses carefully and to make attendance at the beginning of each semester essential, the Council has recommended that "Students registered in a course who do not attend the first class meeting and students wishing to enroll in a course after the first meeting may be admitted only at the discretion of the instructor."

Editorial Rebuttal

projects come from the heavy-laden taxpayers.

As Dan Smoot once wrote, "Government cannot make men prosperous any more than it can make men good. Government cannot produce anything. It can merely seize and divide up what individuals produce. Government can give the people nothing which government has not durst taken away from them. And the amount which government doles back to the people or spends to promote their welfare is always less than what it takes, because of the excessive cost of governmental administration."

If we would all demand sacrificing some luxuries which some people say are important but to most are not —if we'd cut out deficit spending and printing paper money to "pay" for it—we'd throw off the noose of inflation that is strangling this nation.

If we had more confidence in a hard-work future than a dole-for-votes present, there would be a glorious American future and it could start now.

Yes Virginia, there is a Ronald Reagan. He exists in the hearts and minds of all Americans who want to make this nation great again. And we should all be damn proud that Ronald Reagan has enough guts to make the hare decisions and spending cuts to put our country back on a strong economic course.

Respectfully,
Joe Holt

Sophie Kerr Committee Plans Festival

by JEFF ALDERSON
Layout Editor

The Sophie Kerr Committee is currently in the process of applying for grants from the state of Maryland for funds to sponsor the "Symposium on the Maryland Writer." The series is to take place in the spring of 1982 as the college bicentennial comes to a climax.

This symposium will have two pars taking place simultaneously. First, writers from Maryland will be invited to give readings, lectures, and possibly workshops. The Committee is also considering well-known scholars to talk about famous Maryland authors such as Frederick Douglass, John Barth, and James M. Cain, a Washington College graduate and son of a famous Washington College president. There is a possibility of having at least two scholars speak about each writer in a type of "festival."

"These plans are still tentative," said Dr. Richard DeProspo, assistant professor of English. "The Maryland Writers Festival is only a part of a greater program which the Sophie Kerr Committee is preparing for the Bicentennial."

Public Relations Firm Hired for Bicentennial Work

by NEWS BUREAU

A letter of agreement has been signed with The Hannaford Company, Public Relations and Public Affairs, to act as consultant to Washington College from now through the completion of the Bicentennial year in May, 1982. The firm will provide counsel and development of a detailed "blueprint" for the College public relations office to follow and execute.

Founded in 1975 as Deaver and Hannaford, Inc., with offices in Los Angeles, New York, Sacramento, and Washington, DC, the company was renamed in January when partner Michael Deaver accepted the position of Deputy Chief-of-Staff under President Ronald Reagan.

Peter D. Hannaford, now President and Chairman of the Board of The Hannaford Company, is a graduate of the University of California, Berkeley. He spent 17 years in public relations and advertising in the San Francisco Bay area before interrupting his private enterprise career briefly to become Assistant to the Governor and Director of Public Affairs for Governor Ronald Reagan of California. Under his supervision were the press office, speech research, community relations unit and the Office of Information Services, an information clearinghouse for the 45 departments of state government.

The Hannaford Company proposes, as a long range objective, to identify Washington College as a quality liberal arts college to the broadest possible audience, concentrating in the mid-Atlantic and Northeastern states. The short range goal is to capitalize to the fullest on the 200th anniversary of the founding of the College in 1782. Their public relations strategy includes a number of steps:

•To build a media program around the three major events of the Bicentennial academic year: the October 10, 1981 Fall Convocation and celebration of Washington College's link with Aberdeen University, Scotland, the Washington's Birthday Convocation on February 20, 1982; the 200th Commencement on May 16, 1982.

•Prior to the first event, in the spring and summer of 1981, The Hannaford Company will call on feature editors of regional newspapers to promote features about the College and its Bicentennial and to request editorials saluting the College. Press kits, including photos, a brief history of the College, and news releases prepared by the College public relations office, will be left with each editor.

•The Hannaford Company is presently working on a broad target list of consumer magazines which might be interested in publishing features about the College and its Bicentennial.

•Similarly, a target list of professional publications in the education field is being developed. Stories would be written to suit individual interests.

•The company will explore possible feature coverage of the Bicentennial with television "magazine" programs, the morning network programs, regional and network interview shows and public television and radio.

•The use of commercially produced radio and television "news clips" which would be distributed to regional stations as a public service will be explored.

•Relevant media will be covered with press releases prepared by the College highlighting various events of the Bicentennial as they are planned and carried out.

•The climax of the Bicentennial year will be the graduation exercises on May 16, 1982. The President of the United States and the First Lady have been invited for this event. If they are available, the event will in itself be a national news story. The Hannaford Company will assist to the fullest extent possible in the effort to secure their participation. If they cannot attend, the possibility of the Vice-President or a senior level Cabinet member will be explored.

•The Hannaford Company will also provide speakers for other events during the year if desired by the College drawing upon their enormous list of professional contacts, clients and their own Speakers Bureau.

According to Peter Hannaford, "All independent private colleges in the United States face increasing pressure in their effort to survive and prosper. Because of its age and history, Washington College can be the focal point of media attention on independent colleges during the occasion of its Bicentennial year."

The Hannaford Company has waived its normal professional service fees for this project since Washinton College is an eleemosynary institution and Paul Boertlein, a 1975 graduate of the College, is a vice-president of the firm.

SGA Meeting: Hill Dorms, Allocations, "Crack the Sky"

by BILL MORTIMER
Assistant Editor

The Student Government Association held its regular meeting on Monday, February 23, 1981 in the Sophie Kerr Room of Miller Library.

The first order of business had to do with the use of the Hill Dorms. A poll was taken last week concerning the future use of the Hill Dorms. Eighty-three percent of the students attending the meals at which the vote was taken voted. Of these, 67 percent voted that the Hill Dorms should remain in use by the fraternities exclusively. Thirty-three percent voted that the Hill Dorms should be opened to any group, whether academic interest groups, fraternities, or any other special interest.

As a result of the poll, Jay Young, SGA president, suggested that since it is the feeling of a majority of those students who voted that the Hill Dorms should only be used by the fraternities and by no one else, that the SGA take this stand. The rationale is that the SGA should go along with the majority of student opinion.

Although there was some objection as to the way the poll was taken, Young insisted that it "was more a referendum, and fairly done. The point can't be argued, more than one-half of the students were represented," Young said. The nomination was passed, after some discussion. There was one nay vote, and one abstention.

The next order of business was a subcommitte report given by Geoff Garinther, SGA Vice-President and SAB President. Leadership and the purposes of the Collage were discussed at the last meeting. A report will be given next week on the Academic State of the College. The issue of a graduation speaker was also brought up. George Dennis reported that at the Senior Class meeting, the possibility of having a student speak at graduation will be discussed.

Dave Pointon, SGA treasurer, brought up the matter of allocations. He reported that this year the SGA received $8855 for allocations, compared to $9042 last year. Three organizations attended the Requisition meeting, but Pointon received requests after the meeting. The German Club, The Dance Club, and The Student Energism Project all received their respective grants of $140, $140, and $175. Those groups which did not attend the Requisition meeting were the William James Forum, the Woman's Lacrosse Club, and a request made by R. Janson-LaPalme for fundings for three upcoming art exhibits. Of these, the William James Forum and the Woman's Lacrosse Club were given their requests of $1800 and $675 respectively. Due to a lack of sufficient information at the Requisition meeting the sailing club was asked to return with a more organized proposition. Because the club consists of only two members and because the SGA feels the upkeep of the boats is the resposability of the school, the SGA denied funding to the Sailing Club. However, it was decided that a letter

SGA, Alumni Council

by GINGER KURAPKA

The Alumni Council passed unanimously a resolution favoring the return of the rebuilt Hill Dorms to the three fraternities that have been housed in these historic buildings for so many years."

In a separate decision, the SGA decided nearly unanimously to agree with last week's poll, taken in the cafeteria, against the Student Affairs Committee proposal to house academic interest groups in the Hill Dorms. The SGA felt it should be a reflection of a majority of student opinion. The poll was taken because, said SGA President Jay Young, "I had been asked what the SGA position was and I felt that I would be asked in the Board meeting if the issue came up, and the poll provided the numbers on which to base the SGA position."

No advance notice was given that the poll was to be taken so that, "no one could get together a coalition," said Young. "It was a spontaneous yet representative smapie." Members from both pro-fraternity and pro-academic housing Hill Dorm groups were present while the poll was taken.

Some question has been raised to the validity of the poll. "It would be useful for the Board to understand somehow that this was a biased sample in that off-board students were not around to vote in the poll," said Steven Cades, chairman of the Student Affairs committee. "Also those students who are most disappointed with the social life outside the fraternities are no longer here, those students who are part of the 50 percent. who leave Washington College before their senior year."

Preliminary data from the committee on retention and attrition indicates that 50 percent. of all entering students leave Washington College by their senior year. Twenty percent leave after their freshman year, and another twenty-percent after their sophomore year.

Editorial

In light of the preliminary results of the retention and attrition committee study, the Academic Council's curriculum proposal seems to be appropriate, a step toward retaining those students we want most to keep.

The most important part of the proposal is the institution of a writing requirement. It's too bad that students should have to learn how to write after they are in college; blame can be shared among secondary-school teachers, parents, students themselves, even society as a whole. Who or what to blame is less important than how to solve the problem. If a writing requirement ensures that Washington College will produce graduates who know how to write, then let's have a writing requirement.

The other proposed curricular changes are designed to tighten distribution requirements without sacrificing much of the flexibility of the current system. It seems that every effort is being made by the Academic Council to present students with opportunities to take advantage of, rather than with rules to be obeyed. We hope the faculty passes this proposal. We think that we Washington College students will benefit from it.

Letters to the Editor

Commencement Speaker Objection

To the Editor:

I am writing this letter to protest the choice of this year's commencement speaker.

Personally, I haven't the slightest interest in hearing Mr. Wallich speak at my commencement. I don't mean to disparage Mr. Wallich. In fact, any attempt on my part to criticize him would be ridiculous, as I haven't the slightest idea who he is. Perhaps this betrays my ignorance, but I don't think I'm alone in wondering who this man is and why he is speaking at this year's commencement.

I do, however, mean to criticize Dr. McLain. He is stepping on the graduating class in what should be their finest hour. Again.

Dr. McLain contacted three people chosen by the seniors from a list circulated earlier in the school year. All three declined, for various reasons. Fine. At that point, Dr. McLain should have asked for names of other potential speakers from the same list. Or he should have consulted with the senior class officers about alternatives. Or he should have requested a second poll of the seniors. Or he should have just spoken informally with as many seniors as possible.

What he should not have done is ask a friend of his, who, until we were informed that this person was to be commencement speaker, was virtually unknown on this campus.

I am sure Dr. McLain ment well in choosing his friend to speak at commencement. But in this case, meaning well is not good enough. My graduation from Washington College is going to be one of the most important moments of my life, and I intend to treat it as such even if this college does not. I do not propose to accept the fact that fifteen or ten or two years from now, I will not be able to remember the name of the speaker at my commencement.

More immediately, I do not propose to accept the fact that this year's commencement seems to be getting brushed aside to make way for next year's gala extravaganza. I certainly have no objection to any celebration of this college's 200th anniversary, but please let's remember that 199 comes before 200. It appears to me that this year's class is being asked to graduate quietly and get out of the way so the real festivities can begin. I do not like being insulted like this, and I do feel insulted.

Again, I do not mean to criticize Mr. Wallich—he doesn't deserve the criticism in this situation. Dr. McLain does.

Sincerely,
Larry Stahl

Civil Air Patrol Reorganizes

Dear Editor:

The Civil Air Patrol has recently reorganized in Kent County. We presently have a membership of ten. We are a non-profit organization teaching leadership, aerospace education, and search and rescue techniques to the teenagers of this county. The Civil Air Patrol is the official auxiliary of the United States Air Force. The age range for Cadets is 12 years through 18 years. At the age of 18 a Cadet can then transfer to the Senior Program. There are many benefits offered the Cadets that come into our program. They have the opportunity to travel, learn to fly, plus get their pilots license. They have an opportunity to travel, in this country and abroad. If interested in the Armed Forces of the country, they can join the United States Air Force, and upon completing Basic Training they will be moved up two ranks automatically. If interested in the Air Force Academy, they may take the Entrance Exam and upon passing receive an appointment to that Academy. Ten percent of all classes at the Academy are CAP Cadets. There are many other benefits that I will not go into in this letter, as it would take too much time.

If anyone at the College is interested in joining our program, they may reach me at 778-5432. I will be glad to meet with them and explain our program completely to them.

Very truly yours,
William T. Ball
1LT CAP
Squadron Commander

P.S. We meet on Sunday afternoons from 2 PM to 5PM. Our meeting place is Site 2 at the NIKE BASE, Toichester, MD. off Route 20.

Students on General Assembly Internship

by CHRISTY HOLT

This semester Geoff Garinther, Jennifer Hammond, Bob Hockaday, John Lawrence, Cathy McGuire, Dave Pointon, Chris Sylvester and Jack Willis are involved in an internship program with the Maryland General Assembly. Each of these students has been assigned to a senator or delegate, and on Tuesdays and Thursdays of each week they serve as their aides.

The duties of the interns vary depending on for whom they are working, but often include such things as writing press releases, taking notes, doing research, and handling constituent mail. They must also attend a seminar here at the college once a week, keep a journal, and write a paper on something related to their work as interns. In return for their work they receive two course credits, a stipend of $400, and a lot of good experience working with the legislature.

Dr. Chaney, intern coordinator, said that this program is good for both the Assembly and the students. "The Assembly is happy because they get energetic help, and the students are happy because they get first hand knowledge of the legislature."

Proposed Curriculum Changes Culmination of Clarke's Early Goals

by BILL MORTIMER
Assistant Editor

When Dean of the College Garry Clarke took office in 1977, he brought the matters of faculty competency and the rate of attrition into his goals for the school. Recent developments by the Academic Council, of which Clarke is chairman, seem to be results of Clarke's early thoughts on some problems of Washington College.

"Basically, the things I outlined when I first talked to the faculty in 1977 are the basic problems which confront any academic program," said Clarke, referring to the official remarks he made as new acting Dean of the College at the faculty's meeting of September 12, 1977. At that time, Clarke noted that the "goals of a course could be easily defined." Clarke asked the faculty two very important questions concerning the academic status of Washington College. "Are we (the faculty) competent? And are we producing the best possible results?", he asked.

At the meeting, Clarke stressed the fact that what is needed in order to insure the future of the College is "an exceptional faculty." In particular, he offered to "support those of you who create an exciting atmosphere in the classroom."

In what appears to be a manifestation of Clarke's earlier goals, the Academic Council last week completed a proposal for several important changes in the school's program. The proposed changes in the writing program have been in need of change since even before Clarke took the position of Dean. "When I came into office," he said, "the business of writing and of student's writing problems was under discussion." The proposal made by the Council is, said Clarke, "an attempt to come to terms with what is one of the most complicated problems."

Such a proposal was hotly debated. There were "many ideas on what constitutes a basic solution to the writing problem," Clarke said. The plan proposed, the entire Council feels, will be effective and not run of the mill. "There are real possibilities if we do them," Clarke added. What is hoped by both the Council and by Clarke himself is that by making specific regulations in the writing program and by making an adjustment in the system of course distribution, the entire system will be tightened up and, added Clarke, "that we can have a stronger academic program as a result."

"No matter how long one works on the kinds of things I stated in 1977, one never reaches a satisfactory conclusion," Clarke said. The most effective program is one which is constantly under evaluation and review. "The statements which I made in 1977," Clarke said, "are ones which one must simply keep re-addressing."

In order to keep the problems of the system in the light, the Retention Study Committee was formed. Retention "is still very much a problem at Washington College," Clarke said. The committee, it is hoped, "will address this in the form of a document with some recommendations which are being formulated already," Clarke said. Such a committee as this is another part of Clarke's initial goals, when, in 1977, he said, "attrition is a serious business and we must ask ourselves why students leave our college."

Clarke feels that "the upp upcoming Middle States Evaluation is a way of looking at what we are doing and then making positive changes." In such a process as the Middle States Evaluation, which is currently in progress, technically having started in 1979, various Middle States officials re-evaluate what the College is doing in terms of what the College defined as its goals and objectives.

With the Academic Council's proposal, the RetentionCommittee, and the Middle States Evaluation, to name a few, "we are trying to move the school to a positive direction," said Clarke. The hope is to re-establish the liberal arts tradition in a positive way in order to continue what Clarke termed in 1977 as "the joy of learning."

Proposed Changes at a Glance

by BILL MORTIMER
Assistant Editor

The writing skills of incoming freshmen will be tested. If a satisfactory mark is not achieved, the student will be required to enroll in the Writing Workshop.

•The Workshop is required for graduation for students who need it. Attendance is also required.

•Attendance will normally be for one semester. If the goals are achieved more quickly, and if the workshop instructor advises it, early excuse from the workshop will be given.

•Written Work after the Freshman Year

The faculty of Washington College is expected and authorized to refuse credit or to give a reduced grade if written work is not done effectively.

•Recommendation 2

Two semester courses with the four distribution groups plus two semester courses elected from each of two groups constitute the distribution requirement.

•Recommendation 3

Two semester courses may be taken pass/fail for distribution credit.

•Recommendation 4

The formal studies requirement may be satisfied by (a) two semesters of mathematics, computer science, music theory, foreign language, or logic, (b) four semester courses of a foreign language may be taken, (c) four semester courses in mathematics, provided two are courses in computer science and that the other two are not, (d) three courses in mathematics, one being in computer science, and one not, (e) any two courses in mathematics, and (f) a combination of linguistics and logic.

•The course Credit System

Because of a suggestion made by the music department the Academic Council has proposed that since some courses consist of areas of study that do not belong in one course, some changes be made to allow more flexibility in the four-course plan.

•Recommendation 1

That the Music Department be allowed to offer half courses. These are defined as courses meeting over an entire semester that involve one half the meeting time and preparation of a full course.

•Recommendation 2

That certain courses be paired as half courses and that certain other full courses be made half course.

•The Project Award Program

This is the intended development of a new program in order to encourage an intellectual atmosphere on campus. This program is designed to enhance learning.

•Recommendation 1

The Project Award Program is designed to give outstanding students the opportunity to conduct individualized research and programs in addition to the more conventional modes of learning.

•Students submitting proposals would be asked to supply a detailed description of the project and budget, which should not exceed $2,000.

•Miscellaneous

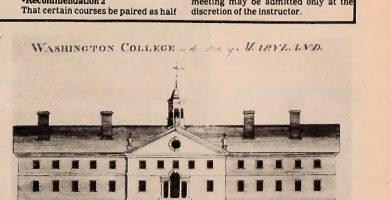
To encourage students to choose their courses carefully and to attend classes from the beginning of each semester, the Counsil has recommended that students who register in a course and do not attend the first meeting or students who wish to enroll after the first meeting may be admitted only at the discretion of the instructor.

Middle Hall Archeological Dig Tentatively Planned

by JEFF ALDERSON
Layout Editor



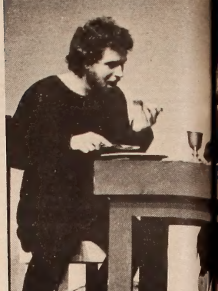
As the renovation work continues on the Hill Dorms, the possibility of archeological finds intensifies. Dr. Robert Janson-LaPalme, associate Professor of Art, is currently making plans for an archeological investigation.

Since there is not much time for intensive research, this project will be very limited. "We don't have the time or money for a lengthy professional archeological investigation," said Janson-LaPalme. "We now have several people in mind who might act as superintendents (for the project)."

Some of the work on the project may be done by some of the people who helped with the White Swan Tavern excavation in Chestertown. The group consisted, all told, of around 125 people including some Chesapeake College students.

"Some Washington College students do want to help," added Janson-LaPalme. "Some of them have a little background in archeology." "But," he emphasized," we are ready to teach anyone interested."

One of the discoveries already made is what appears to be a "deep hole."



cornerstone was laid in May of 1844 with a zinc box containing documents, newspapers, and coins sealed within. This may contain some information about the original college structure.

If adequate evidence is found concerning the plan of the original building, a model will be constructed based on the facts discovered. The engraving of the building will also be used in the construction. Janson-LaPalme has found someone to construct the model. "An agreement is being worked out on the cost," he said. "We hope to get to work on this soon.

A rich part of our college's history may be preserved beneath and around Middle Hall. Hopefully, by the Bicentennial, work will be completed and part of Washington College's academic heritage will be revealed.

Ondine—Sea Ma

What is the best way to revisit the Middle Ages? Through a time machine? Sure, if one's available, but the Washington College Drama Department's production of Jean Giraudoux' Ondine was the surest method to savor the life and fantasy of the Middle Ages on Thursday, Friday, and Saturday nights of last week.

As a tragicomedy, Ondine delved into the affairs of a sea-maiden during her visit to the medieval mortal world. The performance was almost three hours long, but it was far from being monotonous. It was a superb production with comedy threaded throughout, until the touching ending, in which Ondine prepares to return to the depths of the Rhine as a sea creature once more.

Linda Medina displayed fine acting abilities in her role as Ondine. Ondine wants to experience everything that there is to experience in the mortal world. She constantly makes inquiries about the mortal conception of love, and to her disappointment, comes to a realization at the end of the play, about the decieving nature of men in love.

Medina used the stage very effectively as she whisked back and forth with a seemingly endless supply of energy. Her flamboyant speeches kept the audience on the edges of their seats as she delivered statements that were meant to teach the mortals a lesson or two concerning their opinions on such matters as someone's appearance.

When Ondine is introduced in court to the King (Nick Nappo), she is advised by Lord Chamberlain (Ted Legated) not to speak of the King's wart. In her innocent state, however, Ondine believes that itis necessary to state one's opinions. She proceeds, unknowingly, to insult the king by speaking of his wart. It is a hilarious scene as one of the ladies in the court, Sally McKenzie, faints from embarrassment.

Another vivacious actor who added much excitement to the production was Bill Mortimer. In h e deeply in love with Hans. Brown assumed a stern attitude as she listened to the insults coming from Ondine with a flustered expression, and as she accepted Ondine's plea for forgiveness with an unpardoning attitude. Brown moved from one emotion to another, projecting an unrelenting air at the foot of the King's throne, and then sobbing aloud a minute later.

As the King, Nick Nappo asserted the air of a patient and conceited figure. He was majestic in his role, and assumed the right attitude for carrying out court matters. This conceited attitude was revealed during the recitation of his background, which included a statement concerning his resemblance to Hercules. Ondine brings him down to earth again and the King appreciates her innocent disposition.

Steve Gaul and Ginnie White were well-chosen to carry the roles of Ondine's adopted parents Auguste and Eugenie. As parents of the Middle Ages, Gaul and White were down-to-earth in their character portrayals. They attempt to reform Ondine, but realize they cannot do it. The supernatural events that take place outside their cottage leave them awe-struck, but they can accept the out-of-the ordinary. Their appearances in the play were few, but effective. They got the audience's attention in the first act, as they bickered about domestic affairs in a comical fashion.

Some other comic figures who deserve recognition are Ted Legates, Wanda Rich, and alumnus T.S. Edward Tatnall.

Legates was well suited for his portrayal in the role of The Lord Chamberlain. Practically glued to his long sceptre, Legates strode back and forth across the stage while using comic gestures and assuming a very conceited attitude. Ondine constantly rebuked the Chamberlain by ignoring him while he spoke to her, and his vocal tone revealed his annoyance with her. He was all the more consistant in his court attitude.

Wanda Rich and T.S. Edward Tatnall displayed their rich and professional opera voices in the roles of Salammbo and Matho. They constantly kept the audience laughing as they interrupted the important affairs of the court with a few lines from "Salammbo." Both kept from cracking a smile during their serious opera interludes while the audience broke out in laughter.

A very effective stage device used in Ondine was a translucent screen that hid the three Ondines, Jodee Baccala, Holli Mathison, and Beth Miller. Its effectiveness was noted as the Ondines appeared as illusions advising Ondine. These Ondines also had superb singing abilities. The screen was unveiled at a later point in the play to reveal the Hall in the King's palace. The multiple uses of this stage device made it a versatile piece.

All of the cast members carried their roles nearly flawlessly, and even the smallest roles deserve recognition. Those not previously mentioned, but who added much comic flavor to the production were David Gorman, the Superintendent; George Dennis, the Trainer of seals; John Porter, Bertram; Sally McKenzie, Violante; Tamara Dubin, Angelique; Mark Simpson, Servant; Chris Ellinghaus, Fisherman; Doug Brown, First Judge; Todd Crosby, Second Judge; Jeff Donahoe, the Clerk; Jeff Alderson, Executioner; and Suzanne Zimmer, the Kitchen Maid.

Timothy Maloney directed a fine production of Ondine. The main stage of the Tawes Theatre was definitely suitable for the fine props and professional lighting used in the production. For the cast members, those people who spent much time and effort to create one of the best productions at the college, praise is well deserved.

Vanities Cast, in Rehearsal

by JEFF ALDERSON
Layout Editor

The Washington College Drama Department will be presenting Vanities, by Jack Heifner. The play, which made its Broadway debut in 1976, is being directed by Stephen Drewes and stars Natalie Brown as Kathy, Cat Carrier as Mary, and Sally McKenzie as Joanne.

Vanities follows three women from their senior year in high school to the age of twenty-eight. "It's a feminist play," said Drewes, "I would call it a serious comedy, that is, a comedy about a serious subject. It focuses on the role of women in American life and their expectations of life as well as the roles they are asked to fulfill."

The play will be performed on stage in "Phebe's", the studio theater. "I think the play is very relevant," said Drewes. "It's well written and the cast is small. It's very much suited to the space downstairs."

Rehearsals have just started. The play will be performed April 9, 10, 11, and 12. It is the second play Drewes has directed at Washington College. His last production was Kennedy's Children.

Tamara Dubin and Bill Mortimer at last year's Birthday Ball. This year's event will take place at 9:00 p.m. in the Cain Athletic Center. Music will be provided by the Moonlighters.

Poet Frank Bidart Reads

by COLLEEN C. MILLER

A desperate voice seeking to understand this world. Frank Bidart's poetry is the medium through which we hear that voice. And we must listen.

A marked change from contemporary free verse, Bidart's poems are long dramatic monologues, poems in which a speaking persona addresses a silent listener. Bidart read three poems, Ellen West, For Mary Ann Younger, and The War of Vaslav Nijinsky before a packed audience on February 11.

Accompanying his reading with gestures and a voice modulated by tension, Frank Bidart almost becomes the personae in his monologues. Whether male or female, Bidart's personas speak in black and white tones, in lines which Donald Hall in The Atlantic Monthly calls "plain, flat, and 'not poetry'."

Honesty and innovative structure are Bidart's two best qualities. Only a strong sense of insight could allow him to touch the deepest agonies of a woman who, locked within her body, refuses to feed such a "prison", as Bidart does in Ellen West.

A personal voyage, the end result being freedom, guides Bidart's personas as they move through a world of loneliness and alienation. The War of Vaslav Nijinsky describes one man's frightening struggle with madness. The people in Bidart's monologues are beating against brick walls.

Ultimately, what frees the personae in Bidart's monologues is their resolve. They must suffer the inevitable and this they will do. "I tell myself: 'Insanity is the insistence on meaning'," says one persona in The Arc, a monologue from Bidart's The Book of the Body.

Frank Bidart was born in Bakersfield, California and attended the University of California at Riverside and Harvard University. "I don't think I wrote anything good as an undergraduate. I think I wrote one good poem," remarked Bidart. After experimenting with plays, dramas and films, Bidart decided to write poetry. "At a certain point I felt the way I could say the things I had to say was in poems. Poetry, I found, was the medium I could really use."

Now living in Cambridge, Massachusetts and teaching at Wellesley College, Frank Bidart is dubious about giving advice to young writers. "If I were to give advice to young writers it would be two things: to think hard about the poets you really like and to ask yourself why they are good; to mean every word you say."

Though Bidart does not write regularly, "months go by and I don't write a poem," he said, his poems have appeared in American Review and Ploughshares and have been anthologized in The American Poetry Anthology. He is also the author of two books, Golden State (1973) and The Book of the Body (1977) and a new long poem Nijinsky, will appear later this year in The Paris Review. "I hope my books are books," said Bidart, "And that they are unified."

Rock Opera at WC: Liberated Arts

by BOB STRONG

There may be some high brows raised at WC in April. The reason is rock—hard rock. Jodee Baccalla, senior WC music major, has composed a rock opera.

Jenny like Jesus Christ Superstar, will attempt to bridge the gap between pop music and artistic expression. The plot is set in the counterculture of the sixties. Jenny is an apostle of the cultural revolution that sent chords of amplified cacophany throughout the establishment.

Rock operas are designed to appeal to all classes of listeners. On the simplest level, the songs themselves are entertaining, simply as rock. But the sensitive listener will see and hear more.

Each song in a rock opera encapsulates an event in the life of its subject—in this case Jenny's. This biographical moment is illuminated and enhanced by the music. The themes which underlie the melody incorporate the action with the music.

According to Dean Kelly, productions of this type provide talented students the opportunity to channel their creative skills and to express themselves. There is no academic pressure; the production is strictly an extracurricular activity promoted by STEP, the Student Energism Project. This is not, however, to detract from the prodigious efforts that many sudents are making in order that it be a success. All aspects of the production will be student supervised.

Alex Hidge has the responsibility of organizing and rehearsing the band. Directors are Ginny White and Joneen Nielson and choreography is by Suzanne Zimmer and Todd Crosby.

The main character, Jenny, will be palyed by Jodee herself. Other characteres are: Maggie played by Kara Beale; mother played by Jean-Marie Fegely; father by Jeff Donahue; Sunny by Kate Winslow; Consciousness played by Chris Eilinghaus; Andrew by Todd Crosby and the Cabaret singer will be played by Suzanne Zimmer.

The demands of set form are considerable. Features such as dramatic sequence, costuming, lighting, choreography and orchestration which must complement the music will tax even Jodee Baccala's impressive singing, composing and directing talents. Coherence and unity in a musical composition require a structure based upon a unifying idea. That idea, should Jodee succeed, will be shaped into three acts.

This story is tragic, but not pessimistic. The spectator will not enjoy the ending, but he will be moved by it. The immortal words of Arnold Schoenberg might be called to mind: "a work of art can achieve no finer effect than when it transmits to the beholder the emotions that raged in the creator, in such a way that they rage and storm also in him."

Hartigan Lecture, Exhibit Reviewed

by TAMARA DUBIN

Grace Hartigan is a painter of the "second generation" of Abstract Expressionism who emerged out of the late 1950's. Her art began in New York in an age of rebellion against the European art world. The friends in her circle included Milton Avery, William Rothko, Adolph Gottlieb, Jackson Pollack and William deKooning. The style which she claims is distinctly personal in her work is bold, colorful and controversial.

As part of her lecture last Wednesday evening, Hartigan took a walk through Tawes Theatre where her show "Twenty-five Years of Collage" has been displayed for the past two weeks. Pointing out various works, Hartigan tried to explain the theory behind her collages. According to Hartigan there is more involved than the finished piece. The collage is the end product of a long process of discovery. "What you see is the triumph," she claimed. collages in the late 50's, Hartigan used anything—leftovers from her larger paintings, clippings from the floor, blottings from her paintings, newspapers and current magazine ads. She ripped and cut, arranging and rearranging without prethought until "it either worked or it didn't." If this sounds like a haphazard style of art, Hartigan recalled the tradition of Braque and Picasso "to make art out of anything".

Hartigan began to expand the scope of her collages by began to cut and use scraps of her own lithographs within the compositions of works such as "From Eyes Blue and Cold."

This led to her watercolor collages of the 1960's and 70's. For these she would paint a series of watercolors, cun and rip them into pieces and reassemble them into a collage. Hartigan risked the chance she takes in essentially destroying watercolors for a collage. "I've always been involved with danger. The danger is that I would destroy and then reassemble." The success of her reassemblage is questionable in the final product. The most successful of these works are the "clematis", "Roses", and "Tiger Lilies" collages. Hartigan experiments with a great variety of subjects because each one found is like "buying a ticket for a journey". She has used fruit, flowers, hats, gloves, Indian weapons, and even a broken hammer left by someone trying to break into her Baltimore studio. She also uses literary themes suggested by working closely with contemporary poets like Frank O'Hara and even by a Salinger short story.

In 1960, Hartigan moved from New York which "has everything in the world there" and accepted a teaching position at the Maryland Institute of Art. Asked why she made the move, Hartigan answered "I married a man, what else?" Now she is director of the Hoffberger School of Painting and continues to find an exciting challenge in the graduate students she teaches. As for New York, it is still her first love. "but I couldn't create anymore in New York," she claimed, "New York is for the young".

Spanish Assistant Here for Semester

by JEFF ALDERSON
Layout Editor

"I wanted to get to know the people and the culture (of the United States)," said Malli Sarmiento, the new Spanish assistant.

Malli spoke to an English teacher in Spain about coming to the United States for one year. "I was looking for different places to go in the United States. I was thinking of going to Belmont but the day school began was at a good time for me to leave Spain."

Sometime later her teacher called and told Malli about Thomas Pabon, Chairman of the Modern Languages department at Washington College. He was visiting in Spain and mentioned that he needed a Spanish assistant. After asking her parents about the job, Malli decided to come to Washington College.

Malli is originally from Madrid, Spain. She is from a family with four children. Her education is equivalent to that of a high school graduate although the educational system in Spain is very different from that of the United States. After she passes one more exam she can enter the university.

While attending Washington College, Malli is taking Linguistics, Spanish-American Literature, Philosophy, and Spanish. She won't be taking any exams because she still has some difficulty understanding some aspects of English.

When she returns to Spain, Malli hopes to work with public relations. She misses her family and friends but most of all the food. "The thing I like the most here is the people, but the food is the worst."

Some of her interests include sports, such as tennis, skiing and jogging, and reading. "But above all," she added, "I like meeting people." She also enjoys dancing and is currently learning how to play the piano.

Malli would like to visit Canada and Florida. She has already been to New York City and Washington, D.C. "I want to learn English, see the country and spend a nice holiday."

"When I leave I will miss the independence that the people have here," she said. Malli feels that the parent/child relationship is more independent here than in Spain.

Malli hopes to come back to the U.S. every summer and possibly to go to school. "Nothing is definite though," she said. "It is very sad to leave people that I haven't been able to know more."

Mark Strand to Read Poetry and Fiction

Mark Strand will read from his poetry and fiction March 17 at 8 p.m. in the Sophie Kerr Room of the Miller Library. The reading is sponsered by the Sophie Kerr committee and the public is invited to attend.

Strand is the author of seven books of poems, including Reasons for Moving, Darker, The story of Our Lives, The Late Hour, and Selected Poems. He has been the recipient of many awards, including the Edgar Allen Poe Award, feilowships from the Guggenheim Foundation and the National Endowment for the Arts, and most recently, the fellowship of the Academy of American Poets for "distinguished poetic achievement."

Currently Strand is completing a collection of short fiction to be published by Alfred Knopf. A frequent contributor of both poems and stories to The New Yorker, Strand is also widely known as a translator of Rafael Alberti (The Owl's Insomnia) and Carlos Drummond de Andrade Souvenir of the Ancient World). In addition, Strand has edited three poetry anthologies: The Contemporary American Poets, Another Republic, and New poetry of Mexico.

Octavio Paz , the celebrated Mexican poet, writing of Strand, said, "The poetry of Mark Strand explores the terra infirma of our lives... He has chosen the negative path, with loss as the first step towards fullness; it is also the opening to a transparent verbal perfection. Made from fragile and changing words, the poem converts itself into 'the mirror in which pain is asleep.' The silence secreted in each thing and each being is transformed into a name."

A reception will follow the reading at the Alumni House.

CLAUDE CHABROL

Directed by Claude Chabrol and starring Isabelle Huppert and Stephane Audran, a scandal-sheet beta noire for the bourgeoisie, a perverse heroine for the surrealists, and a continuing enigma for crime historians, 18-year-old Violette Noziere became the central figure in one of the most celebrated cases of her era when she poisoned her parents in 1933. Chabrol fashions the film not as a policeblotter reconstruction but as a tantalizing and elegant puzzle, transcending the sordid events of the story through an intricately rearranged time-scheme, a sensuous period atmosphere, and Chabrol's usual delight in the spectacle of bourgeois stupidity. The result is a provocative double vision that remains true to the banal surface of the murderess while finding within her an inexhaustible source of mystery and speculation. Isabelle Huppert won the best actress award at Cannes for this role. In French with English subtitles.

Reagan's Budget Cut Proposals Effecting Students, Arts, Humanities

by JANET HOOK
Chronicle of Higher Education

The government would drastically curtail its commitment to aid middle-income college students, educational research, and the arts and humanities under the unprecedented $41.4-billion package of budget cuts unveiled by President Reagan last week.

The Administration's long-awaited economic proposals also called for a radical retrenchment of federal involvement in many other fields, ranging from museum services to science and technology-areas where officials say past spending levels cannot be justified in a time of severe economic constraints.

"Spending by the government must be limited to those functions which are the proper province of government," President Reagan told a joint session of Congress last Wednesday. "We can no longer afford things simply because we thing of them."

Administration officials said the total economic package of spending cuts would save the government almost $50-billion in fiscal 1982, which begins October 1.

The proposals are only the first installment of reduction being planned by the Office of Management and Budget, spokesmen said. Another round of proposals, expected to save an additional $6-billion, is expected to be submitted to Congress on March 10, when the Administration sends up the details of last week's proposed cutbacks.

Precisely how much colleges and universities would lose under the budget, compared with the proposals President Carter sent Congress in January, is unclear, since Mr. Reagan's budget bases its cuts not on his predecessor's requests, but on different economic calculations that the new budget documentsdid not spell out.

A principal point of Mr. Reagan's budget is to make deep cuts in federal programs that benefit middle-and upper-income Americans. That strategy, the Administration said, will "arrest what has heretofore been an unfortunate national drift toward the universalization of social benefits."

A key element of that plan is a set of proposals to revamp student-assistance programs for which middle- and upper-income students have been eligible since 1978.

Awards to more affluent students under the Pell Grant program, formerly known as the Basic Educational Opportunity Grants, would be reexamined by requiring families to contribute more money toward their children's college expenses.

Under existing law, families earning less than $25,000 a year are required to contribute up to 14 percent of their disposable income. The Reagan plan would require them to contribute 20 per cent of their income to education costs, and wealthier families may be asked to pay even more.

Assuming that Congress would approve legislation making that change and other modifications of the formula for calculating a student's financial need, President Reagan requested $2.486-billion for Pell Grants, to provide awards of up to $1,750. The Carter budget had recommended that $2.752-billion be appropriated for the program, with a maximum award of $1,800.

For the current fiscal year, the revised Reagan budget would allocate $2.562-billion for Pell Grants. Because Congress has provided only $2.16-billion for the program this year, one O.M.B. official said he expected the Reagan Administration to ask it to appropriate enough to make up the difference.

The Administration also called for an end to the present federal policy of backing loans to students, regardless of their families' income.

To curtail the number of Guaranteed Student Loans going to middle- and upper-income people, the Administration would limit the size of loans to the amount a student needs to cover education costs, after other sources of student aid and family income are taken into account.

The loan-reform plan would reduce federal subsidies even for the neediest students, by ending the federal policy of paying the interest onloans while borrowers are still in college.

To cut costs in the new guaranteed-loan program for parents, President Reagan proposed increasing the interest charged from 9 per cent to market rates.

To further slow the rapid expansion of the guaranteed-loan program, the Administration proposed a drastic change in the Student Loan Marketing Associeation, which provides a secondary market in which banks and other commercial lenders can sell their guaranteed loans.

By buying those loans with money borrowed from the Federal Financing Bank, "Sallie Mae" helps to free private capital for further student loans.

The administration proposed eliminating the association's authority to borrow from the Federal Financing Bank a step that will save the government $1.923-billion in fiscal 1982 alone, according to O.M.B. estimates.

Another source of federal aid to college students would be cut off entirely, under an Administration proposal to eliminate Social Security payments to students.

Budget documents defended that proposal on the grounds that student aid is an "inappropriate and inefficient" use of Social Security funds and that the payments are unrelated to students' financial needs or educational costs.

President Reagan recommended that no new beneficiaries be allowed to enter the program after August, 1981, and that payments of the 800,000 students already receiving benefits be reduced by 25 per cent a year until recipients reach the age of 22.

The plan, which the Administration estimates will save the government $700 million in fiscal 1982 and even more in subsequent years, already has at least one leading Congressional backer. Sen. Lawton Chiles, Democrat of Florida, has said he will introduce an omnibus Social Security reform bill that will include plans for phasing out benefits to students.

The Administration's economic proposals are silent, however, on one student-aid area in which a new initiative had been expected. Tuition tax credits were not included in the Administration's tax-cut package, despite Mr. Reagan's campaign pledge to back such proposals.

In his address to Congress, however, President Reagan indicated that such credits would be among several other tax-reform measures he would pursue in the future.

In other areas of interest to higher education, the Reagan budget asks for a complete overhaul of federal policy in the arts and humanities. Calling for increased emphasis on private, state, and local support for cultural activities, the President recommended a 50-per-cent reduction in funds for the National Endowments for the Arts and Humanities, and the abolition of the Institute of Museum Services.

While the Carter budget aiocated $16.9 million for the museum institute in fiscal 1982, the Reagan Administration recommended that no money be appropriated next year and that the $12 million that Congress has already appropriated for fiscal 1981 be rescinded.

The Reagan budget requests only $85 million for the humanities endowment and $88 million for the arts endowment in fiscal 1982—down from the $151.7 million Congress appropriated for the humanities agency this year and the $159 million provided for the arts agency.

Joseph D. Duffey, chairman of the humanities endowment, said that per cent cut in his agency's budget would be "destructive of the whole thrust and direction of the endowment."

Educational research was another area deemed by the Administration to be a "relatively low priority" under present fiscal constraints.

As a result, President Reagan asked Congress to appropriate only $61 million for the National Institute of Education for fiscal 1982—down from the $84 million requested by the Carter Administration.

In addition, the Administration said, Mr. Reagan will withdraw his predecessor's request for an additional $4.9 million for the institute for fiscal 1981.

The Reagan Administration also proposed a radical restructuring of federal help to elementary and secondary schools, in a plan that also touches several college-aide programs.

Twelve existing grant programs, including aid to states for adult education, would be consolidated into a single program of block grants that would be awarded to local education agencies.

Another block grant for state education agencies would be created to replace 35 separate programs, including teacher-training grants and the Women's Educational Equity program.

The Reagan budget would reduce the postal subsidy provided for nonprofit organizations as part of the Administration's general plan to strike at "obsolete or inherently inefficient federal subsidies." The budget called for cutting payments for the nonprofit subsidy to $500 million in fiscal 1982. The Carter Administration requested $800 million for those payments.

With the Administration's cards now on the table, the House of Representatives' Subcommittee on Postsecondary Education scheduled three days of hearings this week on Mr. Reagan's proposals for student assistance, other college-aid programs, and the arts and humanities.

After hearing testimony from campus spokesmen, government officials, and representatives of college and student groups, the panel will prepare spending recommendations for programs under its jurisdiction.

According to Congressional budget procedures, those recommendations must be submitted to the House Budget Committee by March 15.

The Washington College basketball team won their last game last week against rival JohnsHopkins, 96-80.

Business Major Proposed

by WILLIAM MORTIMER
Assistant Editor

A proposal has been made by the Social Sciences division to the Academic Council to "approve and implement in time for the Fall Semester of 1981" changes within the Economics department and to implement a major in the field of Business Administration at the College.

The proposal, a fifteen-page memorandum, does not come from the Economics department alone. According to Dr. John Taylor, chairman of the Social Science division, "it comes from several members of the division. The departments of Economics, Political Science, History, and Sociology were all involved with the formation of the proposal." The proposal, "a working draft," said Taylor, is now in the hands of the Academic Council. From this working document, which could undergo changes if made by the Council, a proposal may finally be made at the next faculty meeting. If the faculty should approve such changes and additions as proposed, Taylor said that "the Board of Visitors and Governors might have to vote on it, due to such factors as staffing."

"The basic thinking is that a major in Business Administration can be made a working part of a liberal arts education," Taylor said. In the past, there has been a significant demand for such courses from students. "It may have an effect on our enrollment picture here," Taylor said. More high school students could be drawn to the college if it offered such a program, and retention among students already at the college could improve. Fifty three of the 300 students who have been accepted to Washington College as of March 3 "have specifically listed business administration as their major area of academic interest," according to the proposal. It further states that "those students who identified business administration as their major academic interest had a withdrawal rate of 22 percent, for the period 1975-1978."

"Questions of cost will be raised," said Taylor, "but expenditures for staffing and library materials will be compensated for" by increased enrollment for the new major field. While the proposal states that "adding a major in business administration will not solve the college's admissions or budgetary problems" it says that "it is not unreasonable to expect that the adoption of such a program will enable the college to compete more vigorously and more successfully for the 10.9 percent, of the students who are interested in business."

Although the proposal is only in the talking stage—Dean of the College Garry Clarke, chairman of the Academic Council, said that "the Council will discuss the proposal at its meeting of March 23rd,"—members of the Social Science division are hopeful. "The Social Science division approved the idea unanimously," said Taylor. He added that "I support the idea of such a report." Such a proposal has been discussed informally for a long time

Fraternities to be Returned to Hill Dorms

by VIRGINIA KURAPKA
Editor-in-chief

As requested by President of the College Joseph McLain at their last meeting the executive committee of the Board of Visitors and Governors has made a recommendation to McLain about Hill Dorms housing. That recommendation and the administrative decision is that "we have an implied obligation to the fraternities to bring them back," said McLain. "However, it's not for life. It depends on how well they behave."

"Every attempt will be made to take care of other interest groups—same equitable and advantageous fashion," said McLain. Said Dean of Students Maureen Kelly, "I hope everyone will take the decision in good grace. Any time a decision has to be made in essence one group is going to win and one is going to lose." Room draw will be held as usual late in April.

"I hope the fraternities understand this is a kind of special priviledge, and we will be evaluating how well it worked at the end of the year," said Kelly.

Student Center to be Sub-Contracted by College

by VIRGINIA KURAPKA
Editor-in-Chief

Work on the Student Center, planned for the Hodson Hall basement will begin as scheduled in May, with the college doing its own sub-contracting.

Estimates from the Brohawn Construction Company for the work were well over the proposed budget, "I estimate we'll save at least $40,000," said Vice President for Finance Gene Hessey. Bids for all sub-contracted work except for the mechanical system have been received. At its last meeting, the Board of Visitors and Governors approved $34,000 to have a drawing of the mechanical system showing the proposed changes prepared. "From the drawing, the sub-contractor can make an estimate," said Hessey. The bid from Brohawn for the mechanical system was $59,000.

Although the work will have to be coordinated by Ray Crooks, Director of Maintenance, and by Hessey, the school will have the option to do the work itself if a contractor fails to fulfill his obligation, in order to expedite the project. "This is an option we wouldn't have with a general contractor," said Hessey. The use of local contractors rather than those from outside the area will also cut costs.

"It will be a trade-off to some extent," said Hessey, since regular summer projects will have to be coordinated with the Student Center work for the maintenace staff. At present, completion by August seems certain, and sub-contractors contacted, "can clearly get the work done by the fall," said Hessey. "The only problem could be mechanical, if the mechanical system presents some problem."

Budget Approved, Tuition Room and Board Go Up

by VIRGINIA KURAPKA
Editor-in-Chief

In executive session at its meeting February 28, the Board of Visitors and Governors passed the budget for 1981-1982 as submitted by Vice President for Finance Gene Hessey.

The budget allows for a $500 increase in tuition and a $250 increase in room and board, as well as a 6 percent raise in faculty salaries. The main reason for the increase was the rising costs of energy. "It's the same old story but even worse," said Hessey. Tuition costs had in the recent past been held down by subsidy from revenues from previous years. "Unfortunately there's a day of reckoning, and that day is next year," added Hessey.

In a comparison of 1980-1981 costs with 29 other independent colleges with enrollments under 3000, Washington College is among the colleges with the lowest total costs, "even with the increase, our standing isn't altered," said Hessy. Shortly after the increase was announced, Western Maryland College raised its tuition $800. "The comparison is no consolation in a sense," said Hessey, "but our costs compared to other institutions are quite modest."

among faculty members and students. Finally, a sub committee of the Social Science department put together the major proposal. Faculty members who worked on the proposal were Dr. Daniel Premo, Dr. Michael Bailey, Dr. Stephen Cades and Dr. Charles Halstead. Dr. Taylor said that he has been "working in consultation with them."

"We want the student body to know about the proposal," said Taylor. Student input will be channeled through the student members of the Academic Council. Taylor said that the proposal was made "with a pretty good idea of student desire in this area."

Archbishop of Canterbury Asked to Visit

by JEFF ALDERSON
Layout Editor

The Archbishop of Canterbury is scheduled to be on the Eastern Shore of Maryland, April 24 and 25. The purpose of his American visit is to spend a week in Washington with the Anglican community and to visit with the head of the Anglican church in the U.S.

After a trip to Sewanee, Tennessee he will be flying to Easton on April 24. On Saturday April 25 he will speak at 11:30 at a church in Stevensville at a big outdoor service commemorating the church's 350th anniversary.

Since the archbishop's visit occurs between the 200th anniversary of the Episcopal church in Chestertown and Washington College's bicentennial, he has been invited to come to Chestertown.

At the board meeting, February 28, thehonorary degrees committee voted to bestow on him the degree of Doctor of Divinity. President McLain has written to the archbishop in London inviting him to the school to receive this degree.

Washington College has a historic link with the Anglican church. William Smith, the first president of W.C., was very friendly with many Archbishops of Canterbury. Perhaps this visit can continue this tradition.

Seniors Dissatisfied With Speaker

by WENDY MURPHY
News Editor

"It is puzzling why such a fine institution as Washington College is unable to attract desirable speakers for our Commencement. Still, even this would not be cause for such concern if a suitable speaker were invited in place of the Senior's suggestion." Such read the letter submitted to the Honorary Degrees Committee by Duane Marshall and Kathy Waye, Senior representatives on the committee.

The letter was presented to the Board of Visitors and Governors Meeting of February 28 because the Seniors wanted the Administration to know they did not particularly agree with Henry Wallich, a Governor of the Federal Reserve, being chosen to speak at their Commencement. Wallich was invited, by Dr. Joseph McLain, after all those on the list submitted by the graduating class as possible speakers had been invited. At the time Wallich was asked, all had declined except Bill Bradley, a New Jersey Congressman, who had sent no word. A letter in which he declined has since been received.

Kathy Waye said, "We are trying to make better reforms for next year. We didn't get the speaker we wanted, but hopefully we did generate more involvement for next year."

George Dennis, Senior Class President, called a Class meeting of February 26 in order to discuss the matter. A petition and a ballot were drawn up and were available the next day in the Dining Hall and in the Student Affairs Office. The Seniors were to mark choices of those persons they would prefer to not have speak. They also nominated six new possible choices. These include John Barth, an author, Andy Wyeth and Jamie Wyeth, both artists, John Anderson, Congressman, Andrew Young, ex-ambassador to the United Nations, and Millicent Fenwick, a Congresswoman.

Dennis said, "Our purpose was to show the Administration that the Senior Class wanted to be more involved, but the fact that we were given late notice for the Coimmencement hindered us from taking quicker action."

Editorial

Once again, Washington College has reaffirmed its commitment to remain firmly entrenched in the past. The decision to return the fraternities to the Hill Dorms certainly dooms Washington College to the status quo.

As easy as it was to anticipate the decision, so is it easy simply to accept it. The positive interest stirred in the last several months in favor of housing academic interest groups in the Hill Dorms should not be allowed to fade. At least a minority of us are interested in the future of Washington College. It would be easy to write the school off as an anachronism, but it's still our responsibility to strive to improve Washington College, if only to insure that our diplomas continue to mean something.

Academic interest groups, and unfairly, the student writers in particular have been accused of dividing the campus. Such a theory denies reality. The Student Affairs committee proposal would have given students a choice, and would have further unified the student body. How the continued segregation of three all-male groups in the center of the campus contributes to campus unity escapes us.

Those students interested in learning not just in the classroom cannot afford to let this issue die quietly. It should be resurrected, clamorously. If President McLain is willing to make decisions like this one on his own, he must be ready for the students dissatisfied with them to "raise hell."

Letters to the Editor

In Praise of the College

To the Editor,

Recently, Washington College received a note and generous scholarship contribution from a gentleman who, while a successful businessman and civic leader, enrolled in the Washington College graduate program. His brief comments reflect so well on students, faculty, and staff who in some way, and perhaps unknowingly, helped create his positive impressions. I would like to share his message with your readers.

"Dear Sir:

I have enjoyed studying in your graduate program very much. Because everyone on the Campus has been so courteous to me, I would like to make the enclosed contribution to your scholarship fund. Thank you."

So often, we criticize one another for what is or is not done. Students, faculty and others are to be commended for the helpful and friendly way they receive campus visitors. In so doing, they have made not one but many friends for Washington College.

Thank you.

Sincerely,
George E. Hayward

The debate over the hill dorms has been a long one. It is now time for the college community to take a close look at various channels involved in the hill dorms question. These channels brought forth and augmented fraternity and academic interest views on this issue. An open forum was conducted in which both sides were given an ample opportunity to air their opinions. Another channel used in the hill dorms controversy was the Elm. Was the Elm fair and truly representative in dealing with both sides of the issue of hill dorms housing? Certainly the findings of the Student Affairs Committee received a great amount of print. This however is just one point of view. The Alumni Association and student body point of view while just as important or more so, received minimal coverage. Although in the past all articles and editorials were proofread before entry into the Elm, it seems this policy has changed. The first (and only) piece of jounalism that was affected so far was a pro fraternity housing article by Shawn Hutton. Was this a shoddy attempt to discredit someone's opinion? In a straw poll conducted concerning hill dorms housing the student body voted 2 to 1 in favor of fraternity housing in the hill dorms. It is clear an overwhelming majority of students feel the fraternities should be housed in the hill dorms Was this poll a clear indication of the will of the people? Some might argue the Student Affairs Committee is more representative. Just how representative of the Washington College community was the committee? Were the fraternities, a major factor in the debate truly represented? There were no members of Thetas, or Sigs on the committee. Certainly amajor issue like this should be decided by truly representative bodies. It is clear that an overpowering majority of the student body has voiced their opinion. The alumni has also voiced their opinion. Despite the fact both positions on hill dorm housing were more than adequately presented a "demonstration" was held before the Washington Convocation. (sic) It was organized by a small minority of people trying to influence the Board of Visitors and Governors meeting that was held later that day. Obviously by the size of the turnout the student body does not support these people. The method used in trying to influence opinion on hill dorm housing should be closely scrutinized by every member of the college community. Alexis De Tocqueville once said "The moral power of the majority is founded upon yet another principle, which is that the interests of many are to be preferred to those of the few." Let everyone in the college community contemplate this quote in examining each individual's relationship with Washington College and society at large.

respectfully,
Chris Mamunes

Alumni Concern for Fate of Writers' Union

Dear Dean Clarke/Editor of The Elm

I am writing to express my concern over the uncertain future of Richmond House. I understand from Robert Day that there is a strong possibilty the house will be torn down and that no definite plans are currently being formulated to refurbish the existing structure or to provide an alternate building for the Writers Union.

My thoughts and feelings about the function of Richmone House are entirely positive ones. Richmond House provided me with a pleasant, cooperative place to live and work while I was a student at Washington College. But more importantly, Richmond House—its community—rendered to me an intellectual livelinessa and joy which in retrospect seems inseparable from the values Washington College promulgates as a small liberal arts institution.

What I took from my experiences at Richmond House was a understanding of the value of learning for learning's sake. I began to realize that learning is a pleasant way of life that bears no restrictions and needs no rewards. Work has always been the unspoken law at Richmond House, and students there work with no other aim than the getting and sharing of knowledge. Upon living in the house I recognized the guiltless pleasure of reading or writing on a Friday or Saturday night.

Teaching Freshman English here at the University of Massachusetts, where most students are career and business oriented and exhibit little intrinsic enthusiasm for their work, only confirms my feelings about the importance of a community such as Richmond House.

Of course, Washington College also represents and upholds these values. But, on a more practical level, a community such as Richmond House lends itself more readily to their manifestation. Any group of people with common interests and aims needs a place to meet, talk, work, and have fun. Why Ric'mond House works, I think, is due to a concentration of energy which elsewhere seems to naturally disseminate among other less intellectual activities.

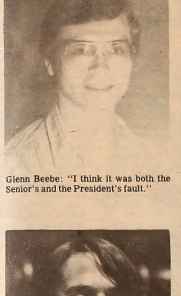
Inundated by attitudes that either ignore the importance of learning, or that claim the importance of vocation over the pure joy of intellectual pursuit, I have found three places of refuge: the Eastern Shore, Washington College, and Richmond House. Perhaps the arts are our greatest refuge, but a quiet house in undoubtedly the most delightful place to share them.

My best to you and the Washington College community.

Sincerely
Kathy Wagner

After the rally for academic housing, rumors were rampant that it had had a negative effect on the proposal before the Board of Visitors and Governors. The reasoning used behind this was that the rally brought back images of the sixties. Well, images were about all of the sixties which came back to Washington college. Yes, there were students at the rally. Yes, they were carrying signs and yes, they were not all dressed in Brooks Brothers three piece suites (sic). The images of the sixties die there. These were not students who wanted to storm and burn Bunting. They were not flag burning, head wearing hippies of days gone by ago. The people at the rally were students and faculty members who value education. These were people who unlike some, feel WC is worth saving. They were willing to make proposals and apply pressure to see that these proposals are viewed fairly. Many of these students have spent four years here (a curiosity around here anymore) under unacademic conditions. They have spent their entire four years at WC working with outdated material and yet, these people, future alumni, were willing to say "We Care"!!

From the Board down to the faculty, the students have heard that they must become involved. Now that they are doing so, we hear that we are dividing the campus by our actions. This my friends is a load of TMI radioactive rat droppings. Washington College has always been divided, is divided and always will be divided. A prime example of this is the seating in the dining hall. We all have our own seating zones and God forbid if anyone sits somewhere (sic) else.



To the Board I say this, rarely have two generations been so close in outlook. In us you will find many of your hopes and dreams. Our signs did not say "Hell No We Won't Go" but "200 MORE YEARS OF LIBERAL ARTS AND SCIENCES." Our hearts, however, do grow cold when we hear fraternities and sororities counting on their finances for members of fellow brothers and sisters on the Board whom they know they can count on for support. The battle may be won by the fraternities but will WC win the war? The school faces severe challenges in the near future and to survive must face these problems. The Hill Dorms have taken on this great importance because to many they represent the first opportunity the college has had to redefine its priorities and prepare for the future. This was the meaning behind Saturday's rally.

Sincerely
Glen E. Beebe.

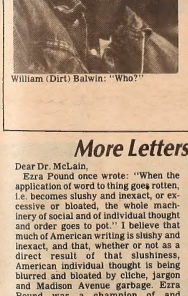
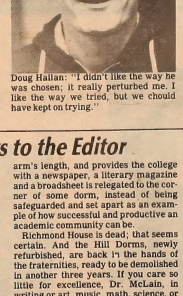
Question asked of seniors: What do you, as a Senior, think about the way in which Henry Wallich was chosen to speak at your commemcement?

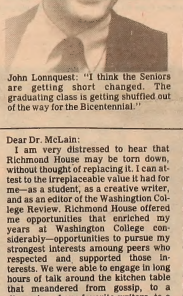
Glenn Beebe: "I think it was both the Senior's and the President's fault."



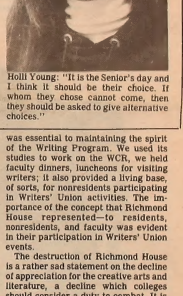
Jim Graham: "I think it's ashame for Dr. McLain because he caught so much heat for it. He tried to do agood job, but he really made a mistake when he didn't aask the Seniors. He could have told them."



Jenny Kerr: "I know nothing about Wallich. I feel Dr. McLain should have gone back to the original oommittee to discuss Commencement. It was all so hastily done."



John (Toby) Townsend: "That's Joe McLain's friend isn't it?



William (Dirt) Balwin: "Who?"

Doug Hallan: "I didn't like the way he was chosen; it really perturbed me. I like the way we tried, but we should have kept on trying."

John Lonnquest: "I think the Seniors are getting short changed. The graduating class is getting shuffled out of the way for the Bicentennial."

Holli Young: "It is the Senior's day and I think it should be their choice. If whom they chose cannot come, then they should be asked to give alternative choices."

More Letters to the Editor

Dear Dr. McLain,

Ezra Pound once wrote: "When the application of word to thing goes rotten, i.e. becomes slushy and inexact, or excessive or bloated, the whole machinery of social and of individual thought and order goes to pot." I believe that much of American writing is slushy and inexact, and that, whether or not as a direct result of that slushiness, American individual thought is being blurred and bloated by cliche, jargon and Madison Avenue garbage. Ezra Pound was a champion of and spokesman for many of the most important writers of the early twentieth century. I wish to follow his example in a much humbler and probably far more selfish way.

Writers need havens. They have needed them since the time when writing was considered an idle man's pastime; they need them now, when the nation's highest elected official considers budget cuts "equitable" when applied to every government department except Defense, and when the Secretary of State can form a sentence as informed and eloquent as "I can't caveat it."

I repeat: writers need havens. They need them sorely now, when the president of an academic institution can so regrettably choose to overlook academic interests in favor of social ones; when the program at Washington College which attracts the most students, brings poets and novelists and journalists of dizzying stature within arm's length, and provides the college with a newspaper, a literary magazine and a broadsheet is relegated to the corner of some dorm, instead of being safeguarded and set apart as an example of how successful and productive an academic community can be.

Richmond House is dead; that seems certain. And the Hill Dorms, newly refurbished, are back in the hands of the fraternities, ready to be demolished in another three years. If you care so little for excellence, Dr. McLain, in writing or art, music, math, science, or drama, and so much for the survival of the very groups which give Washington College its reputation for vioience, drunkenness and irresponsibility, perhaps you should consider making the college a casino, and ending this senseless masquerade.

As a writer, a former resident of Richmond House and a student who cares about Washington College, I urge you to reconsider your decision concerning the inhabitants of the Hill Dorms. Academic special interests, were they placed there, would cost the college far less in yearly repairs, and contribute far more to its scholarly reputation. If the fate of the Hill Dorms is sealed, do consider finding more than a corner of some underpopulated dorm for the Writers' Union. In a small but extremely serious way, the future of American writing—and hence of American thought and order—is in your hands. Give it a chance in a world rapidly going rotten.

Sincerely
Claire E. Mowbray, '80

Dear Dr. McLain:

I am very distressed to hear that Richmond House may be torn down, without thought of replacing it. I can attest to the irreplaceable value it had for me—as a student, as a creative writer, and as an editor of the Washington College Review. Richmond House offered me opportunities that earlieed my years at Washington College considerably—opportunities to pursue my strongest interests among peers who respected and supported those interests. We were able to engage in long hours of talk around the kitchen table that meandered from gossip, to a discussion of our favorite writers, to a discussion of the next possible theme for the WCR. In this way, our studies, our interests, and our personal ambitions gave our lives a unity of vision that dormitory life was bound to destroy. The flow of ideas proved invaluable in forming confidence in my work and an ability to articulate and support my ideas. At Richmond House we were able to join life in the classroom, life in the dormitiory, and life behind the desk into one commonly pursued lifestyle.

The physical base that Richmond House offered for the Writers' Union was essential to maintaining the spirit of the Writing Program. We used its studies to work on the WCR, we held faculty dinners, luncheons for visiting writers; it also provided a living base, of sorts, for nonresidents participating in Writers' Union activities. The importance of the concept that Richmond House represented—to residents, nonresidents, and faculty was evident in their participation in Writers' Union events.

The destruction of Richmond House is a rather sad statement on the decline of appreciation for the creative arts and literature, a decline which colleges should consider a duty to combat. It is important that a liberal arts education offers each student a chance to pursue his own interests; it is by the development of these interests, and of an awareness of these interests that we become more wise, humane, and progressive. For me, the destruction of Richmond House would symbolize the first step in the disintegration of a t.rue liberal arts education.

I do hope you will condiser replacing it, for the sake of the college and what it should represent in its principles, and for the sake of the students who attend.

Sincerely,
Denise Pendleton

Middle Hall Cornerstone Removed, Time Capsule From 1844 Ope

by WENDY MURPHY
News Editor

Tuesday, March 17, became a very important day in the history of Washington College when a time capsule sealed for 137 years in Middle Hall's cornerstone was opened.

The ceremonies began at 4 p.m. on College Hill. George Hayward, Vice President for Development and Public Relations, "set the stage" for the opening of the box and introduced President of the College Joseph H. McLain, who said a few words.

Many eyes were focused on the cornerstone, which was placed approximately seven feet from the ground and bears the inscription

Founded in 1782
Destroyed by Fire in 1827
Rebuilt in 1844

as each speaker shared a part of the Hall's history with the onlookers. The original college building stood where Middle Hall now does. The building was burned beyond repair in 1827, and, after much deliberation and the resignation of a few Board members, it was decided by one vote to rebuild on College Hill.

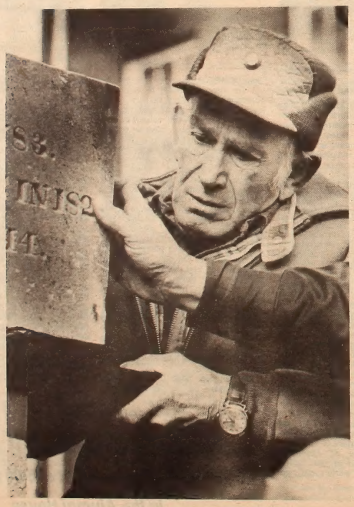
At 4:10, a few workers, who are helping with the renovation of Middle Hall, removed the cornerstone from its position. Two men then worked with hammers and chisels to remove the marble slab which sealed the cornerstone. Dust from the renovation began to fill the windy air, as the crowd's anticipation grew. The time capsule, a zinc box, was revealed at last.

At 4:15, Phillip Wingate, Vice Chairman of the Board of Visiotrs and Governors for Washington College, stepped up to the microphone and said," You have all been really patient, but you all you can really see are the eight coins that are still in good shape. Whatever was printed is now kind of a brown dust." The printed material was presumed to be a newspaper. A look of disappointment could be found on many faces.

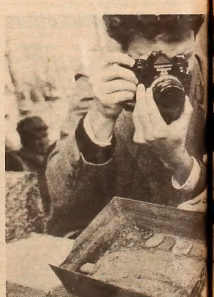
The true contents of the box and a description of the laying of the cornerstone on May 4, 1844, were compiled by the Kent News:

> On May 4, 1844, a large assemblage of people convened and moved in procession from the Court House to College Hill.
>
> On arriving at the Hill the Visiotrs, faculty and clergy occupied the platform erected for the purpose. Various articles, the names of the Visiotrs and Governors, the faculty, sundry newspapers of the day, and a specimen of the several kinds of nationai coin were placed in a neat zinc box, which was placed in the cornerstone and covered by a marble slab which protects it. The cornerstone was then laid with impressive ceremonies.

The entire story of the building of Middle Hall is contained in the book Washington College by Fred W. Dumschott, Vice President emeritus, and graduate of the class of 1927.



The box was then taken to the nearby Hynson Lounge in Hodson Hall where the contents were placed on a temporary display and a reception was held. The contents of the time capsule will soon go on display in the Clifton Miller Memorial Library.



Even though the paper materials in the box were unrecognizable, the eight coins seemed to be "the full spectrum of coins coins struck by the United States Mint during 1843 and 1844, the datesof the coins," stated Scott Vogel, a sales representative for the Delmarva Silver Exchange. McLain and Florestano Sign Agreement

Direct Transfer Established With AACC

Anne Arundel Community College News Release

A Direct Transfer Agreement between Washington College in Chestertown and Anne Arundel Community College was formally established recently by the institutions' presidents.

Under this agreement, which was signed at ceremonies hosted by Anne Arundel Community College and attended by officials from both institutions, persons graduating from the Community College with an Associate in Arts Degree will be eligible to be accepted as full-time, upper class students at Washington College. In addition, Washington College will guarantee housing for direct transfer students from AACC.

"This marks the first time that Anne Arundel Community College has signed such an agreement with a private college," noted AACC President Thomas E. Florestano. "We feel very good about formalizing our relationship with this fine institution."

Dr. Joseph H. McLain, Washington College's President, echoed Dr. Florestano's remarks. "We look forward to a good working relationship with Anne Arundel because, in my opinion, it is one of the few community colleges whose students with an interest in attending Washington College are adequately prepared for our liberal arts philosophy."

Joining the two Presidents at the ceremony were Larry Leonard and Barbara Cromwell, members of Washington College's Board of Trustees, and A. M. DiMaggio, Washington College's Director of Admissions. Also in attendance were Joan Willard, member of AACC's Board of Trustees, AACC Deans James Atwell, John Palmer, J. Melvin Britt, Sally Buxton, Philip Clark and Edmund Rozecki, Doris Bryson, AACC; s Coordinator of Transfer Planning, Herbert Curkin, AACC'a Director of Admissions, and Ronald Leatherbarrow, Chairperson of AACC's English Division.

Washington College is a four-year liberal arts institution that was formed in 1782.

Other highlights of this agreement are that eligible students will be accepted in all majors offered by Washington College leading to a baccalaureate degree, courses completed at AACC will be acceptedup to a maximum of 64 credit hours, and credit courses that AACC students take that do not fulfill general distribution or major requirements will be accepted by Washington College as general electives.

Currently, Washington College has a Direct Transfer Agreement with Wesley Community College in Delaware. According to its Director of Admissions, A.M. DiMaggio, "We hope one day to establish similar agreements with the other community colleges in Maryland."

Forum Lectures Planned for March

NEWS BUREAU

The Lecture Series of Washington College, with support of the Robert Julian Emory Memorial Fund, will sponsor two lectures later this month. On Wednesday, March 25, Lawrence Stone, the Dodge Professor of History at Princeton University, will give a talk entitled "The Origin of the Modern Family in Eighteenth Century England." Professor Stone's lecture will be held at 8 p.m. in the Sophie Kerr Room of Miller Library on the College campus. On Monday, March 30, Elizabeth Greenwell Grossman will lecture on "victorian Architecture—Images of Domesticity," also at 8 p.m. in the Sophie Kerr Room.

His acclaimed scholarly works include The Causes of the English Revolution 1592-1642, described by one reviewer as displaying "much of Lawrence Stone's finest intellectual qualities: his enormous fertility and-facility of mind, his tremendous assimilative powers, his gifts of eclectis syntheses, his enviable command over the language in which his thoughts are expressed." Another work, Family, Sex and Marriage in England, 1500-1800, has been praised as "vast in theme, exhaustive in research... a vertible War and Peaceof social history."

Dr. Grossmanis is on the staff of the department of art history at the Rhode Island School of Design. A graduate of Duke University, she received the doctorate in art history from Brown. She was awarded a fellowship in Residence by the National Endowment for the Humanities for her research on American Beaux Arts and Progressive Architecture, 1880-1940.

French Assistant Here From Paris

by JEFF ALDERSON
Layout Editor

Mireille Galan, this year's French assistant at Washington College, is from a suburb of Paris. She said that she did not really plan to come to the United States, "It just happened! Last year's assistant was from my university. Dr. Dickson (Assistant Professor of French) was pleased with her and wrote to my university for an assistant for this year. My professor asked if anyone was interested and in this position and I was the only one."

Mireille is studying to be an English major. She hopes to eventually work in tourism so that she can travel. This summer she will travel to the Caribbean. Tourism, she hopes, will allow her to use German, Italian, and English, her three "second languages".

The university life in France is much different than campus life in the United States. "The students don't socialize in Paris," said Mireille. "There, the students have a room in town. I only got to see my friends in class. Relationships are very superficial."

In Paris students usually have ten or twelve subjects a year. "This year I only had to take three so I could afford to miss classes," said Mireille. "I have to take the exams for these classes, though." Her courses include Italian, English History and Religion, and French Canadian Literature.

While at Washington College Mireille is taking Anthropology, Introduction to Film, and German. Learning German through English was a bit difficult for her at first. "It's good for my English," she said. "I make a relationship between German and English rather than German and French."

Mireille lives alone when in Paris. "I'm twenty two and want to be independent," she said. Her father is a physical education teacher and her mother works in a bank. She has one brother.

Some of Mireille's hobbies include piano, tap dancing, and swimming. She enjoys classical and popular music, including Supertramp, Pink Floyd, and some New Wave music. "Being from the south I also enjoy the sun," she added.

"This country is much more relaxed than France," Mireille commented. "The people are more friendly. Here you can wear anything you want. You don't have to be so careful about your appearance."

"I miss my friends," she said. "I don't miss France as much as I did but I'll be glad to be home." When she returns to France, she said, "I will remember the campus life the most."

Moral Majority Vice President Speaks

by BOB STRONG

Cal Thomas, Vice President for communications of Moral Majority, Inc., discussed "The Real Intent of the Moral Majority" last night at Washington College. The talk was the second in a two-part series sponsored by the William James Forum.

"We are labeled extreme right because we oppose extreme wrong," Thomas explained in order to justify the Moral Majority's conservative platform. Thomas said the Rev. Jerry Falwell's organization is a reaction to the moral decay in this country. The challenge of the abortion issue, pornography and drugs, to name a few, require a concerted effort by those who oppose the further erosion of traditional American values.

Insisting that the MM not be considered a political party, Thomas outlined the key objectives: pro-traditional family— against homosexual and natural law marriages; to oppose the trafficking of drugs; anti-pornography, "the ultimate exploitation of men and women; support of Israel and Jewish rights throughout the world; the support of a strong military government; profeminist rights, but not of ERA; encouragement of state rights; cleaning up the poor quality of television; and, of primary interest, the passage of a human life bill which would outlaw abortion.

The strategy is to reverse the moral decline by educating Americans on moral issues. According to Thomas, apathy is an infection which can only be combatted through a massive educational program, a program obtainable through the press, radio commentary, and regional seminars. The apparent anomaly of the MM's support of an unliabortionist position while advocating capital punishment sparked some apprehension. Thomas explained that the child in the womb is innocent and therefore should be protected while the convicted criminal is just the opposite; he has proven himself unfit to live in society.

Thomas adamantly denied accusations that MM employs hit-list political tactics. The Moral Majority, he explained, supports "principles and causes", not individual candidates. The integrity of the organization must not depend upon any candidate's election. Should specific candidates lose the MM's principles and causes would remain viable.

The voting record, according to Thomas, is the means to evaluate political candidates. The strategy is to make a representative's political decisions avilable. With this record of performance the voter, apparently, will make an enlightened decision.

In order to oppose the "outrageous smut" viewed on American television, the MM plans to have its members boycott the products of sponsors who use these programs to peddle their wares.

Homosexuality, in Falwell's opinion, is moral perversion, a self-chosen lifestyle—not a legitimate reason. for altering the traditional family concept. Like limited sex education in schools, homosexuality is to be tolerated, not encouraged with moral approval.

Among the numerous questions asked was: why no abortion for rape victims? Thomas answered that society must be "ordered upon right". The fetus' victimization would be an outrageous wrong and, therefore, could not be tolerated.

Another question: if society is to be ordered upon right why is not the MM against the consumption of alcohol, a drug which has clearly proven its damaging effects? The answer that that is something altogether different and a matter of individual conscience was received negatively by the audience.

Thomas later admitted losing considerable impetus with this contradiction. This question forced the speaker to backtrack and add a condition to what was orIginally an absolute . Now the patched argument reads: society must be ordered upon right ONLY IF that right is praticably obtainable. The consumption of alcohol, clearly antithetical to the original form of the argument, must be tolerated. Prohibition proved it.

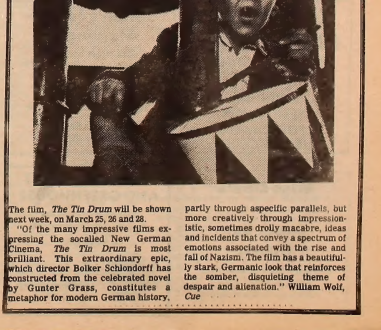
Thomas repeated several times that we live in a fallen world. However, according to Dr. Puckett, in his address "The Real Threat of the Moral Majority" last September, Falwell is thriving quite nicely in this environment. Cal Thomas claims the MM has a budget of four million dollars a year, Puckett's estimate was one million a week. The collection plate was not passed Thursday night.

Both figures seem hyperbolic, but Puckett's point is well taken. The mixing of religion and politics has become big business. According to a recent issue of Newsweek Jerry Falwell's order to a Richmond direct-mail firm for the printing, labeling and mailing of 130,000 newsletters to be sent within. two days was an unprecedented request. But the order was met.

When you mix religion and politics you are bound to get controversy. The audience in the Hynson Lounge last night was courteous but certainly sceptical. Regardless of tax status or official designation Falwell's organization depends upon religious fervor for its political clout. Unquestionable, modern society tends toward cyclical extremes; we may now be drifting away from an era of personal and political liberation. But are we ready to put on the hair shirt of the Moral Majority, Inc?

American String Quartet to Perform

by BEDFORD GROVES
Coordinator of Campus Activities



Washington College Concert Series will present the American String Quartet at 8:30 p.m. Saturday, March 21, in Gibson Fine Arts Center.

One of the prominent emerging young string ensembles, the Quartet was named Resident Quartet at the Peabody Conservatory last fall, and for five years was Quartet-inResidence at the Mannes College of Music in New York.

The members are violinists Mitchell Stern and Laurie Carney, violist Daniel Aushalomov, and cellist David Geber.

They have completed a tour this season in Italy, the Netherlands and Germany, which included debut appearances in Florence and Milan, at the Concertgebouw in Amsterdam and on Hilversum Radio, and at the Beethovenhalle in Bonn. In North America they have a sold-out tour in forty cities with debuts in Los Angeles and Cleveland, and third annual return engagements in Philadelphia, Chicago and Miami.

The program will include Mozart's Quartet in G Major, K. 387; Bartok's Quartet No. 6; and Brahms' Quartet in A minor, Opus 51, No. 2.

The film, The Tin Drum will be shown next week, on March 25, 26 and 28.

"Of the many impressive films expressing the socalled New German Cinema, The Tin Drum is most brilliant. This extraordinary epic, which director Bolker Schlondorff has constructed from the celebrated novel by Gunter Grass, constitutes a metaphor for modern German history, partly through aspecific parallels, but more creatively through impressionistic, sometimes drolly macabre, ideas and incidents that convey a spectrum of emotions associated with the rise and fall of Nazism. The film has a beautifully stark, Germanic look that reinforces the somber, disquieting theme of despair and alienation." William Wolf, Cue

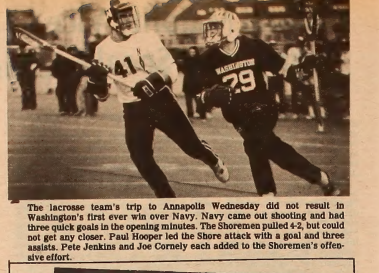
Cagers Wrap Up Disappointing Conference Season

by HARRY MCENROE
Sports Editor

Following a homecourt 96-80 trouncing of Johns Hopkins, the Washington College basketball team finished its season with a 14-11 record. Despite a dismal 3-7 league slate, this must be considered one of the best years in recent Shore cager annals.

After capturing the fourth Wild Goose Classic in as many years, the Shoremen completed the first semester portion of their schedule with a 6-4 record. Along with this home tourney, the cagers participated in two others early in the season, winning the Susquehanna University Tournament, and splitting two contests at North Carolina Wesleyan.

Division I American University, featuring the thenleading scoreer in the nation, Russell "Bo" Bowers, defeated the cagers in their first game after the holidays, but the Shoremen quickly returned to their winning ways as they crushed three straight opponents, including conference foe Johns Hopkins, 74-54 in Baltimore. Following these victories, however, close home conference losses to Ursinus and Swarthmore, by a total of seven points, proved disastrous to the squad's playoff hopes.



The squad quickly regained form following this pair of setbacks, and swept to four straight vicotries, bringing their record to an impressive 13-7. Three of these wins were on the road, including an overtime vicory at Haverford. At this crucial juncture the cagers faced five more games, all against MAC conference rival, losses, three decided in the final seconds, made what could have been an outstanding season into only a respectable one.

Swarthmore defeated the Shore cagers 83-77 in Pennsylvania by practically the same score of their previous matchup at Cain Gym. A home, 70-68 loss to Haverford, a team they had edged on the road, extinguished any Shore playoff hopes. In their next contest, Ursinus, the eventual MAC conference champion and NCAA semifinalist, crushed the Shoremen, 104-68. Before the final victory over Hopkins, the cagers battled Widener at home in a typically close conference contest with what became a familiar outcome this season—a 72-71 narrow defeat.

Despite an untimely late-season slump, the basketball team managed to compile a fine record. In their games out of the conference the Shore cagers enjoyed a fine 11-4 slate, including two tournament championships. The Shoremen exhibited balanced scoring throughout the year, as four starters averaged in double figures. David Blackwell, a first-team all-conference selection, led the team with a 14-point average along with ann impressive five steals per game. Captain Joe Moye, honorable mention all-MAC, led the squad in rebounding and field goal percentage while scoring 13 points per game. Senior guard Craig Langwost tallied 12 points a game and led the cagers in foul shooting percentage.

Tom Keefe, the lone freshman starter, added 10 points a game. Additional scoring came from forwards Carl Fornoff and Jim Corey at seven points a game, and freshman Wayne Spurrier, who scored five a game.

The outlook for next season appears optimistic, as the entire team returns, with the exception of Craig Langwost. However, the void left by the departure of Langwost, a three-year starter, may prove difficult to fill. But with a year's experience of playing together under their belts, the young Shoremen can be hopeful for an even more successful season next year.

The lacrosse team's trip to Annapolis Wednesday did not result in Washington's first ever win over Navy. Navy came out shooting and had three quick goals in the opening minutes. The Shoremen pulled 4-2, but could not get any closer. Paul Hooper led the Shore attack with a goal and three assists. Pete Jenkins and Joe Cornely each added to the Shoremen's offensive effort.

Sabbaticals, Leaves Granted to Faculty Members

by VIRGINIA KURAPKA
Editor-in-chief

Two sabbaticals have been awarded for next year, a National Endowment for the Humanities fellowship has been received by Dr. J. David Newell, and Dr. Michael Goldstein has been granted leave for a second year.

Dr. Richard Gillin, associate professor of English, will be away from the college in the spring semester. As of now, however, his plans are still uncertain. "It'll really depend on finances," he said. "That's why it's all very vague." He had originally planned to go to Oxford University in England to study 18th century literature and art, and may still do so.

Among other possibilities is the chance to study 20th century Japanese literature in Japan. "My wife and I took Japanese lessons about eight years ago, and were invited to go then, but we came to Washington College instead." He has also applied for a NEH fellowship to take part in a seminar at Princeton University on 18th literature. "Out of that may come some direction," he said. "The college and the department have been very cooperative in allowing me to choose what I want to do." No matter where he eventually studies, Gillin is looking forward to "developing new courses, or at least revitalizing existing courses."

Dr. George Shivers, associate professor of Spanish, has also been granted sabbatical for the spring semesfer. Shivers had been granted sabbatical last year, but declined when both professors granted leave were found to be from the Modern Languages department. His plans are also uncertain at the moment. "The original plan was to study linguistics at Georgetown University," he said. Financial considerations had also led him to seek grant money for the study. "I may do something entirely different, such as go to Spain or Latin America and pursue some other research projects I have in mind."

Dr. Michael Goldstein, associate professor of Psychology, requested a continuation of his leave without compensation for a second year. He will be continuing his training in clinical neuropsychology, behavioral medicine and therapy at the Mendota Hospital in Madison, Wisconsin. A temporary appointment will be made to replace him.

Dr. J. David Newell, associate professor of Philosophy, has received a NEH fellowship to participate in a seminar at Indiana University. Nine other recipients from around the country will study under the direction of Professor David Smith for the 1981-82 academic year. The group will divide its time between the study of Bioethics ethical issues in medicine. "Bioethics concerns the problem of informed consent for an operation,is it morally acceptable to use children in research which may affect them permanently, and other questions."

Dr. Newell had originally been chosen to receive a sabbatical. "When I got the word I'd received the fellowship, I had to choose between a half year in England with the sabbatical or a full year in Indiana." Newell would have been doing the same general study in England, but on a more unstructured basis.

Faculty Selects Senior Awards

by WENDY MURPHY
News Editor

The nominations Committee was given the task, several years ago, of deciding the Senior winners for the George Washington Medal, the Clark-Porter Medal, and the Catlin Medal.

The committee members include John B. Taylor, Assistant Professor of Political Science, Chairman; Frank J. Creegan, Professor of Chemistry; and Susan Tessem, Assistant Professor of Art.

Even though the final decision is made by the Nominations Committee, the process begins with the entire faculty. Each faculty member is asked to submit his/her nomination(s) for the awards. For the Clark-Porter Medal, however, the Senior Class is asked for a list of nominees.

The committee then screens these lists and compiles a final list of nominees, selecting only those names which were submitted by at least two people. Selected faculty members are asked to give comparative judgments of these students on the basis of class rank, grade point average, school involvement, and character.

The entire faculty will meet with the Nominations Committee on April 2 to discuss the final decisions. The faculty will either vote to accept the award winners chosen by the committee or nominate other Seniors. The only restriction on these nominations is that any name recommended has to be that of someone who had been previously nominated.

Writing Component to Affect Freshmen

by BILL MORTIMER
Assistant Editor

With the passage by the faculty of the Academic Council's proposed curricular changes, the college must now decide how the changes should be made effective.

The major change on which Dean of the College Garry Clarke is working is the addition of courses with a writing requirement. Clarke said "a memo from my office to the faculty has been sent out asking for faculty members who would be interested in teaching a course with the writing requirement." Courses which will be affected by such a requirement will be on the freshman level.

Responses to the memo must be in by March 30. From there, a committee will be formed which will then work on the details. Decisions will have to be made on what classes will specifically be affected by the requirement. The requirement was proposed by the Academic Council "to give all Washington College students the opportunity to improve their writing skills." It can be satisfied in several ways.

Although Clarke said that he has "no idea on what the response from the faculty would be" he has already had three of the faculty members on the Academic Council express a willingness to take part. One response was from the faculty is in, the forms will be taken and the committee will "see how things fall together and work from there," Clarke said.

The courses, which are only for freshmen, will be added later on in the year. "We will hopefully get it done by the end the school year," said Clarke. The English department will not be the only department to be affected by the change in requirements. Although not all disciplines could support the writing component, Clarke said "we are hopeful to have a core of courses where it will be effective."

Students already at the college will not be affected by changes made in distribution and writing requirements.

Recently, the faculty passed the Academic Council's proposal which included a requirement for students to take at least two semesters of a course with a writing component during their freshman or sophomore year. This requirement can be filled in any Forms of Literature and Composition course, Forms of World Literature course, or by two of any course marked with an asterisk.

In addition, students beginning with the class of 1985 will have to fulfill requirements in all four distribution areas, rather than three. The proposal to make Natural Science required for graduation from the college came "from the Academic Council, the SAB and the faculty," said Clarke. The decision whether or not a student should be made to study one of the sciences while at college "was debated, but it did pass," Clarke said.

"It is essentially the same distribution," said Clarke. "In the past it was possible for a student to get out of the three catagories (Formal Studies, Humanities, Social Sciences, and Natural Sciences)." Now, students will be exposed to all foru areas. "This is essentially where the changes take place," said Clarke.

Both the writing and the science requirements were "intended to help the students," said Clarke. He added that "students are asked to write a great deal at college. If writing problems are addressed, there should be a change for the better." Although it was thought that requiring a natural science would adversely affect admissions, there is not a firm basis for such an assumption. "It was intended to be a positive step," said Clarke, "I would hope that that would be the case."

Currently, finite plans for the requirements have not been made. Clarke said that "as the spring goes on, quite a number of things will take place. We will be making up the guidelines; things will fall into place."

SGA Luau Cancelled

by TOM TWOMEY

At its last meeting, on March 16, the SGA voted unanimously to cancel the Luau due to lack of funds. It was the feeling of the executive board, and later the SGA in general, that the approximate $3000 price tag was too high given the present state of the SGA budget.

This $3000 would have included the cost for the Food Service, the Steel Band and wide range of incidentals, such as decorations. According to SGA president Jay Young, "We were disappointed to find that the budget just won't accomodate the $3000-$500 that would be necessary to give the Luau." With the scheduling of other events, such as the Crack the Sky concert, the SGA felt that the Luau would leave the budget with so little money that the possibility of going in the red is substantially increased.

According to Food Service Director Dave Knowles, the cost for the Luau to the SGA would be approximately $2000. This figure comes after crediting $1.50 for each boarding student who attends the Luau the total. Knowles cited approximately $2300 in food costs alone, of which $900 would go toward 5 large pigs, in addition to $270 for labor as reasons for the final cost. After crediting the SGA the 1.50 per student who attends, Knowles projected a final bill of $1914. Also, Knowles pointed out that the SGA would not have to payfor any food that isn't used.

Although it has been suggested that perhaps a cutback in the meny would put the cost within the range of the budget, Knowles disagrees. "First of all, if the Food Service is involved in an event, it's going to be done right. After all, it's important to realize that a lot of people look forward to the Luau and expect a good job. Also, it's important to realize that the cost per meal is less than five dollars. With the price of food these days, this is not a bad deal." Another suggestion to increase the feasibility of the Luau would be to charge parents, since the Luau was originally scheduled for Parents' weekend faculty, staff, and other non-boarding guests. According to one administrator, "I feel the Luau was the most successful social event last year, as far as the students, faculty and administration were concerned. I don't think they would mind paying. Last year, everyone got in free, even prefreshmen."

President Jay Young feels that much of the projected food cost could be eliminated by scaling down the menu. "Since it is an SGA function, it should be up to the SGA to decide on what will be included. We should be allowed to decide on what we can and cannot afford. It's hard to understand why this costs so much more than a regular meal."

Dean of Students Maureen Kelly, commenting on the idea of charging everyone except boarding students, noted, "If you charge parents, faculty, etc., I'm not sure how many people would attend. The SGA could potentially end up with a large bill when the whole thing is over." In conclusion, Kelly said, "Basically, it's a very nice event which costs a lot of money. Unfortunately nobody has the extra money to spend this year."

Editorial

El Salvador's a long way from Chestertown, not only geographically, but also in the less tangible measures of culture, language, and economic development. Vietnam was a long way from Chestertown, too, even farther.

We've been told El Salvador won't turn into President Reagan's Vietnam, because it's different, and presumably, because Reagan has learned from the mistakes of Vietnam. But the uniqueness of El Salvador to Washington, D.C. might be encouraging Reagan to make another, maybe even more disastrous, mistake. The situation in El Salvador is comparable today to the situation in Vietnam twenty years ago. The major difference is that the temptation for the U.S. to interfere in El Salvador now is perhaps even greater than it was to interfere in Vietnam then.

Like Vietnam, El Salvador is economically undeveloped. El Salvador is also in a group of small coutries subject to contagion. One of the reasons socialism, communism, and tyrannies work so well in these countries is, as we've all learned in Poli Sci, that their overriding goal is economic and industrial advancement. Conversely, this is one of the reasons that American-style representative government tends to work less well there. Sounds strangely familiar. Why should the U.S. feel threatened by a country or countries with goals similar to our own, even though its means of achieving them are, necessarily, different. Perhaps the very simplicity of this argument has kept it from being considered as seriously as it ought to be.

What does all this have to do with us? We're the ones who go if the Green Berets sent there as military advisors need reinforcements. And Chestertown will suddenly not be so far away.

Letters to the Editor

To the Editor:

On this campus, academics are a joke to too many students. Yet, for some unknown reason, this school continues to carry a good reputation elsewhere in the universe. One of these situations has to change soon. It is time for a $20,000 Washington College diploma to equal $20,000 worth of education. Not $20,000 worth of lacrosse games, dollar drunks, and broken windows, but $20,000 worth of intellectual, technical, artistic, and philosophical growth in each student here. It is time for this school to get serious about itself and its diploma as it produces on the international marketplace. It is time for this school to get serious about itself as an educational producer. It is time to get serious at this college, from the freshman class to the upper echelons of the administration, to get serious about the process of education. Anyone who refuses to be serious about this process should not be allowed to continue as a part of Washington College. I suggest that the decision on the Hill Dorms is an indication of the lack of serious concern for the process of education in the President's office.

Dr. McLain's rejection of the Open Bid proposal for the Hill Dorms is an abomination. This college, under the direction of its President, has passed over an opportunity to begin correcting the lopsided priority of social interests over academic interests that is prevalent among a majority of students here.

Dr. McLain seems to think that advocates of the Open Bid proposal want to remove academic groups from the mainstream of the campus. In this he is exactly wrong. Advocates of this proposal are trying, almost desparately, to put these groups in the center of campus life. As I understand it, Dr. McLain has argued that the effect of housing academic groups in the Hill Dorms would be to segregate academically brighter students from the rest of the student body. In his opinion, apparently, it is healthier for this school to segregate against women, and also against men who don't happen to be Sigs, Lambdas, or KA's. Dr. McLain is wrong not so much in favoring social groups over academic groups, but in favoring elitist male social groups over all groups on campus.

He is wrong in denying an Open Bid proposal for the use of the 140 year old Hill Dorms in favor of a 20 year old tradition of fraternity occupancy of the Hill Dorms. The "implied guarantee" is a farce. Fraternities, as organized groups representing the social aspect of college, belong on this campus. Academic groups belong at the heart of this campus. Unlike Dr. McLain, I will not abandon that truth in favor of an "implied obligation". And unlike Chris Mamunes, in his letter of last week, I will not abandon my good judgment to a public opinion poll. Academic groups belong at the heart of this campus.

Dr. McLain is wrong in arguing that the fraternities deserve their Hill Dorms while ignoring the fact that if they can simply prove that they deserve those dorms, they will get them under the Open Bid proposal. If the fraternities deserve these buildings, as Dr. McLain so adamantly believes, why did they fight the Open Bid proposal? What were they afraid of?

I suggest that the fraternities were simply afraid of losing the chance to occupy buildings that they perceive as being rightfully theirs, through some form of squatters' rights, to other groups who might repeat might—have proved themselves more deserving of the best dorms on campus.

I suggest that Dr. McLain is guilty of something more threatening, something so dangerous that he dares not mention the word, lest it sneak up on him whilst he speaks. I suggest that Dr. McLain is afraid of change. In my opinion, this college should be more frightened of a President afraid of change, than of any possible changes that any number of proposals of any description could ever hope to bring about.

Change is an inevitable component of progress. In the times we live in, a small college has to constantly progress, has to continually strive for excellence in every way possible, in order to survive. Washington College can not afford to continue its static, almost academic mediocrity. Nor can this downward movement simply be arrested, it must be reversed. If Washington College is to remain competitive in the marketplace, and valuable to its students and alumni, it must progress. It must change for the better.

The Open Bid proposal would be simple, effective, and obvious way of reversing this school's downward spiral towards mediocrity. The rejection of this proposal indicates to me that Dr. McLain is not sincerely interested in reversing this spiral. I suggest that the decision on the Hill Dorms is an indication of Dr. McLain's lack of serious concern for the process of education. I suggest that Dr. McLain is stunting the potential for excellence at Washington College.

Sincerely,
Larry Stahl

Dear Editor,

I am writing this letter to enlighten those of you who feel that the fraternities do not deserve to live in the Hill Dorms next year. This letter is in direct reply to three articles published in last week's Elm.

First of all, I would like to reply to the editorial. Yes, Ms. Kurapka, it is true that a minority of us are interested in saving the future of Washington College. At this point, I will take the time to mention of few of these people. Jay Young has worked extremely hard to get a student center, among other ideas, implemented into the college. Geoff Garinther, president of the Student Academic Board, is presently preparing a report on the academic life of the campus. Dave Pointon was recently successful in gaining an increase of funding to the SAB, to provide better activities for all students. The entire Lambda Pi Delta fraternity distributed donation cards for Easter Seals at various locations in town. The Theta Chi fraternity worked for a dance at the Catholic Church downtown. Also, three members of the Academic Council are members of fraternities, in addition to a majority of the SAB. I'm sorry, but I don't see the writers actively attempting to improve overall life on this campus. True the writers are an important part of Washington College, but if you look around, you find that fraternity members are doing more to improve campus life for everyone.

In response to Mr. Beebe's letter, I ask him to consider my comments above. The school does face severe challenges and the people rising to meet these challenges are the fraternities.

Dear Editor,

I am writing in regards to the final decision on the Hill Dorms issue. It was a heavy blow to the Academic Special Interest Housing Planners, but one thing stands out in the issue which may have been overlooked. That is the majority rule factor which many of us espouse, and the college's guiding spirit—large segregated groups—fought for. Remember, he pledged his life, fortune, and sacred honor to the struggle for freedom. Well, a fair poll which illustrated majority support for a Fraternity return to the hill. Now, ½ of the students including myself voted for the Hill Dorms as an open area, keeping the Hill Dorms as an open area. I am for freedom of choice and expression. My vote was not cast as a dagger aimed at the fraternity system's back, but rather a ballot open, careful consideration of all the options. Only when all options are carefully weighed can the best choice be made. Open was the key word on the poll ballot. Closing off something only causes somebody a great deal of grief, it is a bad move. In a liberal arts college environment, free choice is a must. This is not a concentration camp nor is it a slum. It is an institution of learning. To learn, one must think, choose, grow, and hunger. Yes, hunger not for food for the stomach, but rather food for the mind. Academic housing and fraternity housing should be encouraged, enjoyed, established, and chosen freely.

We need academic interest to fan the flames of a burning desire to learn. If academic interest dorm facilities will encourage this, we have a duty to create and maintain them. Greek societies, that want to play a role in involving students in academically oriented activities outside the classroom, should be cheered and supported by all students. Groups of Greek and fraternity members that want to encourage a fervent, as opposed to a chilly, atmosphere for learning should work together. For things to mark in a small school, students must be united in their concerns. This way, we can send a strong message of all our dreams and fear among this place to the college administrators. It's time to say "we are all concerned and want a Great Washington College!"

Fraternities should be allowed to grow and change just like people grow and change. They should have a second chance, if they get into trouble. Not all fraternities are bad and certainly not everyone in every fraternity is bad. They provide social life that no other groups provide. Attendence(sic) is left up to the individual, no one makes a person go to gun point to a frat party. They are good hosts, and their parties

by CHRISTY HOLT

On April 10, 11, and 12, the Washington College Continuing Education Program and the Maryland Arts Council in conjunction with the Kent County Arts Council will be holding a "Writers Weekend." Bicentennial Contest Won

by WENDY MURPHY
News Editor

The Bicentennial T-Shirt Contest has been won by Nick Nappo and Jeanne Merrick, who both submitted their ideas for Bicentennial themes.

Nappo's winning phrase is "We've had class for 200 years." Merrick's winning drawing is a bust of George Washington wth "1782" and "1982" on either side. Both entries will be printed on T-shirts by an Ocean City business. Each winner receives $50.

The winners were chosen by a committee of the SGA Executive Committee, Dr. Peter Tapke, Professor of Philosophy, and Kathy Myrick DeProspo, Director of Public Relations.

The group received several entries from just ten people. Dave Pointon, chairman of the committee, said, "Most of the people entered more than one idea. We had a tough time deciding since they were all so good."

It is hoped that the T-shirts will go on sale before the end of this semester.

French Class to Present Sartre's Huis Clos

NEWS BUREAU

The Advanced French Conversation class at Washington College, under the direction of Professor Christine Pabon, will present Jean Paul Sartre's *Huis clos*on Thursday, April 2 at 8:30 p.m. in William Smith auditorium on the College campus. The play, which will be presented entirely in French, is open to the public free of charge. French-speaking students and community members are invited to attend.

Directed by Brian di Palma and starring Sissy Spacek, John Travolta and Piper Laurie. This spellbinding and terrifying film is the story of Carrie, a shy wallflower who gets asked to the senior prom by the most attractive boy at her high school. The plot thickens, however, because her religious-fanatic mother doesn't want her to go and some other students intend to play a cruel practical joke if she does go. Carrie, however, is not entirely helpless. She possesses the power to move objects through space using only her will (psychokinesis), and this leads to a horrifying and awesome climax. Many critics consider this the best horror film ever made. At the very least it is a stylish homage to Hitchcock and it has an ending you will remember for the rest of your life.

Women's Lacrosse Sticks To It

by JEFF ALDERSON
Layout Editor

The women's lacrosse update begins its second season with a home game Thursday April 2 at 4:00 against Notre Dame. This is their only home game and begins their first year of actual competition. Last year they only had one scrimmage.

The club is directed by Nancy Dick and Jody Dudderar. The club president, or team captain is Jessica Fowler.

This year's starting line-up consists of experienced girls who were either here last year or played in high school. "Most of the freshmen are experienced," said Dudderar. "These girls are really taking it seriously."

The club will petition for varsity status next spring. One of the requirements to become avarsity team includes existing for two years as an active, organized club. Since they are not yet a team the games they play this season will not count towards the other team's records. "We are, however, taking it very seriously," said Dudderer.

"The athletic department has been very supportive with scheduling practices and supplying equipment," stated Dudderar. "The SGA has also been supportive with finances."

Baseball Sweeps Three Victories

by HARRY McENROE
Sports Editor

After sweeping a doubleheader from conference rival Swarthmore on Saturday, and whipping St. Mary's on Wednesday, the Washington College baseball team has begun its season in grand fashion, enjoying three convincing road victories.

Another successful Spring break journey to Sanford, Florida has contributed greatly to the squad's promising seasonal outlook. While down South the Shoremen compiled a 3-4 record, losing two close games to Belmont College, a consistent small college power from Tennesee.

Although foul weather postponed a home season opening game against Salisbury State, the trip to Swarthmore was anything but disappointing. The Shore bats blasted anemic Quaker pitching for a total of twenty-nine runs during the afternoon. Bill Gerwig, Jim Corey and Vinnie Gasior led the team batting, as each collected at least four hits in the twinbill. Senior southpaw Mark Naser pitched the squad to a 18-5 opening game victory, while Junior Jim Corey eased to a 11-3 win in the nightcap.

Wednesday the Shoremen traveled down to St. Mary's where they again romped to victory, this time by a 10-3 margin. A four run rally in the fourth inning started a Shore hitting barrage which was eventually capped by a grand slam homerun by junior V.J. Filliben in the seventh. Filliben and Kevin Beard led the team with three hits a piece, while freshmen Greg Dargan and Paul Eckert shared mound duties.

Tomorrow's crucial doubleheader at Widener may spell a great deal about the team's capabilities this year. A measies "epidemic" cut short a promising campaign last spring, when the squad posted an 8-7 record. The team features a host of newcomers to the Shore baseball scene. Led by co-captains Chris Kiefer and Tim Fagen, the Shore nine entertains realistic hopes for a MAC conference playoff berth.

Lacrosse Off To Promising Start

by BEN CONNOLLY

The outlook for the 1981 Washington College lacrosse season appears bright despite two early season losses. Coaches Bryan Matthews and Clint Evans have a solid nucleus returning from last year's squad which reached the Division III playoffs.

Peter Jenkins, Paul Hooper, and Jeff Kauffman head a potent attack with Tray Macauley and Steve Furman also seeing plenty of action. When freshman Craig Boynton fully recovers from nagging preseason injuries, the Shoremen will have their strongest attack since the days of four-time All-American John Cheek.

The midfield, another position loaded with depth and talent, is led by former attackman Dickie Grieves, face-off specialist Joe Hashen, Jim Green, Bob White, Jesse Bacon, Joe Cornely, Ben Tuckerman, Tommy Adams, and Mike Mariano. Newcomers Dave Michalski and Hanzl Wittich will also play vital roles in the team's drive toward the Division III crown.

The biggest question mark is the defense which is left with the task of filling the shoes of All-Americans Lecky Haller and Willie Herring. The job falls on the shoulders of three-year starter Frank Filice, Tim Matthews, Kevin O'Connor, Tim Cloud, Ray Cameron, and freshman Bob Tutela. In the goal for the Shoremen is junior Bruce Winand who will play a key role in determining the success of the season.

The team looked good in spurts in the season opener at the Naval Academy, but they came out on the short end of a 20-9 score to the Midshipmen, a perennial Division I contender.

The squad then travelled to Saint Mary's, where they trounced the Saints in a 20-6 mismatch. The leading scorers were Grieves with 5 goals, 2 assists, Hooper, 3 goals, 2 assists, Macauley, 3 goals 1 assist, Kauffman, 3 goals, 1 assist, Jenkins, 2 goals, 1 assist, Furman, 1 goal, 2 assists, and Tuckerman with 2 goals while the defense was able to take a day off.

Tuesday afternoon, the Shoremen faced powerhouse Johns Hopkins, the defending Division I champions for the last three years. The squad looked sharp and performed well on offense pumping 11 goals in against the Blue Jays, but 12 penalties did the team in defensively. The Hopkins offense, stacked with high school and college All-Americans, fired 60 shots and scored 24 goals against the beleaguered defense. The score could have been higher were it not for some spectacular saves by goalie Bruce Winand. There were some positive aspects to the game including the control of 17 face-offs, the scoring in double figures, a rarity by any team against Hopkins, and the play of the overall team in the first half when they only trailed 10-4.

The team's next foe, St. Lawrence, rolled into town Thursday, only to be blown off the field by a 21-12 margin. The Shoremen had revenge on their minds, remembering last season's last second defeat, and buried their opponent in the fourth quarter. Pete Jenkins tallied 7 goals while Paul Hooper had 3 goals and 4 assists. The victory evened the squad's record at 2-2 and could be the stepping stone to bigger and better things.

The Shoremen are now in the midst of a five-game home stand with realistic if not probable chances of winning all five games. They meet Denison from Ohio at 1:30 tomorrow, on Kibler Field.

are open to all. If you fear the quick ruin of the nice, new Hill Dorms, don't, because no one in the right mind would ruin a nice, new set up. I am sure the fraternities will be good to their residences and proud of them. As a senator from Caroline, I know many students who favor frats. They like having a choice as do I. Once as a Presidential candidate, I asked, "Why not?" Now, I am saying why. We need a place for those who wanted and still want to live in academic "special" interest housing on this campus. Not only students, but faculty favor such an idea as do some administrators. The want exists, the choice exists, space exists, potential facilities exist, so the need exists. One third of the student population is a very large minority. One, I am sure the college wishes to keep here in addition to encouraging similarly interested students to come here from other areas. Academic housing should be afirst priority for 1981-1982. For I am convinced, we need that vitality of interest already kindled in academic housing to grow as the pilot light for this college's third century of existence. The fraternities have an assured home. Now let us see to it that the writers, artists, musicians, language students, actors, and interested majors can have one. We must not let the art of Liberal Arts fade away into disinterest nor disuse. If we do, then the liberal might be next. Then, we will all fade whether we choose to or not

Respectfully yours
Caroline Senator,
Walter Edward Foraker

Commentary: This is a brief message to those of you who were so obnoxiously rude during the Friday night showing of Rape of Love. This film deals with a very sensitive subject. It was obvious that some of you either identified with the sadistic, animilistic(sic) rapists or could not deal with the impact of this film. Business Major Proposal Sent to Faculty

by BILL MORTIMER
Assistant Editor

The faculty has been given an outline by the Academic Council in regard to a proposal made by the division of Social Sciences that Washington College implement a major in Business Administration.

The proposal, submitted to the Academic Council, and now in the hands of faculty members, concerns itself with five topics; an introduction, economic justification, educational justification, a description of the major and the proposed course changes. Daniel Premo, Michael Bailey, Charles Halstead and Steven Cades worked as a sub committee of the social science division. Dr. John Taylor, chairman of the division, worked "in consultation" with them, he said.

The proposed changes and implementation of the Business Major was made "to provide professional insight and broad training to those students interested in pursuing administrative careers in both the public and private sector," the proposal states. If such a program is begun, it would not be "inherently vocational," the proposal argues. Rather, it would enhance the liberal arts tradition.

Economic Justification

In the proposal, the subcommittee of the Social Sciences division states that 19.9 percent of the 19.8 million students enrolled in colleges and universities in 1978 chose 'Business and Commerce' as their major field of study." In actual numbers one out of five students wants to study business while in college or graduate school.

The subcommittee found as well that the interest in a major in business on the part of students, prospective and present, has not subsided since 1978. Almost 25 percent of approximately 5,400 inquiries to the College this year have asked specifically about Washington College's business program. Of the three hundred students accepted to the college for next year, as of March 5, 1981, fifty-three—or 17.7 percent—have "listed business administration as their major area of academic interest," according to the proposal.

Retention, a serious concern of Washington College administrators, is also cited as relating to the proposal. Currently, the withdrawal rate at Washington College is 30.8 percent. "Those students who identify business administration as their major academic interest," states the proposal, "had a withdrawal rate of 22 percent for the period 1975-1978."

"We can no longer afford to ignore the major academic interest of one fifth of the nation's students," says the proposal. The sub-committee points out in its proposal that courses in business organization, accounting and business law have been offered at the school since 1930. In addition, a "concentration" has been offered by the Economics Department since 1971 in business administration.

Inorder to view costs—both income and expenditures—which would result if a business major were adopted, the sub-committee points out that "classroom, dormitory and dining facilities are underused." Implementation of a new major could help to attract more students to the school and thus put present facilities to better use.

Expenditures—the hiring of one full time and one part-time professors and the allocation of money for library material—could well be made up by the increased number of students attracted by the major. There is also "the possibility of obtaining outside grant support for (the) initial library expense," recommended in the proposal as being $5,000.

Business Administration and the Liberal Arts Curriculum

While the implementation of a Business major would most likely enhance both enrollment and retention, the question arises as to whether or not a major in Business would be a legitimate part of a liberal arts framework. In their proposal, the subcommittee presents four educational justifications.

Such a major would, on heuristic ground, be a focus for "concepts and structures which originate in disciplines as disparate as mathematics, philosophy, and psychology. On a philosophical level it would be a discipline "which is neither more nor less inherently 'applied' or 'vocational' than physics or Spanish."

The subcommittee believes that such a major would affect the contributions which liberally educated people can make in the world of American enterprise.

The proposal also notes that the changes are "a relatively minor expansion of an existing program."

Description of the Business Administration Major

The proposal for a Business Administration major is ma.le with the idea of an interdisciplinary major in mind, combining areas including economics, political science, sociology, and statistics, among others. Majors would "be required to demonstrate a mastery of written and oral language and communication." Also expected of students would the "understanding of cultural and historical traditions." Anyone awarded a degree in business administration would have combined "a broad based understanding of the nature of human problems solving with specific skills that will enable him to follow a chosen career."

Students would be required to chose a specific field of study. Those fields of study which have been suggested by the subcommittee are an International Business Concentration, an Area, country or regional, specialization, techniques of Business Decision Making, Business and a science or Business and a social science. Students wishing to may design their own area of specialization with thediscretion of the department and the approval of the college Dean. There would be general requirements within the departments of Business, Economics, and Math as well as requirements to fulfill the outside concentration.

Course Changes and Description of Courses

The proposal suggests the adoption of three new courses and the changing of four existing courses.

All business courses already existing within the Economics department (EC 113, 114, 116, and 415) would be listed separately as BA 113, 114, 116, and 415. Any courses added in the future would fall under the heading of Business Administration, BA, as well. The suggestion to split Business Law, EC 116, into two separate sections so that more extensive material could be covered adequately was made by the subcommittee. These changes have been requested by the Economics department and were asked to be considered regardless of the Academic Council's decision concerning the business administration major.

Three courses have also been added. Courses titled BA 117 Business Law II, BA 305 Quantitative Methods of Management and BA 410 Seminar in Business Decision-Making would be added to the curriculum if this proposal is adopted.

The final suggestion, to add BA 415 Corporate Finance in place of EC 415 was also made. Such a change would only be in title, the course would remain the same.

A major cannot be implemented for nine months after it is proposed, according to Maryland State law. The courses proposed, however, would be instituted in the Economics division next year.

Senior to give Address at Commencement

by VIRGINIA KURAPKA
Editor-in-chief

In response to a request by the senior class, a senior will be allowed to speak at commencement.

"The reason we're doing it is because we couldn't get a commencement speaker we wanted, we decided to do the next best thing and get a senior to speak," said George Dennis, senior class president. Seniors have been dissatisfied with both the choice of speaker and a lack of consultation with the class.

As of mid-week, no submissions had been received, although, ali seniors received a letter from Dennis requesting submissions of speeches by Friday, April 3. Several criteria were required. "The topic should be commencement oriented," no longer than 2000 words or five minutes spoken, and discreetion choice of words.

Speeches will be judged by senior class officers and some members of the ODK. "The essay will be judged according to content and its captivating qualities," states the letter.

No student has addressed commencement since 1935 when "Bill Baker gave the address," said President of the College Joseph McLain. Concluded Dennis, "If the seniors are going to be apathetic towards this opportunity then we'll just scrap the whole thing."

Crack The Sky played here last Wednesday night in a concert sponsored by the SGA. Kelz Royce was the lead-in band, and it looked like a good time was had by all!

Editorial

The proposal to institute a Business Administration major at Washington College is not a new one, although it has received considerably less attention than other recent proposals for curricular change. It promises to attract high quality students, whom the College needs, and could serve to alleviate some financial problems, including declining enrollment and high attrition.

A Business Administration major at Washington College will not be a threat to the liberal arts tradition; neither will it provide a quick solution to all our financial difficulties. Small liberal arts colleges everywhere are threatened by fewer students and higher costs. Washington College seems plagued as well by too much liberal arts rhetoric and not enough liberal arts reality. This Business Administration major would reinforce, not detract from, the rest of the curriculum. It would be a step toward making Washington College a better liberal arts college.

The major as proposed by the Faculty subcommittee almost goes overboard in its attempt to ensure that the Business Administration major fit the school's liberal arts tradition. With all the course requirements in all the different disciplines, a business major might actually end up with a broader liberal arts education than a student following one of our current majors. The faculty should pass the proposal at its meeting this Monday night. It's another step in the right direction.

Dear Editor,

I have been reading the "Letters to the Editor" during the past few weeks, and there is one point to the "controversy" which has puzzled me. I cannot understand why the Writer's Union has been singled out. They alone have been given the majority of the verbal and written abuse that has been floating around campus lately, but they aren't the only ones in favor of academic housing. It's not fair to them or to the others who support the proposal, to single them out this way. The proposal has support from virtually all areas of study. There is a great amount from the language, drama, English, art, and music majors, as well as the faculty, and others who are not among these groups. The Writer's Union does not make up a third of the students, but that's how many students voted in favor of the proposal in the poll taken a few weeks ago.

I support academic housing. My only wish is to get a good education, and to be treated fairly and equally in the college community. That's all that the supporters of the proposal want. It's obvious that most of the people here don't want that, too, and it's sad that they have ceased to view this issue fairly.

Sincerely,
Carol Andrew

I have to admit that Washington College is one of the best gigs we have on our schedule. The people are great and I hope that the southern Rockers enjoy what we do and how we do it. Unfortunately, it seems that some of y'all (it only takes one) came down with a severe case of sticky fingers. A new jean jacket and one of our flags must grown legs, which of course, biologically speaking, is impossible! It would be sheer folly to expect their return, however it would be appreciated greatly if those of you who are made of sterner stuff assist those poor unfortunates who give in to temptation. I look forward to playing for Washington College again, but my attent!on for the the stage will be intense, to say the least!

Dear Editor,

In light of recent events on campus, which collectively represent a disturbing trend on campus, I find it necessary to comment. Though it is encouraging to see such a high level of interest and involvement on the part of the student body, the issue responsible for this concern has quite possibly become destructive and divisive.

The controversy over the Hill Dorms, which began a healthy debate and served to heighten student involvement and intracampus discussion, has of late caused increasing hostility and polarization on campus. The situation has deteriorated to the point where certain groups feel so frustrated that they feel compelled to take extreme action to get their point across. It is disappointing to see this debate reduced to a contest, on the part of some, to determine what groups on campus are "better" or "more worthwhile."

Regardless of where you stood on the Hill Dorms issue the finality of therecent decision should be accepted. Whether or not you agree with this decision, it it important to realize that the question has been settled. It's time now for the campus, the entire student body, to concentrate its efforts on major problems facing Wahsington College in the immediate furure. Causing some sort of permanent rift between groups mislabeled "academic" and "social" does little to promote the cooperation that would help us through the next year. In short, I can see nothing positive coming from a continuation of the Hill Dorms debate.

This is not to suggest that we abandon tha question of academic housing. But instead of dwelling on the Hill Dorms, our energies should be directed toward finding alternate housing somewhere else on campus. If the same enthusiasm were directed to this effort as was displayed in the sign-hanging the night before Junior/Senior Day, the outlook for academic housing would bebright. It is vital that no one group feel so frustrated with the College that such drastic measures are ever deemed necessary again.

By the same token, it is much to easy to blame the fraternities for all the problems of W.C.—from attrition to vandalism. This assumption is unfair at best. It is unfortuante that during the course of the Hill Dorms debate, the campus seems to have divided into fraternity and non-fraternity, which seems to have been equated with social and academic. It is ludicrous to suggest that in a school this size, purely academic or purely social groups could exist.

The time has come to put aside recent differences and work together to assure that such disparities in collegepolicies and actions never occur again.

Sincerely,
Tom Twomey

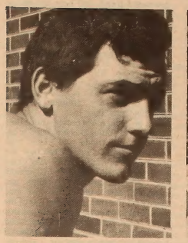
Bishop Moore To Speak

NEWS BUREAU

One of America's most distinguished churchmen will pay a return visit to Washington College's William James Forum this Friday, April 3. The Right Reverend Paul Moore, Jr., Episcopal Bishop of New York, will speak at 7:30 p.m. in Hynson Lounge on the College campus.

The head of one of the richest Christian dioceses in the world, widely known for his liberalism in ethical and social matters, will speak on "Women's Rights, Gay Rights, and the Church." Bishop Moore has been a longtime advocate of the ordination of women in the Church and of a relaxation of traditional prejudices against homosexuals.

In his most recentbook, Take A Bishop Like Me, published last year, Bishop Moore recounts his involvement as bishop in a church seriously divided over these issues. He took particular criticism for ordaining Ellen Barret, who had admitted her lesbian tendencies, to the priesthood. Yet, Bishop Moore was also a defender of an orderly approach to change in the Church, against the wishes of some of his more radical colleagues in the House of Bishops.



Bishop Moore was born in 1919 and received his education at St. Paul's School, Yale, and the General Theological Seminary. He served in the Marines in World War II, was seriously wounded at Guadalcanal, and was honored with the Navy Cross, the Silver Star, and the Purple Heart.

His lecture on Friday is free and the public is invited to attend.

WC Professors Contribute to Chesapeake Bay Book

NEWS BUREAU

A lengthy volume entitled The Chesapeake Bay in the American Revolution, a funded project of the Maryland Bicentennial Commission, is scheduled for publication next fall to coincide with the 200th anniversary of the last Revolutionary War Battle, the battle of Yorktown. Washington College served as the base of operation for the project, edited by Rear Admiral Ernest M. Eller (U.S.N., Ret.). Dr. Nathan Smeth, chairman of the department of history, served as project coordinator for the work which has been in progress since 1974. Dr. W. Robert Fallaw, professor of history, worked as research director and co-authored one of the fourteen chapters. Mrs. Jeanne Smith and Mrs. Marion West Stoer, assistant editors, gathered research materials and prepared them for chapter writers.

The Chesapeake Bay's vital role in winning the War for Independence had never been told or recorded as a whole. According to Admiral Eller, "there are few aspects of the Revolution more in need of scholarly investigation and public awareness than the course of events in the Chesapeake Bay, the heartland of eighteenth century and revolutionary Americana and an indispensable part of the nation's maritime existence today."

Beginning with Lord Dunmore's War and going through to the decisive Chesapeake Capes–Yorktown Campaign, almost every year from 1775 to 1781 saw operations and events in the Bay area of critical importance to the Revolution's outcome. Besides naval and military actions, the Bay region's exports paid for much of the war and its imports were of great value in sustaining American military strength.

The records on which a scholarly study of this subject could be based were scattered among a large number of depositions and archives. The Bay Project undertook to gather in one place as many as possible of the original records bearing on the Bay's history during the Revolutionary period (usually duplicated in microform). These materials (supplemented by appropriate historical monographs, maps, bibliographical works, etc.) served as the research data for the collective authorshop of the narrative history and as the substancial core of the archive-library that will be permanently established within the Washington College library. The unique collection of source materials (and supporting scholarly works) on the Chesapeake Bay will remain at the College and be open to visiting scholars as well as students.

The historical work narrates in a systematic way the significant aspects of the Bay's influence on the outcome of the entire Revolution. The book is richly illustrated with contemporaneous maps, paintings, and engravings. It is of unquestionable value for scholars and also for all citizens attentive to the heritage of this nation. Like the archive-library, the Bay history will be an enduring contribution to the nation's self-knowledge and self-appreciation which was a very crucial aspect of the entire national bicentennial celebration philosophy.

The Bay project had its origins in St. Michaels, Maryland where members of the Chesapeake Bay Maritime Museum Society, Mr. and Mrs. G.A. Van Lennep, the late Dr. Edwin M. Jameson, and Mr. J.A. Robinson, encouraged Admiral Eller, who, as Director of Naval History, U.S. Navy (1956-1970), supervises the multi-volumed publication project Naval Documents of the American Revolution, to undertake a Bicentennial proposal incorporating the part played by the Chesapeake in the Revolution. The scope of the plan soon outgrew the Museum's capabilities, and Washington College took the helm with the financial assistance of the W. Alton Jones Foundation of New York City.

As general editor of the Chesapeake Bay Project, Admiral Eller was responsible for establishing the aims and procedures of the research effort, recruiting most of the distinguished chapter authors, editing and revising each chapter as submitted and preparing two chapters himself.

The volume is being published by Tidewater Publishers of Centreville, Maryland, whose president, Arthur H. Kudner, Jr., is a long-time member of the Washington College Board of Visitors and Governors. As of now, precise details on the date of publication and the price of the volume have not been announced.

Death of a (World-Be) Soccer Player

by PETE TUCHRI

It is March now, and the second term is finished, having sped by with all the deceptive ease of an Orel eight. Only days ago, it seems, the last train of my winter vacation was pulling into Oxford just in time for a quick, greasy dinner of fish and chips, and tomorrow I will get on a bus that will eventually take me back to Paris.

It's not as if any of us here are in a rush to get home, or that the winter has been an especially exciting one, it's just that after being in Oxford for a few months, then touring Europe, everyone seems to have come back ready to plunge into school life. Five people from Manchester have gotten jobs at the Kings Arms, the pub on the corner, and a few more are working at Speak, easy, a Chicago-style pizza parlor (if one believes what one reads on menus) with American music, English pizza, and a borderline atmosphere complete with Mafia-type waiters.

Admittedly, most of the people who have jobs got them not so much because they wanted to continue to experience Oxford eating life. The high costs of Europe have driven the sturdiest New England tramps, sons into streets looking for jobs at less than minimum wage. At the same time at the beginning of the term when some were applying for jobs, another handful of Manchester students were auditioning for plays. There are always a lot of student productions at Oxford, and there are usually a few that need decidedly American accents.

So in late January I decided that I would either get a job or a part in a play. I had done some acting before, and found it enjoyable. I had also worked before. My first audition there was a fluke; a girl ran into the dorm babling that someone was doing Death of A Salesman, and they needed someone to play Ben, Willy Loman's brother, and would I please give Chris the message. I said yes, told Marianne to go back to her room and get some rest, and ran over to the director's room.

I read for him and it felt good. The next morning I looked in Daily Information, the University news sheet, and saw two more auditions. I wrote down the addresses and after lunch I walked across High Street, towards the river, to Oriel College, where I waited in line behind three fat girls wearing six different-colored socks and a German guy reading Fathers Of The Greek Church. The play we were waiting to audition for was Steven Sondheim's A Little Night Music", which someone was producing to complete a drama major. I didn't know anything about the play, but someone said it was funny.

The Andrews Sisters came and went and a few minutes later the German came out, already back into his book. I walked into the room.

the one who asked was obviously the director, sitting in the middle of a set with people sitting on either side of him. There was another guy sitting on a wickerchair in the corner near the door, all three of the people on the sofa took my name down. The director gave me something to read, something I couldn't quite understand about some foreigners who wanted to do a play about medieval peasants. I read it, haltingly.

"Fine. Marvelous!"

The director had turned to the corner. Mark pushed his glasses back onto his nose and turned on the piano stool.

"Do you know your range?"

My mind was trying to process the question, but halfway through the job another thought took precedence and started putting things together. A lot of people. A Little Night Music. A piano. I had stumbled into a musical.

Mark hit a note on the piano. "Sing that."

I made a noise, something that would've been followed another setting by a quick tongue depressor jabbed down the throat.

"Do you have a song prepared?"

I told him I didn't.

"Is there anything you'd like to do?"

I stopped and gave the question some thought. I wanted to suggest ZZ Top's "She Don't Love Me, She Loves My Automobile," but I didn't think they would find it appropriate. I tried to think of all the songs I knew the words to that didn't concern a Christmas tree or an infant in swaddling clothes, and finally I came up with "Family of Man," an old song by Three Dog Night. By coincedence Mark knew it, but couldn't play it.

"Just sing it by yourself, if you don't mind. I'll get an idea of your range."

I started singing, and after the first line the words came easily. Near the end of the first verse I started to remember how much I liked Three Dog Night in high school, and how I had seen them in concert right before they had broken up, and I was cruising into the second verse when Mark stopped me.

"That's enough. Thank You."

"Are you sure? I know the rest."

Mark spun away from me on the stool. "I think that tells me what I need to know."

After one or two more questions they let me leave although the guy next door refused to wipe a grin off his fat face. He didn't have to sing old songs to roomful of people. I wished I had a copy of Fathers of the Greek Church, so I could hit him with it.

It was still early afternoon, so I decided to try to salvage the day. I ran over to the room where Marianne was holding auditions for The Fall Of The House Of Usher. When I got there only one other person was waiting, a tall Englishman with a deep voice.

"Hi," he said in his deep voice. "Are you here for the auditions?"

"Yeah," I said.

"It's a great play," he said. "Do you know it?"

"No," I said. He took out a cigarette and lit it. I took a tissue out of my pocket and blew my nose. "It isn't a musical, is it?"

The director, who sat alone in a small, black room, called us in together. He gave us each a Dylan Thomas poem to read, something about Death. When I was halfway through it he told me to try to read with an English accent. I tried, sounding more like a New York cabbie. The next event was a little ordeal wherein I read a short piece and, as he heard it, the Englishman acted it out, and then he read a different piece, and I had to act it out. When it was my turn to act I stood, listening closely. The Englishman began reading.

"It was late at night."

No problem so far.

"I had arrived at may home, drunk, as usual, when I realized I couldn't find my key."

I walked forward and groped in my pocket.

"After a few moments I finally discovered it on the string around my neck. I then opened the door and removed my coat."

Piece of cake. I never even questioned why I would carry a door key around my neck, but there was no time for method acting.

"It was then that I spied the cat, sitting in the corner. I reached for it, and it bit me. I saw the wound grow red with blood then, with the fury of a thousand demons, my emotions burst—I could stand it no longer!"

The Englishman was getting pretty excited. I watched my wound bleed.

"I reached into my pocket and removed my pen knife. Then, with a quick gesture he barely had time to see, though he couldn't have escaped my grasp even if he had, I flicked open the blade and cut out the cat's eyes."

I had just unfolded my pen knife when I heard the end. I turned to the Englishman, who shrugged, looked back at my knife, then slid my best at cutting, but the knife got stuck, and I didn't really want to cut the cat's eyes out anyway, and when I looked up the director was looking at his papers, ready to go on to something else.

"Right, you," he said. "Now I'd like you both to stand up. I want you to imagine that you are an insane woman, an insane woman who has been put in her coffin prematurely and you are just waking up."

The Englishman froze solid, asleep, then suddenly quite flutter. His eyes opened, staring straight ahead. His hands pressed forward against the invisible coffin walls, and he began moaning in creased anguish as he fought to escape. I picked up my coat and headed for the door.

This term also saw the reemergence of the Manchester College soccer team. We call ourselves The Walking Dead, but at our first practice this term we looked more like the blind mice—the field was covered with fog, and I stood in front of the goal, staring into the mist, trying to hear the sound of running feet. Our first game, in November, had been demoralizing—we lost 12-0 to the faculty of the primary school across the street, but the score was pretty indicative of the game. We came back to school with our enthusiasm patched together with a match with Hertford, who we heard was not very good anyway.

The day of the match was cold, but better than the day of our first game, when frost covered the ground. We cut across a few back roads to Hertford's playing grounds and found the team waiting for us in the clubhouse. We went in and changed while Laura stayed and kicked a ball around. Everyone who knew anything about having a girl on the team we just muttered something about Manchester being a coed college, and that we had yet to hear just about anybody who was willing to play. The truth was, of course, that Laura could outdribble and out-pass half of the team. Chauvinism is alive and well in Europe.

After we changed we took the field and I concentrated on blocking some practice shots, because in a moment of insanity at lunch I had promised to buy everyone on my team a pint of beer for every goal I let in, after six. I said it in a kind of cocky optimism, trying to build up the team's confidence. Instead my defense licked their lips and started talking about bad weather and sore legs.

The goal I started in was muddy, so I decided that if I could hold them off in the first half I had it made. The game started, Hertford controlled the ball but only made about two shots, and we felt pretty comfortable. After about ten minutes had passed, though, they took a shot from the side that grazed my hand and bounced in the goal box. For some reason, rolled backwards, into the goal. A few minutes later they scored again, and I started to worry. I began to notice that the more Hertford scored, the lazier my defense got. Finally they had five goals near the end of the half, and as they brought the ball downfield I ran to smother it. Their forward kicked the ball high in fronto of the goal, and my fullback jumped to intercept.

I got up and walked into the goal, where he was getting the ball.

"Mike?"

"Sorry, mate." He tossed me the ball and jogged back to his position.

The game went along on that downward trend, and near the end of the second half I lost track of how much beer I owed at around seventy dollars worth. The fact that we had even scored, twice, didn't console me, and with two minutes to go it was 13-2. We had the ball at midfield, but it was stolen away. With time running out Hertford wat just trying to get a shot off, so I knew I had only to make one more save. They brought the ball downfield, but they took too long and had to go back. A few seconds later they passed to the other side and tried to bring it in, but David and Laura kept them out. About a minute left now. We got the ball to midfield, but they came back in, and after another half-minute they were almost within range and everyone was waiting for the gun. Ready for the shot, I stepped out of the goal. One of their men took a hard shot from about fifteen yards away and I blocked it, but it bounced off my chest, I jumped forward to smother it and end the game, but as I did Hertford's forward took a tremendous kick—into the side of my head.

I was on the ground praying for death, but I heard Hertford's forward kick the ball (and my glasses, as it turned out) into the goal, then jog over to me.

"You okay?"

I told everyone tha I was and they went back to the clubhouse. A few of my teammates peeled me off the ground and made me stand ringing ears. We got to the clubhouse and sat down. At halftime Hertford had brought out orange slices, and as a post-game drink they served us shandy, a mixture of beer and lemonade. It was while I was drinking that I noticed blood was coming out of my ear, and what I put my hand against it—pop—pure silence. Radio Eardrum went off the air.

To make a long story short, just long, two people took me to the hospital, where we waited for three hours for a doctor to tell me to go to an ear clinic the next morning—no advice, no diagnosis, nothing. England's hospitals are free, and now I know why. The right side of my head is in quite agony. We went out and tried to drown our anger in Indian food. After dinner we came back to school, still muddy in our uniforms, and I sat down and grabbed a book to help pass what I was sure would be a long night. At about seven in the morning I nodded off, and at eight o'clock the door opened.

"Hi," I said.

The hut at the door moved his lips.

"I can't hear," I said. I pointed to my desk, and he walked over and write a note and handed it to me. It said, "Do you want to hear?"

I tried to make sense of it. Then it came to me. "that's not for the musical, it is?" The director handed me a copy of Death of a Salesman. I nodded and he left.

A little later I walked out to the Radcliffe Infirmary and waited for two more hours before young Dr. P. West took me into a room and told me to lie down. He played some games to make sure I couldn't hear, then proceeded to set up a small hardware store in my ear. After about thirty minutes I had given up on the idea of reading the Partridge Family again when Doc West Said, "Now I'm going to try to get a look at the eardrum." I looked over at him as he turned and picked up a fifteen inch piece of stainless steel that would have scared Moby right out of the water. P. West leaned over and aimed about half of it into my skull, and just as I started looking for it to come out the other end—pop—and the world was back in stereo once again.

Victorian Architecture and Morals Lecture

by ANYA LIPNICK

Monday night, in the Sophie Kerr room the Washington College Lecture series presented "Victorian Architecture and Domesticity" given by Professor Elizabeth Grossman.

Accompaning her Grossmen's talk were slides of Victorian Houses taken from the New England area.

Addressing a gathering of forty people Grossman touched on aspects of the Victorian period. She stressed that Victorian architecture was centered around American Morality, meaning that Victorian houses were and are a reflection of values.

The common points of Victorian Houses are the symmetrical design and classical details; doors, windows and chimney. Grossman said, "Victorian Houses are a Pandora's box of stylistic ideas."

A few of the more common styles that she presented were the Italian Villas, the second Empire Style influenced by 17th Century architecture and Napoleon's Paris, and the Queen Anne's style which combined influences by the 18th Century with classical overtones.

The most interesting point in the lecture was Grossman tying in of Victorian designs with a natural, pastoral look. By the use of carved arches and shingles a Victorian house gives the effect of tree shadows when the light hits it. Another natural design in most original victorian homes is the earthy tones of paint, used gives the image of a forest.

Throughout Grossman's talk she tried to tie in mature the family and homelife into the various buildings she presented.

In addition to examples of homes in New England, Grossman pointed out the number of Victorian houses to be found in Chestertown on High and Water Streets and on Washington Avenue. The only complaint she has about these houses is that they have been painted white, very unlike the true Victorian colors.

Overall the lecture was informative, but some of the detailing was vague and the number of New England examples were few. There are many more aspects of Victorian Architecture in New England and the rest of the country that are included in this subject.

Asenoio, former Ambassador and Hostage, Lectured

by BOB STRONG

The Honorable Diego Asencio, assistant Secretary of State for Consular Affairs and former Ambassador to Colombia, spoke here on Wednesday night. His talk was entitled: "Hostage in Colombia".

Ambassador Asencio was born in Spain but moved to this country at an early age. A graduate of Georgetown University, he joined the Foreign Service in 1957 and has been a career diplomat ever since.

According to Ambassador Asencio, what began as a cocktail party on the evening of February 27 last year ended in terror when four gunmen entered the building and began firing automatic weapons at the ceiling. These four were immediately followed by five other guerrillas and precipitated a two-hour gun battle with the Colombian military.

Ambassador Asencio, along with representatives from various other foreign governments, was held hostage in what became a sixty-one day ordeal. According to Asencio, he was, on several occasions, used as a shield by the insurgents. The fact that the captives were foreign dignitaries was a source of considerable political leverage in dealing with the Colombian government.

Asencio believes diplomacy saved their lives. "The guerrillas had to be convinced to get out of the rural bandit stage and into the political arena." Asencio along with some of his fellow captives was able to persuade the guerrillas to take advantage of the diplomatic talents of their captives.

Remarkably, the guerrillas allowed a group elected by the hostages to handle the drafting of the negotiations. The hostages took an active part in these negotiations, an event Asencio called unprecedented in the history of modern terrorism.

These professional diplomats, with the added impetus of their own survival at stake, proved quite effective. The sixty-one day crisis ended with a settlement that neither impinged on U.S. policy, offended the Colombian government nor denied the guerrillas the opportunity to withdraw with honor.

Instead of the original draft which demanded fifty million dollars and the release of over 300 political prisoners, the final settlement, according to Asencio, sought far-reaching social improvement.

In return for the release of the hostages, the guerrillas were guaranteed due process of law for those accused of political crimes. According to the agreement, the Inter-American Committee on Human Rights would be allowed to investigate cases in which the Colombian government was accused of human rights violations, and to be present at trials.

In Asencio's opinion, this exchanged an ephemeral and provincial goal for one of lasting and far-reaching social significance. The success of these negotiations, Asencio proclaimed, demonstrated that patient diplomacy is the only humanitarian course of action: "proof that bullshit is better than bullets."

The Ambassador described at some length the personal relationships that developed between captives and captors. "These people are 'ratins first", Asencio remarked. "It goes against their social upbringing to be rude to people they know." He acknowledged that a respect for the individual remained intact despite the hostage situation.

The rapport that these diplomatic hostages were able to establish with their captors was a fascinating account of the experience for Asencio. He kept a detailed diary and plans to coauthor a book on the subject with his wife.

The Ambassador proved to be an excellent raconteur, weaving many humorous anecdotes into the talk. It is ironic, he suggested, that a strong situation of this degree can generate so many humorous moments.

Ambassador Asencio was asked to comment on the improtance of the diplomatic service in Latin America. He answered the service is only as effective as the quality of its personnel permits. Cultural sensitivity and linguistic effectiveness are key factors in this formula , but training alone is not enough. Asencio recalled that he once worked with a professional diplomat who spoke six languages flawlessly, but was still "an idiot in all six."

John Ashbery to Give Reading

by LEE ANN CHEARNEYI

As I sit looking out of a window of the building

I wish I did not have to write the instruction manual on the uses of a new metal.

John Ashbery

Poet John Ashbery will read from his work on Wednesday, April 8, 1981, at 8:00 p.m. in Hynson Lounge. His books of poetry include Some Trees, The Double Dream of Spring, Three Poems, Houseboat Days, and As We Know. Ashbery was awarded the Pulitzer Prize, the National Book Award, and the National Book Critics Circle Award for Self-Portrait in a Convex Mirror. His distinctions are not confined to literature but extend to the art world. He has written art criticism for the Paris Herald Tribune and was Executive Editor of Art News from 1965 to 1972. He contributes art criticism on major exhibitions to Newsweek and is the art critic for New York magazine.

John Ashbery is a poet who speaks to our world. Perhaps this is the source of his complexity. Ashbery's poems, often described as "difficult" or "abstruse," portray a world equally as dense as the one in which we live. As a complete understanding of society, science, the arts, becomes increasingly inaccessible, so must the poetic vision of the late twentieth century become harder to achieve. Ashbery uses the language of the poet, the artist, of technology, the media, the masses, and weaves them together to fabricate poetry with a multifaceted, yet unified, point of view; just as the man in the street must deal with the event in his life, private, public, and professional, with an assortment of vocabularies. Poetry magazine asserts that "the chances are very good that reading Ashbery will come to dominate the last third of the century just as Yeats dominated the first."

John Ashbery is a poet who must be read. His impact on contemporary poetry, like Ginsberg's, is too strong to be ignored. Both poets shape the raw material of everyday life—for Ginsberg, a neon fruit supermarket; for Ashbery, a daydreamer who must write an instruction manual—into poetry that fuses the American culture and values with a distinctively contemporary American poetic vision. Ashbery's poems are about love, art, age. More than that, they become thir own subject. As if painting self-portraits, Ashbery creates poems that acknowledge not only themselves but their author as well. They are artifacts with a self-awareness. Ashbery is an exciting and distinctive poet. Donald Barthelemе wrote of Self-Portrait in a Convex Mirror, "John Ashbery's book continues his exploration of places where no one has ever been; it is, again, an event in American Poetry."

A reception will follow the reading in Hynson Lounge.

Strand Delivers Reading of Poetry, Fiction

by COLLEEN C. MILLER

Mark Strand's "Keeping Things Whole" was one of the first poems I read my freshman year and could not forget. Last year a friend showed me a scrapbook she was keeping of her work and favorite poems. "Keeping Things Whole" was one of those poems. But of course.

The Sophie Kerr Committee brought Mark Strand to the Washington College campus Tuesday, March 17. Adding his translations of Carlos Drummond de Andrade's Souvenirs of the Ancient World to readings from his own Selected Poems, Strand also read a short piece of fiction, "True Confessions".

Sometimes reciting poetry from memory and speaking in a quiet, faraway voice, Mark Strand seems worlds apart. This, however, is natural. Reading Strand's poetry is like dropping snapshot negatives into developing solution and watching them become familiar. At first, you see only the missing features and then, figures you know emerge.

Critic Octavio Paz best explains this process, "The poetry of Mark Strand explores the 'terra infirma' of our lives. Fascinated by emptiness, it is not strange that he should conceive the poem as a description of absence, but at the same time his vision continually stumbles against the blunt, obtuse reality of things and beings irreversibly trapped in brute existence." Absence is Strand's most striking characteristic as a poet. Yet his ability to express absence in his poetry ends, paradoxically enough, in there being no absence at all. "Time tells me what I am," Strand writes in Selected Poems. "I change and I am the same/I empty myself of me and my life remains."

You must chance the transparency of Strand's poetry, the frightening quality of absence, to understand his purpose. "I looked over the gunwale and saw beneath the sufrace/a luminous room, a light-filled grave, saw for the first time/the one clear place given to us when we are alone," writes Strand in "A Morning", one of the poems he read which deals with his boyhood. To capture life's full connotations, Strand uses the empty qualities associated with death. "Guardian of my death,/-preserve my absence. I am alive," Strand writes in Selected Poems.

"It's my night to be rattled,/Saddied/with spooks," writes Strand in the poem "Sleeping With One Eye Open". His conviction that life's fullness is best expressed by absence must overcome the uncertainty absence brings. "How we wish we were sunning ourselves/In a world of familiar views/And Entry to the unaccounted for," Strand writes. Of course those who live in "fixed conditions", a consistent world, remain comfortably unaware of inconsistencies and can regulate their lives in accounted directions. Yet Strand, as a poet, is aware of chaos and attempted to order this chaos through his poetry. "Nobody wants/to leave, nobody wants to stay behind," he writes in "The Door" bringing the desire for ordered mediana to a full tilt.

Mark Strand's talent for creating simple images from words is evident, "Your moist open mouth will bloom in the glass of storefronts," he writes in Selected Poems, forming an image of human breath clouding on cold glass. "He talks until the beam from someone's flashlight turns us white," and "The carnation in my buttonhole/-precedes me like a small/continuous explosion" also create images for the reader. It is Strand's talent for simple language which appeals to the reader and makes Strand an especially well-liked poet.

A flair for uncomplicated language is not the only likeable quality Mark Strand has. Midway through his reading Tuesday night, Strand changed tactics and read a piece of short fiction which had the audience roaring with laughter. "True Confessions" , a ludicrous parody of dimestore, tearjerker love affairs, had its narrator falling in and out of love with six consecutive women, in the most traumatic fashion. Commenting on his knack for divorce and marriage, the "True Confessions" narrator says, "As the fearless succession proves, my faith in the institution (of marriage) was never shaken."

Mark Strand's ludicrous side can be seen in his poetry as well as his fiction. In "The Tunnel", an excerpt from Selected Poems, Strand describes an ominous stranger who has been watching his house for days and his reaction to the stranger, "I weep like a schoolgirl/band make obscene gestures/through the window. I/write large suicide notes/and place them so he/can read them easily." In "The Mailman", a mailman is the harbinger of bad news, "He falls to his knees./-'Forgive me! Forgive me! he pleads./I ask him inside." After the characters in Strand's poetry quit their exaggerated gestures, absence prevails. And that absence is full of significance, "I listen to the wind/press hard against the house./I cannot sleep./I cannot stay awake./The shutters bang./The end of my life begins."

Human bodies in Mark Strand's poetry are treated as transparent hulls. The emphasis on absence and the simplicity of language give Strand's material a fullness of expression. "Mark Strand has chosen the negative path, with loss as the first step towards fullness," writes critic Octavio Paz, "it is also the opening to a transparent verbal perfection." You may choose to accept the backward negative absence and move to a forward presence, or you may not. Mark Strand, obviously, has made a decisive confrontation and hopes to lead his fellow man to this same revelation. "I look at you/and see myself /under the surface," he writes in Selected Poems.

After the reading Tuesday night I went back to my room and flipped through the dog-eared Norton Anthology. Sure enough, there it was: "In a field/I am the absence/of field./This is/always the case...We all have reasons/for moving./I Move/to keep things whole."

Clarke, Mills Present Recital— Dueling Pianos

By JEANETTE SCHAEFER

On Tuesday evening, March 24, Kathleen J. Mills and Garry E. Clarke presented a duo-piano recital in Tawes Theater. The program consisted of three pieces, each from a different period and style.

The two pianists began the concert with Mozart's Sonata in D Major, K.U. 448. This work, published post-humously in 1781, is one of the few piano duets Mozart wrote. All three movements, the Allegro con spirito, a slower Andante, and an Allegro molto, allowed the pianists to exhibit their dexterity. The themes, constantly passing back and forth between the pianos, challenged the listener to follow along.

The second work, Scaramouche, composed by Darius Milhaud, belongs to the twentieth century. Milhaud, who lived from 1892 to 1974, was a French composer, one of Les Six. This school of composers pursued brevity and straight forwardness in their sound, pulling away from Wagner's powerful chromaticism. The first movement of this work, "Vif", presents a rollicking melody, establishing a cheerful mood. In the second movement, Modere," the two pianos engage in an imitative conversation. The final movement employs a sunny Latin beat.

The third work, Brahm's Variations on a Theme of Haydn, Op. 56b, was first written for symphonic orchestra, and was later transcribed for two pianos. This piece begins with a chorale theme, which is then set in a variety of key signatures, time signatures, and moods. The original chorale reappears more grandly in the Finale to close the work.

After being recalled to the stage several times, Mills and Clarke performed a waltz musette by Pouleno, entitled "The Embarkment of Cythero" as an encore.

The repetoire of duels for two pianos is fairly limited, and therefore duo-piano recitals are uncommon. The audience, however, appreciated the novelty and was delighted by the outstanding performance of these two faculty members.

Jenkins Scores Eight Goals for Shoremen

by JEFF ALDERSON
Layout Editor

"This article isn't really about me, it's about the team," said three-year Sho'man lacrosse veteran Peter Jenkins. In the course of the game against St. Lawrence Thursday, March 26, Jenkins scored an incredible eight goals which he attributes mainly to the fine Sho'man teamwork.

"As an attackman, " he stated, "I do something that's easy to see, but our defensemen do things that aren't easily seen. Most of my goals are assisted. It takes teamwork."

Jenkins is from the town of Duxbury, Massachusetts, near Boston. Since lacrosse is not widely played in the New England area Jenkins did not get a chance to learn the game until he enterd prep school in the seventh grade. He began the game as a crease attack, the position which he still plays. He owes much of his early training to a coach from Baltimore who wrote a book on the sport.

In prep school Jenkins was required to play sports. Each of his three years there he played soccer, hockey, and lacrosse.

Jenkins feels that he benefitted from attending a small prep school. He prefers the more individual attention teachers can give the students. This is also one of the things he likes about WC.

He was originally considering attending another school but after a spring visit to WC he decided to come here. The liberal arts, he feels, are good for discipline. "You can discipline yourself in many ways, not only sports but academics," he said.

At WC Jenkins is far from inactive. He is not only on the hie,lacrosse team but is also an RA in Worchester, vice president of a fraternity, and holds a job in the bookstore. Even with all of these activities Jenkins considers himself first as a student and is pursuing a Sociology major.

After three years on the lacrosse team Jenkins said, "This year's team is the best since I've been here." He feels that his eight goals against St. Lawrence were possible only because of the precision among his teammates. "Nothing is better than when everyone works together for something and it comes off."

"There's nothing I really don't like about lacrosse here," he said. "You can't not like it." The only time that the season seems to drag for him is during the preseason workout in the winter. "The cold weather, the running, no scrimmaging, I don't hate it but it's a low point."

Jenkins attributes much of the team's success to coach Bryan Matthews. "The whole team's really coming together under him," Jenkins said. "He spends a lot of time with each of us asking how we're doing, especially gradewise. He takes a personal interest. Since he's young it's very easy to be straightforward with him and to level with him."

This year's team is mainly sophomores and juniors. "As we get older we're getting consistently better," Jenkins said. "He is especially impressed by the team's attitude and cooperation in working toward improvement. "The emotion after the Denison game was incredible," he said.

"We were down 5-1 and ended up winning by 4 after we lost in the last two seconds of a game against them a few years ago."

The big thing that the team needs to realize, according to Jenkins is, "We have to take our games one at a time. If we worry about our game on Saturday we may lose on Wednesday.

Although the WC lacrosse team is doing well this season due mainly to its teamwork, some individuals, such as Peter Jenkins, can be singled out for their singles out for their outstanding performance and unique contributions to the team's success.

Baseball Squad Drops Conference Doubleheader

by HARRY MCENROE
Sports Editor

Yesterday's home-opening, 13-0 rout over Gallaudet College did little to relieve the Washington College baseball team's chagrin over their trip to Widener University. While in Chester, Pa. the Shoremen were swept by the Pioneers, 11-7 and 18-3.

An overall poor defensive showing is reflected by the twenty-nine runs given up by the Shore nine. Interestigly enough, the squad scored that same total the week before while trouncing Swarthmore. In the first game the Shoremen enjoyed a 5-2 advantage midway through the contest, but the Widener bats eventually came alive and turned the tide. The second game was never a contest. While the Shore moundsmen were haveng their problems, the fielders were also not playing up to par. This unfortunate combination, along with Widener's potent hitting, spelled another defeat for the squad.

Chris Kiefer's 2-run single in the first inning gave the Shoremen all the offense they needed Thursday against an overmatched Gallaudet team. Hit in crucial situations, along with numerous walks, enabled the Shore nine to roll to vicotry. A three-run double by first baseman Bill Gerwig capped a 5-run rally in the eight which produced the 13-0 final tally. The Shore pitching staff earned its first shut-out of the young season by allowing Gallaudet only three hits. Hurling duties were shred by Paul and Harry McEnroe.

The Shoremen face a heavy weekend schedule at home with a crucial conference doubleheader against Haverford tomorrow and a game against a powerful Salisbury team on Sunday. Their record now stands at 4-2, 2-2 in the MAC conference.

Archeological Dig Began Monday

by SUE JAMES
Fine Arts EDitor

Two archeologists from the Mid-Atlantic Archeological Research in Newark, Delaware, engaged in a "test probe" in the basement of Middle Hall last Monday.

John McCarthy from Philadelphia, and Kenneth Basalik from New Jersey, worked from noon to evening to "probe" two openings in the right front room of the basement in Middle Hall," said Dr. Robert Janson-LaPalme, Associate Professor of Art.

Their discoveries were quite interesting, as three levels of foundations were uncovered. The first level consisted of tile, then modern cement and older cement were found in the second level, and finally, a third level of broken bricks. This latter level was the most amazing, as "ghosts" or imprints from the original wooden cross joints, which supported a wood floor, were imprinted in the brick rubble layer. Carbonized wood was also found to be remaining in these "ghosts." These layers, as Janson-LaPalme claims, were "subterranean support" for the building.

In the Middle Hall contract of 1844, to Mr. Aligia Reynolds, 100,000 bricks and stone from the original edifice were to be used in the building of 1844, according to Janson-LaPalme. The findings of Monday certainly support this requirement as stated in the contract.

The next phase of the archeological dig will be to observe the "undisturbed ground" that will be uncovered during the electrical and plumbing connections. Trenches will be dug outside of Middle Hall for these utilities.

Janson-LaPalme says that "one ground for hope is the recollection of Frederick W. Dumschott of seeing an article which mentioned that in previous underground work, foundations had been encountered." He went on to say that the original college building covered four times as much ground as the present Middle Hall. Items from the original Middle Hall building may still be uncovered.

"Hopes ride on exterior excavation," and the archeologists will be returning to watch digging for the installment of the utilities. Janson-LaPalme said that if anything was discovered at that time, students and other interested parties may have to work at night, since the semester recess is drawing near.

Publicity has been given to the opening of the time capsule taken from the cornerstone of Middle Hall as well.

Crew Season Begins

Varsity Four Beats LaSalle

by RICHARD COOKERLY

The men's crew opened up its 1981 season on Saturday against LaSalle College of Philedelphia. The day was bright, clear, and relatively calm, creating excellent conditions for rowing. The varsity four, varsity eight, and junior varsity eight has all trained intensely in preparation for the opening day, and were eager to test their skill.

The first event of the day was the varsity eights race, pitting the Shoremen against LaSalle's varsity and junior varsity eights. An extremely fast start gave the Shoremen an early lead in the race, which they struggled to hold on to. Gradually the more experienced LaSalle varsity slipped past them with about 1000 meters to go, and they never relinquished their lead. The winning time was 6:38, while the Shoremen pulled gamely in second piace at 6:48, defeating LaSalle's second varsity by a length. The varsity eight is rowed by Bob Coale, bow, Charlie Curis, Ted Mathias, Dave Pointon, Todd Harmon, Dave Stern, Evan Williams, stroke Jack Willis ans coxswain Bart Nathan.

The most successful race for the men was the varsity four competition. Veteran oarsmen Aian Luthy, John Townsend, Court Treuth, stone Jeff Landry, and coxswain Betsy Beard had little trouble overpowering their counterparts from LaSalle. Following an excellent start, the Shoremen held a commanding lead throughout the race. They rowed smoothly and powerfully in posting a surprisingly easy four-length victory. Their winning time was 7:38, and LaSalle' four finished 16 seconds later in 7:54. Look for big things from the varsity four, for they are determined to attain heights of success never before reached by Washington College crews.

The Shoremen's junior varsity crew, made up almost entirely of freshmen, put up a good battle against LaSalle's freshmen, losing by only six seconds. The Shoremen will host George Washington University and Duke at home on this coming Sunday.

Lacrosse Team Continues to Roll

by BEN CONNOLLY

The Shoremen lacrosse team upped its record to 4-2 with two crucial victories over Division III opponents, Denison and Bowdoin. The squad is establishing itself as a comeback team as it tell behind early in both games.

Peter Jenkins with 4 goals, Jeff Kauffman with 3 goals, Ben Tuckerman with 3 goals, and Jesse Bacon with 2 goals led the way in last Saturday's 14-10 win over Denison. A rousing crowd was in evidence for the home opener as it cheered the team back from a 10-9 third quarter deficit to their eventual victory. The defense of Frank Felice, Tim Matthews, and Kevin O'Connor stymied the visitors from Ohio in the fourth quarter along with Goalie Bruce Winand, who didn't allow a goal through the final fifteen minutes.

The Bowdoin Mules came to town on Wednesday with hopes of pulling off an upset. They jumped to a quick 2-0 lead before the game was delayed by a thunderstorm, and padded that lead with three more goals after the deluge to take a 5-2 first quarter advantage. The Shoremen then went on an 11-1 scoring binge to put the contest out of reach and enable Washington College to pull out a 16-9 victory. Doing the scoring for the squad were Dickie Grieves with 3 goals, 2 assists, Paul Hooper 1 goal, 4 assists, Jeff Kauffman 4 goals, Trap Macauley 3 goals, Pete Jenkins 3 goals, Ben Tuckerman 1 goal, 1 assist, Jess Bacon 1 goal, and Craig Boynton 1 assist.

There can be no accounting for the slow starts in the last three games, but the intense conditioning which the team goes through from January to May contributes to their strong second-half showing. A team in superior condition is Coach Bryan Matthews' aim, and the Shoremen appear to be in prime physical shape.

Midfielders Bob White, Dave Michalski, Tommy Adams, John Green, Mike Mariano, and defenseman Tim Cloud are also playing key roles in the Shoremen's early season success. These players, though not among the team scoring leaders, are contributing in a vital lacrosse statistic, the possession of loose balls. The team that controls the most ground balls will win the game 99 percent of the time, and the Shoremen, thus far, have been beating their opponents to the loose ball.

Stick Notes:

The team has outscored its opponents 91-82 through the first six games . . . Tri-Captains of the team this year are defenseman Frank Felice, Midfielder Bob White, and Attackman Paul Hooper . . . The squad faces Kutztown State this Saturday and Lynchburg College on Sunday. Both games begin at 1:30 on Kibler Field . . . The B Team led by Kip Sparrow, Billy Norris, Brian Kane, Ross Lansinger, Scott Brewster, and Bill Coffey has a home game scheduled with Harford C.C. on Saturday at 10:30.

Women's Athletics Start Spring Season

by JEFF ALDERSON
Layout Editor

Tennis

The season officially began Thursday March 26 against Trinity College with a WC loss 0-9. Trinity has always been a strong team and played up to par against WC.

The next match, against Catholic University also turned into a 0-9 WC defeat. "We don't usually so well against them," said Fall. "I was kind of pleased with both though. We went from Thursday to Tuesday without practice and the mistakes we made were those which won't happen with practice. There should be a real improvement in the next two weeks so we work on our fine tuning and have extended practice."

In the Trinity game Holli Young and Tammi Wolf played very well. Although they did not win their singles or doubles matches they both gave a valiant effort. Their biggest problem seemed to be lack of concentration which should improve as the season continues.

Shannon Crosby gave a fine performance in the Trinity match. Although her scores were low, (2-6, 1-6) they reflect how well she played. "Shannon played hard against a very good player and did a very good job against her," said Coach Fall. "Shannon's matches have been long. She's been making people work to win."

The Catholic University match proved to be a showcase for Karen Morgan, the number five seeded player. She played the best match with scores of 5-7, 3-6. Fall is looking for good things from Karen as the season continues.

Crew

"I'm very optimistic," stated head coach John Wagner. "This is the first year in awhile we've had more than one boat. It makes the first boat work harder."

The woman's crew lost their first race of the season to LaSalle by one second. "We raced neck and neck. LaSalle just got in the last stroke," said Wagner. "I'd like to have a rematch!"

This year's women's crew is one of the strongest ever andnext year looks even better. With the exception of Molly Meehan, all of the girls are underclassmen.

This Sunday there will be a race against Duke and George Washington University at 10:00 A.M. Wagner's looking for a good season. This year's races include:

April 11 Jefferson Oar Regatta at the University of Virginia.
April 18 Stocton State Regatta
April 25 Naval Academy
April 26 Trinity (Home)
May 2 Codie Cup Regatta in Georgetown
May 8 and 9 Dad Vail Regatta.

The members of women's crew are: Valerie March, Judi Skelton, Ruth Chisnell, Liz Gowen, Christina Ragonesi, Claire Paduda, Dorothy Scharz, Eileen Trentiy, Sue Chase, Kim Phillips, Andrea Taxdal, Kathy Kraus, Lori Cafiero, Chris Flowers, Molly Meehan and Michelle Hartnett.

Softball

The March 26 game against Cecil Community College had some disputed calls, in a 13-11 loss for W.C. There was quite a discrepancy about the interpretations some of the officials had of the rules.

WC led 1-0 at the end of the first inning. Because of several errors on WC's part, Cecil scored six runs in one inning. WC started to catch up in the seventh inning scoring four runs but Cecil still won the game 13-11.

Anne Most hit a double and a triple and tied with Cathy Hoffman for the most WC hits in the game, three. Debbie McFarlin, Maureen Murray, and Nancy Downing each had two hits. Cheryl Loss, Julie Gossit, Carolyn Sellers, Chris Flowers, and Karen Perkinson each had one hit.

"It was an excellent hitting game," said coach Jenny Butler. "Ours just came at the wrong time."

Butler is also optimistic about the team this season. "We should have a better than 50-50 season." The schedule next week is:

Monday, April 6, Western Maryland, 3:30, home
Wednesday, April 8, Notre Dame, 4:00, home
Thursday, April 9, Catholic University, 3:00, home.

Lacrosse

The woman's lacrosse club began their season Thursday, April 2 with a 6-7 loss to Notre Dame. The Shorewomen led 5-4 at the half but despite an aggressive effort they could not retain the lead.

Jesse Wittich scored four goals while Sara Banks and Vicki Williams each scored one. Goalie Dawn Sutton had six saves. Polly White played an outstanding defensive game.

"On the whole the team played very well," said club advisor Jodi Dudderar. "I'm looking forward to more experience in future games."

Faculty Pass Hill Dorms Decision Protest

by GINGER KURAPKA
Editor-in-chief

At its meeting last Monday night, the faculty approved a resolution protesting the decision to return fraternities to the Hill Dorms.

The resolution, drawn up by Dr. George Shivers, and passed almost unanimously, is requested to be presented to the Board of Visitors and Governors. It was approved with one change. The phrase, "that the faculty urges the administration to reconsider its decision," was changed to, "...urges the Executive Committee of the Board of Visitors and Governors to reconsider..."

Said Shivers, "I felt that after a committee of the college had made a strong proposal, and the faculty had approved it, to let it die wouldn't be right." The resolution reads as follows:

"Whereas the Hill Dormitories occupy a special place in campus life because of their location and their age.

Whereas the Student Affairs Committee unanimously recommended that the Hill Dormitories be used for special interest housing, beginning in the Fall of 1981.

Whereas the Faculty by an overwhelming majority voted in favor of the proposal of the Student Affairs Committee.

Whereas fraternities are private clubs of closed membership.

Whereas Washington College should encourage serious academic pursuit both in the classroom and outside the classroom."

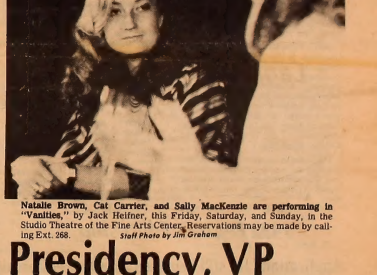
Business Major Passed in Principle by Faculty

by VIRGINIA KURAPKA
Editor-in-chief



The faculty approved the proposal for a Business Administration major to be instituted in principle, as drawn up by the Social Sciences Division.

Much discussion was given to positive and negative aspects of instituting such a major, including funding and validity of such a major in a liberal arts curriculum. Because the Economics department presently has 40 majors, "we need either a new program or an increased staff of the existing economics department" said Associate Professor of Economics Michael Malone.

"This sounds like it will change the fundamental nature of the institution," said Lecturer in French and Spanish Christine Pabon. Dr. John Taylor, a member of the Social Science division said, "We hope to turn out liberally educated people to make careers in business."

The proposal was passed almost unanimously, but must go to the curriculum committee of the Board of Visitors and Governors for approval,

Lee, Brown Win Presidency, VP

by VIRGINIA KURAPKA
Editor-in-chief

In a very close race, junior Sociology major Arlene Lee has become the first female SGA president since the early 60's.

Doug Brown also won by a narrow margin as Vice President over Christina Ragonesi. That office had the largest number of candidates, five. Jani Gabriel, Mark Simpson and Tom Twomey were defeated.

Lee ran against current SGA Treasurer Dave Pointon, Harry McEnroe, and Guy Sylvester. Included in her platform as presented at Monday's Speech Night were a proposal to conduct polls to get more student reaction to SGA events, recognition of a need for career counseling at Washington College, and at least three town meetings a semester "to get students involved."

Pointon ran on a platform based on his extensive experience in the present S.G.A. "No other candidate can match the experience I've had." Most candidates addressed the question of academic housing, although there was some disagreement as to whether or not it had been resolved. Other issues presented were student apathy and its causes, present student facilities, academic life and how it can be improved, and the attrition rate. Harry McEnroe also proposed a change in election procedure for S.G.A. senators. "When a floor fails to produce a candidate, the election should be open to campus-wide nominees."

The duties of the vice president as president of the Student Academic Board were emphasized in the positions of the candidates for that office. Brown proposed to, "have the SAB investigate every major area of study to evaluate...our academic program could become exceptional."

473 Students voted in this election, or approximately 71 percent., compared to approximately 60 percent. last year. Of the other offices, Sue DiRienzo won an uncontested race for secretary, and Frank Dirks won over Liz Gowen and Shawn Harmon for treasurer. The new Social Chairman is John Fitzgerald, who won over Roger Vaughn, and the assistant Social Chairman is Liz Edwardsen, who ran against Jeff Alderson, Phil Heaver and Lucie Hughes. Over 100 people attended Speech Night, held in Hynson Lounge.

SGA Vote-Counting Procedure

by GINGER KURAPKA
Editor-in-chief

The system of prefential voting used by the S.G.A. in tallying votes for the last several years is, although more confusing, more efficient than other systems, because it eliminates the need for run-off elections.

As explained by Dr. John Taylor, preferential voting is designed to produce a majority winner, "without having to go through the necessity of a run-off." The simplest system would be a simple majority. In races of more than two candidates, as all but two contests were this year, one candidate will get more votes than the others, but less than the majority. An election conducted in this way would thus produce a winner elected by a minority.

Run-off elections were formerly common here when a simple majority was required. "It created problems, it was a hassle to have to do it all over again," said Taylor.

"You're allowing for a run-off by the people counting the votes...but you're avoiding the necessity of having to conduct it all over again," he said. "In a sense it's better, because it guarantees you will eventually get a majority."

Editorial

This year's SGA election was refreshing in the surprises it held. Not only is Arlene Lee not a member of the current executive board, she is also, obviously, not a male.

There should be no doubts about her capabilities; she wouldn't have been elected if there were. Being the first female SGA president in recent memory should have no effect on her dealings with students, faculty, and administration. But her job will be especially difficult, partly because none of the executive board members will be returning, partly because of the added responsabilities of representing Washington College students in the Bicentennial year.

Lee's election has seemed to some a repudiation of the Jay Young administration, whose style and policies, it was often assumed, would have been continued by the choice of Dave Pointon. Both propositions are doubtful. She won elected on her own merits. Pointon, with a completely new executive board, could hardly have imitated Young, even if he wanted to, which is unlikely.

This election should make it clear to the students just how important their votes are. The preferential ballot may be fair, but it requires that students understand that their second, third, and fourth choices are as important in the long run as their first one. Avoidance of a run-off election is sensible, but it ought not to come at the expense of a clear mandate for the winner. Perhaps a new system could be devised that is both efficient and more politically sensitive. The advantages and disadvantages of other procedures, such as an electoral college, should be explored. In the meantime, good luck Arlene. You deserve the support of the entire student body.

Letters to the Editor

I realize that I'm a little late in getting started, but I'd like to announce my candidacy for S.G.A. president. My delayed start probably has something to do with all the apathy around here.

This is the first issue I would like to address—apathy. By solving this problem almost every major problem of the school can be solved. Nobody seems to know where apathy's coming from. Some blame it on the Young administration, others say the problem stretches all the way back to Nixon. I say it's from a field in Colombia.

How can the problem of apathy be solved? First let me say that if elected I will do nothing about the apathy problem. I would be quite delighted to control the S.G.A. while the hordes slumped in nullification. But that is not the point. My solution is this: allot the social chairman money to buy 'ups' from visiting bands. Even better would be to buy them from speakers of the William James Forum (everyone carries them on the lecture trail). Whichever source is chosen, the purchase (or 'deal') can be made at a veryjow level, so low that even the W.C. security force will not be able to detect thse trafficking. The S.G.A. can then sell the speed to Dinner Dave at an exorbitant price. Dinner Dave will buy it because he knows that by incorporating speed into the meals students' appetites will be drastically reduced, thereby drastically increasing his profits. Students would be rid of their lethargism, become very attentive in class, gain interest in their work, and grades will rise. Faculty members will be delighted, brag of their college's turnaround, become excited about their work again and make classes more interesting. While most other private colleges are flounderingf, Washington College's reputation will skyrocket. This will bring in more federal grants, greater donations, better students, more notable speakers, and better bands. In a few years most of the school's major problems will be solved. The S.G.A. would no longer need to dose the students with speed. Dinner Dave would not be happy about eating habits returning to normal, but he would only get about as hot as his food.

This leaves only the perennial question of academic housing, of which it is rumored Reagan's speech will be about on graduation day '82. My argument is this: if the academic housing groups do not realize that it is impossible to argue with persons whose eyes are vacuous then they're not that smart anyway!

Sincerely,
Robert Aiken

The Kent County Unit of the American Cancer Society would like to offer their sincere thanks to The Student Government Association of Washington College, and a special thanks to Mr. Jay Young, their president.

All of Jay's diligent efforts made to organize the A.C.S. Benefit Cocktail Party, held March 20th in Hynson Lounge; were proven to be worthwhile, with it turning out to be such a success.

Thanks to the faculty, staff members and students of the college—of which several were kind enough to serve as bartenders for the affair; $3500.00 was raised from this benefit.

These funds will be put to good use for local cancer patient aid services and cancer research that's done nationally.

Again, may we express our appreciation for a sincere effort made, to join community and college affairs in benefiting The American Cancer Society's great cause.

Pegasus on Schedule

by WENDY MURPHY
NEWS EDITOR

"Overall, I think this year's Pegasus is going to be a damn sight better than last year's," said Jim Graham, Pegasus Editor.

This will not be a typical W.C. yearbook. The students will find few captions, a lot of larger pictures, and a variety of people. He said the hardest people to get pictures of are the faculty.

The yearbook will consist of 132 to 144 pages, of which 80-85 have been completed. The major sections yet to be done are graduation, the fraternities and sororities, and the campus candid shots.

Grah:am said, "Arlene Lee is the most dedicated member of the staff. She's really a big help to have around, very inspiring. I hope she'll continue with the yearbook next year."

He added, "Spring is the best time for taking pictures so there will be a lot of candids. What wr need is for the students to not mind having their pictures taken." Smile!

Rich Performs Senior Recital

by JEANETTE SCHAEFER

Wanda Jean Rich presented her senior recital last Friday evening, March 27, in Tawes Theater accompanied by Ann Atwater Bourne. Rich performed works of Franz Schubert, Samuel Barber, and Maurice Ravel.

Perhaps the least known of these composers is Samuel Barber. Born in 1910 in West Chester, Pennsylvania, Barber was one of the greatest contemporary American composers. He received two Pulitzer Prizes—one in 1958 for his opera Vanessa, the other for his 1962 Piano Concerto. He was neo-Romantic; his compositions are lyric, dramatic, using mostly 19th century harmonies. He was noted for his lush melodic lines. "(When) I'm writing music for words and let the music flow out of them." And the melodies flowed until his death in January of this year.

In memorial to Samuel Barber for his outstanding accomplishments in music, Miss Rich performed four of this songs. She beautifully rendered these pieces, "The Daisies" (1927), "Sure on this Shining Night" (1938), "The Secrets of the Old" (1938), and "A Nun Takes the Veil" (1937), to a very appreciative audience.

Franz Schubert is more familiar than Barber. Schubert was an early Romanticist composer, living from 1797 to 1828. His rich melodies are set with an accompaniment which represent either the external details of the poet's scene or the inner meaning of the text. Miss Rich began the program singing five lieder by Schubert: "An die Musik" (1817), "Du bist die Ruh" (1823), "Wanderers Nachtlied" (1824), "An Silvia" (1826), and "Gretchen am Spinnrade" (1814). This last lied is typical of Schubert in that the piano accompaniment portrays the whining of the spinning wheel.

After the intermission, Miss Rich performed the four Barber pieces, followed by Ravel's *Cinq Melodies Populaires Grecque*s. Maurice Ravel (1875-1937) collected these five original Greek melodies and set them harmonically. "Chanson de la mariee", "La-bas', vers l'eglise", Quel galant m'est comparable", "Chanson des cuellieuses de lentisques", and "Tout gai!" arranged in this grouping in 1904-1906, show Ravel's interest in antiquity combined with 19th century Impressionism.
